

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

WARRANT APPOINTING THE COMMITTEE.

WHEREAS representations have from time to time been made to me by influential bodies, to the effect that there is a large and increasing number of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates in Scotland, and that the existing powers of dealing with such persons, especially with a view to a permanent remedy, are inadequate ; and whereas I consider that it is desirable, in the public interest, that a full inquiry into this subject should be instituted,—I accordingly hereby appoint a Committee consisting of :—

Sir Charles Cameron, Bart., M.D., M.P. (Chairman) ;
Lieut.-Col. A. B. M'Hardy, R.E., Prison Commissioner for Scotland ;
R. Farquharson, Esq., M.D., M.P. ;
Col. Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff, R.E., Under-Secretary for Scotland ;
John Dove Wilson, Esq., LL.D., Professor of Law, Aberdeen University ;
J. F. Sutherland, Esq., M.D., Medical Officer, Glasgow Prison ;
Miss Flora C. Stevenson, Hon. F.E.I.S., Member of the Edinburgh School Board ; to inquire whether the number of such persons is increasing, and into the cause of such increase ; and further, to suggest such remedies as may, while deterrent, be likely to bring about their reformation and to prevent further additions to their numbers, due regard being had to the cost of any remedies which may be suggested, and to the practicability of their being carried into effect. And I appoint Dr Sutherland to be Secretary to the Committee.

REPORT.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, BART., M.P.,

H.M. Secretary for Scotland.

SIR,

A Your remits to the Committee call our attention to habitual offenders, vagrants, beggars, and inebriates in Scotland, and direct us to enquire 'whether the number of such persons is increasing and into the causes of such increase, and to suggest such remedies as may, while deterrent, be likely to bring about their reformation and to prevent further additions to their numbers, due regard being had to the cost of any remedies which may be suggested, and to the practicability of their being carried into effect;' and also 'to enquire into the number of male and female juvenile offenders sent to prison in Scotland, the offences for which they are committed, and the extent to which such committals could be lessened, and to report generally on the subject.'

B In pursuance of our enquiries and the consideration of our report, we have held 38 sittings. Of these, 27 were devoted mainly to the examination of 151 witnesses, whose evidence is reported. These comprise 1 senator of the College of Justice, 4 sheriffs, 13 provosts and magistrates, 10 chief constables of burghs, 8 chief constables of counties, 8 poor-law officials, 1 representative of the Scottish Local Government Board, and 1 of the Scottish Lunacy Board, 6 medical superintendents of asylums, 17 prison officials, 3 members of School Boards, 6 physicians and medical experts, 4 solicitors, 13 clergymen of all denominations, 3 representatives of Prisoners' Aid Societies, 20 of refuges and asylums of all sorts, 3 Industrial and Reformatory School Officials, delegates from the Perthshire Committee on Tinkers and Vagrants, delegates from the Salvation Army, a representative of the Charity Organization Society, a female convict and a male ex-convict. Besides this we visited 35 institutions, including 8 prisons, 3 police offices, 10 reformatories and industrial schools, 7 Magdalene asylums, 1 orphans' home, 1 inebriates' home, 1 children's shelter, night and industrial refuges, and other institutions, a list of which we give elsewhere (p. ix., Minutes of Evidence).

C In the course of these visits your Committee interviewed a very large number of officials and inmates, including scores of prisoners of all classes, adult and juvenile, convicts and police cases, as well as many habitual inebriates and inmates of Magdalene institutions. The circumstances in which these interviews took place (in prisons, police cells, reformatories, and elsewhere) rendered it impossible for the statements made to be taken down by a shorthand writer, but in the course of them many facts were elicited which have largely influenced your Committee in arriving at their conclusions.

D Besides this your Committee have obtained a large number of statistical returns and memoranda,¹ and they have availed themselves of published official reports of responsible committees and departments on the various branches of their enquiry.²

PART I.—HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

Cases of drunkenness, breach of the peace, assault, vagrancy, begging and importuning, account for seventy-one per cent. of the total apprehensions and citations in Scotland.¹ A large portion of the balance is accounted for by offences against local police regulations, and the remainder consists of indictable offences for which the sentences are so long as to prevent any rapid increase in the number of re-convictions. The average duration of confinement of criminal prisoners in Scotland, excluding convicts at Peterhead, during the five years ending 1893 was under 14½ days²; and when we remember that this includes long sentences as well as short, it will be seen that an opportunity for repeated conviction is afforded in the case of the habitual petty offender which is wanting in that of the more serious criminal, and it is therefore to the class of petty offences that our investigations have practically been confined.

Petty-offender Statistics.—In Scotland the number of arrests and convictions,—including forfeited pledges and cases dealt with by fine, imprisonment or admonition,—for drunkenness, breach of the peace, assault, vagrancy, importuning and petty theft has since 1875 increased, though not proportionately to the increase of population.³ From the police returns furnished to us it appears that the number of arrests and convictions for these offences in the whole of Scotland, in the years to which the figures relate, were as follows :—

³ Appendix X.

Year.	Arrests, &c.	Convictions, &c.	Population as estimated by Registrar-General.	Percentage of Convictions, &c., to Population.
1875	101,182	92,783	3,514,744	2·64
1893	108,603	100,310	4,093,959	2·45

The same returns show, however, that this increase occurs in the case of counties only, and that in the burghs, although there is an increase in 1893 as compared with 1885, there is practically no increase in numbers as compared with 1875. As divided between counties and burghs the figures are * :—

Counties.

Year.	Arrests, &c.	Convictions, &c.	Population as estimated by Registrar-General.	Percentage of Convictions, &c., to Population.
1875	14,275	12,493	2,003,154	0·90
1885	18,029	15,738	2,163,207	0·91
1893	21,823	19,955	2,148,104	1·12

Burghs.

1875	80,710	76,052	1,511,590	5·03
1885	68,269	63,504	1,693,100	3·75
1893	81,160	75,500	1,945,855	3·88

Pushing the analysis further we find in the smaller burghs that the percentage of convictions to population since 1875 has been practically stationary, while in the larger,

* The division between counties and burghs, which is made in the Judicial Statistics, has necessarily been followed in this Report, though it is in some respects unsuitable for the purpose. The division which these statistics make does not correspond with the division of the population into rural and urban, or with the division between the territory of the county common law and that of the burghal statute law on the subject of petty offences. What are classed as burghs in the statistics are only those burghs which have entirely separate police establishments, and make separate statistical returns. All the larger burghs are in this position, but the small burghs returned as such in the statistics, are only a comparatively small proportion of those actually existing. It thus happens that a large number of burghs, which hold courts and administer law special to burghs, but which are policed by the counties in which they are situated, are massed in the county statistics, so as to make it impossible to distinguish what number of the offences, which are recorded as belonging to the counties, belong properly to them, or belong to burghs massed with them. A return has been made of the burghs which are thus included in slump with counties, and will be found in Appendix XCIII. It will be observed that it includes burghs, such as Wishaw, which are much larger than some of the burghs making separate returns.

A although, as before, 1893 shows a slightly increased percentage of convictions to population on 1885, it exhibits also a largely decreased percentage on 1875. Dividing the cases between the smaller and the larger burghs, the figures are as follows :—

Small Burghs.

(Including Ayr, Partick, Perth, Hamilton, Kilmarnock, Kirkcaldy, Inverness, Dumbarton, Stirling, Dumfries, Dunfermline, Hawick, Airdrie, Port-Glasgow, Johnstone, Arbroath, Renfrew, Alloa, Galashiels, Rothesay, Forfar, Montrose, Brechin, Broughty-Ferry).

Year.	Arrests, &c.	Convictions, &c.	Population as estimated by Registrar-General.	Percentage of Convictions, &c., to Population.
1875	11,380	9,724	338,189	2·87
1885	12,480	11,339	401,066	2·82
1893	13,955	13,015	446,231	2·91

Large Burghs.

(Including Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Leith, Greenock, Govan, Paisley).

Year.	Arrests, &c.	Convictions, &c.	Population as estimated by Registrar-General.	Percentage of Convictions, &c., to Population.
1875	69,330	64,871	1,173,401	5·52
1893	67,205	62,485	1,499,624	4·16

B Increase in Drunkenness and Offences arising therefrom.—A carefully prepared diagram, to be found in the Appendix to this Report,¹ showing the number of apprehensions and citations for breach of the peace, drunk and incapable, and disorderly conduct, and in another colour the growth of the population since 1880, proves that the main factor in this increase is an augmentation of drunkenness and offences arising therefrom. Reference to this diagram shows that the number of apprehensions and citations for these offences increased from 80,855 in 1880, when the population was 3,637,000, to 98,427 in 1893, when the population was 4,050,000. Not only do these figures show an absolute increase of 17,572, or 21 per cent., in thirteen years, but an increase beyond that proportionate to the increase of population (10 per cent. between 1881 and 1893) to the number of 9,487 a year. The arrests for the offences specified reached their maximum in 1890, between which year and 1893 they have declined by nearly 8,000, which is so far encouraging; but still the serious significance of the net increase of the percentage of arrests from this cause to the population of Scotland in 1893 as compared with 1881, is shown by the fact that it amounts to more than one-fifth of the total arrests for similar offences in the London Metropolitan district at the present time.

C Commitments to Prison.—On analysing the number of commitments to prison in Scotland we find² (a) that the number of commitments to prison in Scotland for petty offences has steadily increased from 26,000 in 1875 to 32,000 in 1885 and 35,000 in 1893, and (b) that the number of commitments to prison for other offences has decreased since 1875, being in that year over 17,200, against 14,000 in 1885 and 15,600 in 1893.

D It thus appears that the number of commitments for drunkenness, breach of the peace and assault, vagrancy or begging, prostitution and petty theft, in 1893 constituted more than two-thirds of the whole number; and, as petty offenders constitute the class among whom the greatest number repeated convictions occur, one would naturally expect a corresponding increase in re-commitments to prison.

Increase in repeated Commitments to Prison.—We find that in 1884 the number A of re-commitments within the year was 14,305, that it then fell considerably, rising again in 1890 to 14,742, and reaching 15,255 in 1893. Although these figures show an actual increase in the number of habitual offenders, as indicated by re-commitments to prison within twelve months, it is gratifying to note that that increase is not proportionate either to the increase of petty offences or to that of the general population in the interval. Had it been proportionate, according to either of these standards the number of re-commitments would have been some 400 greater than was actually the case.

Increase most marked among Confirmed Offenders.—Prison statistics further B prove that it is amongst the most incorrigible class of offenders that the increased re-commitments have principally occurred. This is very clearly brought out if we compare the tables of re-committals to prison, published in the Annual Reports of the Prison Commissioners. Taking the five last years, we find that the total re-committals in Scotland, once and oftener, and the re-committals of those who had been ten times or oftener previously in prison, stood in the years 1889–90 to 1893–94, as follows:—

Year.	Total Re-committals.	Re-committals, Ten Times and oftener.
1890–91	15,060	2494
1891–92	14,677	2674
1892–93	15,911	2714
1893–94	16,532	2816

The increase in the total re-commitments was therefore 749 or 4·7 per cent.; C while the increase of the more hardened offenders was 347 or 14 per cent.

Causes of Increase.—In considering the causes of the increase of petty and D habitual offenders in Scotland several facts require to be borne in mind. For instance, the number of commitments to prison of offenders under 16 years of age has diminished by 471 in 1893 as contrasted with 1861. This is doubtless due to the institution of Reformatory and Industrial Schools and the enactment of compulsory education, which, apart from other considerations, deprives juvenile delinquents of much of the opportunity previously afforded for wrong-doing. Another cause is doubtless also an improvement in public sentiment, which renders magistrates reluctant to commit such cases. To this we believe to be due a considerable portion of that diminution in the ratio of petty offences to population which is noticeable in the case of larger burghs.¹ In the case of the counties and smaller burghs the same causes would, of course, exert an influence in the same direction, but there they have been much more than counteracted by the creation of new offences through the erection of populous places into Police Burghs and by the increased energy of police administration.

Influence of Legislation and Police Administration on number of Offenders.— E The potency of these two causes in influencing the number of arrests and convictions is not generally sufficiently appreciated. To illustrate it, take the case of Glasgow.² In 1866 the principal Glasgow Police Act was passed. Under the Act in vogue prior to its passing, the drunken cases with which the police had to do were classified as drunk and incapable and drunk and disorderly, but the coupling of drunk with disorderly was found to lead to miscarriage of justice when the drunkenness could not be proved. The Act of 1866 therefore omitted the drunkenness in disorderly cases, and charged the disorder simply. The last complete year in which the old Act was in force was 1866, and the number of convictions, admonitions, and pledges forfeited in that year in cases of drunk and incapable, drunk and disorderly, assaults, and disorderly, amounted to 15,656. The first complete year under the new Act was 1868, and in that year the number of convictions, admonitions, and forfeited pledges in cases of drunk and incapable, assaults, and disorderly rose to 16,226. This increase of 570, we may take it, was due chiefly to the change of law. But prior to 1866, and for seven years afterwards, the custom was for the lieutenants in charge of the various police offices to discharge when sober those drunks who could not leave a pledge, as not worth the trouble of bringing before the magistrate. In 1873 the magistrates gave orders that this system should be discontinued, and that every person who did not leave a sufficient pledge should be brought before them. 1873 was the last complete year during which the old system was in force, and in that year the number of convictions, admonitions, and pledges forfeited in cases charged as drunk and incapable,

² Appendix LXXXI.

A assault, and disorderly amounted to 24,324, while the 'drunks' discharged without leaving pledges numbered 29,963. The old system continued for the greater portion of 1874, and 1875 was the first complete year under the new. The result of this purely administrative change was to increase the number of convictions, admonitions, and forfeited pledges, from 24,324 in 1873, to 38,133, and to increase the number of recommitments to prison by 5800 over the figures at which it had stood in the previous year (1874).¹

Appendix LV.

B Case of Perth.—Again we may take the case of Perth. In that city, without any special change in the law, the number of arrests, which during the administration of one Chief Constable had been between 500 and 600, sprang up on the appointment of his successor to over 1000. The only reason the new Chief Constable could give was the change in the management of the police. The people, he admitted, were not more drunken or disorderly, but those who were allowed to escape before were dealt with now.² ² Q. 7357-8.

C Cases of Govan and Partick.—Another illustration of the extent to which the number of arrests is influenced by diversity of police administration is to be found in the case of Glasgow and Govan. These police areas are contiguous, and a stranger passing from one to the other would not recognise where the one ended and the other commenced. In Glasgow the number of arrests and citations for all offences is about 84 per 1000 of the population; in Govan it is but 40. But in 1873 the ratio of arrests in Govan was 105 per 1000.³ In 1883 it had fallen to 73·39. In that year a new⁴ Q. 2789. Chief Constable was appointed, and the total number of apprehensions in 1884 fell to 57 per 1000; in 1885 to 41; in 1886 to 34; and in 1887 to 31. Since that date it has fluctuated between 38 and 51 per 1000, and in 1893 was 42, or exactly half the percentage of Glasgow. An attempt was made to explain the difference by an alleged superiority of the Govan population, but the fact that in 1893 the number of convictions for petty theft in Govan was in proportion to its population⁴ more than 30 per cent. ⁴Appendix X. greater than in Glasgow, detracts from the satisfactoriness of this explanation, and compels us to fall back upon the admission of the Chief Constable of Govan⁵ that the ⁵ Q. 8879-80. percentage of apprehensions 'depends entirely upon the management of the police force.'

D While it is right to state that in no instance did we find any prisoner in a police office whose condition and appearance did not afford strong presumptive evidence in justification of his arrest, we must state our conviction that a judicious management of the police tends to diminish the percentage of arrests to population, and we commend to attention the following extract from a memorandum (to be found in our Appendix) by the Chief Constable of Partick relating to arrests in his district⁶:—'Having had ⁶ Appendix LXXII. 'experience in five different Police Forces during the last 23 years, I must say that the 'more efficient the management of a Police Force is, and the more the Police keeps in 'touch with the Public, the fewer will be the apprehensions.'

E In Scotland the Magistrates are indirectly elected by the inhabitants of the different localities, and where any peculiarity in the 'management of the police' is based on definite instructions from them, we may assume that it accords with popular sentiment. Where, however, it results simply from the idiosyncrasy of the local Chief Constable, as appears often to be the case, we think it but proper that attention should be called to it, in order that if it be commendable the example may be held up for imitation, and if it be the reverse, the attention of the local Magistrates may be called to it.

F We therefore recommend that the Inspector of Constabulary should, as part of his duty, inquire into local peculiarities of police administration, and where they seem to him to call for notice, should report on them to the Secretary for Scotland.

G If this were done, although it could not bring about uniformity in the 'management of the police' throughout Scotland, it would tend to discourage those extreme departures from it, to which the fact of so much being left to the unsupervised discretion of individual Chief Constables at present gives rise.

H Conclusions.—In response to the question propounded in the first portion of your remit, your Committee have to report—

- (1) That the percentage of convictions to population for graver offences in Scotland has for many years shown a continuous decrease.

- (2) That the number of convictions for petty offences has within the same period A gone on increasing at a rate considerably in excess of that of the increase of population.
- (3) That the number of habitual offenders, as indicated by those imprisoned more than once within twelve months, has increased, but that the ratio of increase is less than either that of the population generally or that of convictions for petty offences.
- (4) That there has been a disproportionately large increase in the number of confirmed petty offenders, as indicated by persons re-committed to prison ten times and upwards.
- (5) That the increase in the number of convictions, &c., for petty offences is not due to a falling off in the character of the population, but is due (a) to the effect of legislation in increasing the number of petty offences; (b) to the adoption of Burgh Police Acts in populous places, and (c) to increased vigilance on the part of the Police.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN SCOTTISH AND ENGLISH LAW AND ADMINISTRATION.

Although at first blush the fact that 38 persons per 1000 are annually apprehended or cited in Scotland against 25 in England, and that 12·3 per 1000 are annually imprisoned in Scotland against 5·6 in England, would seem to indicate the existence of a far greater amount of crime in Scotland than in England,¹ your Committee see no reason to believe that such is the case. In Scotland the system of public prosecution operates in the case of all offences, petty or serious, whereas in England it is resorted to only in that of the serious crimes, petty offences being there prosecuted either by the police or by private individuals. The committals to penal servitude, where the systems of prosecution adopted render a fair comparison possible, are proportionately almost identical in the two countries, being per hundred thousand of population in Scotland 2·4 against 2·3 in England.² In indictable crimes where the public prosecutor intervenes in a large number of cases that in England would be left to private prosecution, the proportion of convictions to population is as one would expect greater, being per hundred thousand of the population 46 against 32 in England. That the crimes and offences treated in the English prisons are of a much more serious nature than those treated in the Scotch, is shown by the fact that in the case of Scotch prisoners 40·2 per cent. had sentences of one month or under, against 21·4 of the English. And on the other hand, of prisoners undergoing sentences of three months and over the percentage in England was 34·4 against 21·2 in Scotland.³

The Offence of Drunkenness in England and Scotland.—By much the greater C portion of the apparent excess of crime in Scotland over that in England is due to drunkenness and offences arising therefrom. Thus in 1892 the number of persons charged with drunkenness, breach of peace, and petty assault in Scotland, was upwards of 103,000, whereas in England, with more than seven times the population, it was under 254,000.⁴ This would at first sight seem to indicate the existence of a much greater amount of drunkenness in Scotland than in England, but that by no means follows. The fact is that the law and the practice of the police in the two countries are so different as to render any comparison based on police statistics utterly misleading. Here, for example, is a description of the practice in London extracted from the evidence which Mr. de Rutzen, police magistrate at Westminster, gave before the Departmental Committee of 1892 on the Treatment of Inebriates.⁵

‘to the station for being drunk and incapable, unless incapable, in the sense of either ‘lying down dazed, asleep, either in the middle of the street, or in the gutter, or on the ‘pavement, and so forth. And the mode in which they are dealt with now is, they ‘are taken to the station to be taken care of; as soon as they become sober the police ‘are obliged to let them out, and my experience is that there is not one in twelve ‘whom a magistrate sees after they are let out from the station. The police have the ‘power to summon, it is true, but the persons detained probably have given either a ‘false address or a false name, and nothing more is ever heard of them. . . . The only ‘excuse for taking them to the station is the same excuse that you might have if you ‘found a person drunk outside your door, to take him in for fear of being run over;
‘and in the same way the police only take a drunken person to the station and detain

A ' him there until he is fit to go, and bind him over in recognisances to appear next day.
' Drunken people having found out that there is no kind of power to enforce attendance, ' never make any appearance at all, and therefore, one after another, when the name is ' called, the magistrate marks "no appearance," leaving it entirely to the police to take ' steps by summoning, which they do not do, and perhaps cannot do in one case out of ' a hundred, or ten or a dozen, as the case may be.'

B Contrast this with the practice in Scotland. In Dundee in 1865 there were 1231 arrests for Drunkenness, Drunk and Incapable, and Disorderly Conduct; in 1875, 1656; in 1885, 1169; and in 1893, 1615. Every one of these 5671 arrests is recorded as having resulted in fine, imprisonment, admonition, or forfeiture of pledge.¹ In Edinburgh in 1893, out of 2206 persons arrested for the offences specified, 15 only appear to have been acquitted; the rest resulted in fine, imprisonment, admonition, or forfeiture of pledges. Appendix X.

C Differences between Scottish and English Poor Law.—Your Committee also had to keep in view the differences between the Scottish and the English Poor Law systems. On the one hand, as brought out by Mr M'Neill, and as fully dealt with by us afterwards (p. xxi, C), the Scottish Poor Law system is one of outdoor relief, with the poorhouse only as an auxiliary or as a check. On the other hand, the theory of the Scottish Poor Law, differing on this point totally from the English, absolutely denies relief, not only to all able-bodied persons themselves, but to those persons dependent upon them, who if they were in employment, they would be held to be able to maintain. In Scotland the relief of the able-bodied and of their dependants is left to the charity of public bodies and private persons. This theory is one which Parochial Authorities find it difficult to carry out in its strictness, but we have accepted it as one which is not to be altered, and we have framed our suggestions so as to make the minimum of interference with it.

D Differences in Prison Administration.—It is also to be remembered that there is a considerable difference in the details of Prison Administration in Scotland and England. For instance, in Scottish prisons there are no tread-wheels or other mechanical means of inflicting what is known in England as first-class hard labour. Sentences involving hard labour are comparatively rare in Scotland, while in England they form the great majority; and it may thus have come about that the need for mechanical appliances has not been strongly felt in Scotland: nevertheless the tread-wheel and crank have both been tried in Scotland, and abandoned many years ago as improper instruments of punishment.

E The Scottish prisoner is therefore engaged entirely in industrial labour, some kinds of it—as for instance, oakum picking—being unfortunately not satisfactory in their results either as means of reformation or as giving good financial returns; but the profitable employment of prisoners has always been a difficult question, and every effort is made to find suitable and remunerative labour for them.

DIFFERENCE IN LAW AND ADMINISTRATION WITHIN SCOTLAND.

F In cases of drunkenness.—In Scotland itself, while the law on the subject of drunkenness is uniform throughout the Counties, however much its administration may differ, both law and administration differ to a bewildering extent in the different Burghs. In the Edinburgh Police Act, for example, there is one definition of a Drunk and Incapable, and he is liable to a maximum penalty of 40s. or 1 month's imprisonment; in the Glasgow and Greenock Police Acts there is a wider definition, but the maximum penalty is 40s. or 14 days. In the Burghs under the operation of the Burgh Police Act, or which have (like Dundee) adopted the same provisions on this point, the punishment is 40s. or one month, and in the case of habitual drunkenness a sentence of 14 days' imprisonment without the option of a fine may be inflicted. Under the Greenock Police Act a man committed as drunk and incapable may, after 6 previous convictions for the same offence, be sent to jail for 60 days, while in the Counties he may get drunk as frequently as he pleases at a maximum penalty of 5s. or 24 hours. In Police Administration too there is the greatest diversity. In Glasgow, drunk-and-incapables, or other petty offenders, are, on becoming sober, liberated from the police cells on leaving pledges of 5s. or 7s. 6d.; and having done so they depart and hear no more of the matter. Those who cannot leave pledges are brought before the Magistrate and dealt with very summarily, especially on busy mornings (Mondays for example), when they are brought up, and plead guilty or are dismissed in batches. In this way out of 33,998 A arrested as Drunk or Disorderly, 2488 escaped without fine or imprisonment, admonition or forfeited pledge. In Edinburgh, on the contrary, those released on pledge are only allowed to go on condition that they shall appear before the Court next morning, and if they fail to present themselves their pledges are forfeited and they are proceeded against by summons, and the system is so thoroughly enforced that, as has been mentioned, only 15 out of 2206 arrested in 1893 are unaccounted for under the heads of Conviction, Admonition, or Pledge forfeited. But in Edinburgh, instead of the prisoner being dealt with at once, he only receives immediate sentence if he pleads guilty. If he pleads not guilty his case is remanded for 24 hours for the convenience of the police. The habitual petty offender, knowing this, only refrains from pleading guilty when a Magistrate reputed for his severity happens to be on the Bench, and then he does so in hope of getting off more easily before another Magistrate next day. An innocent novice, however, arrested on Friday afternoon, without friends or money, and ill-advised enough to plead not guilty on Saturday morning, might, and no doubt occasionally does, under such a system subject himself to 48 hours' extra incarceration in the police cells. In Cupar and other burghs in Fife,¹ on the other hand, so careful are the authorities to avoid the unnecessary detention of untried prisoners that Magistrates are appointed to visit the police office on Sundays and discharge or remand as, after hearing evidence, they think fit—an excellent practice which might with advantage be extended. In Paisley a different system prevails. Drunkenness in that town was up till 1892 (when Paisley came under the Burgh Police Act) dealt with under the provisions of the Public Houses Act, 1862. In the words of the Chief Constable of the Burgh:—‘Prior to² the passing of this last Act our powers were limited.’ It was only 5s. or 24 hours then, and it was not worth while paying the fare of a man or woman to Glasgow, and a cab from the station to Duke Street, to get them washed and turned out next morning. We therefore turned them out next morning when they were sober, or if we could get 5s. out of them we took it. We did not try fining. It was no use.’ The new Act, as we have stated, increased the 5s. or 24 hours penalty to 40s. or 30 days, but the old tradition remains, and in 1893, out of 922 persons arrested in Paisley as drunk and incapable or disorderly, only 298 were accounted for by convictions, admonitions, or forfeited pledges, while 624 were, again to quote the Chief Constable,³ ‘turned adrift when they got sober as not worth taking before the Court. . . . We do not take a man before the Court if we can help it, because a man might be ruined if it was found that he came before the Police Court. We study these things in Paisley.’*⁴ We have gone somewhat into detail on this branch of the subject because we desire to make clear the vast extent to which difference of Police Administration in different localities must affect the significance of criminal statistics so far as petty offences are concerned, rendering comparisons between those of different localities in Scotland almost as impossible as between those of Scotland and England.

⁵ Appendix LII.

Habitual Offenders vary their Offences.—One fact it is important to bear in B mind in dealing with the whole question—the habitual offender, as a rule, does not confine himself to one offence. The greater number of his convictions may be for breach of the peace, or even for incapable drunkenness, but generally, in the case of males, other charges, such as obscene language, begging, malicious mischief, theft, or robbery, sooner or later appear on the record; and in the cases of females, importuning generally figures among the charges. Thus a return of female offenders⁵ brought before the Dundee City Police Court more than four times during the year 1893 gives the record of 79 women. Among these women were only seven whose repeated appearances were due to one charge—that charge being in three cases breach of the peace and assault, in two, drunkenness, and in the two others, importuning. Of the remaining 72, who during the year 1893 had between them been apprehended 550 times, the charges on which they had been arrested were in 238 cases breach of the peace, in 174 drunkenness, in 169 importuning, and in 5 petty theft.

COMMITMENTS FOR PROSTITUTION.

The number of commitments for petty offences of females to prison in Scotland⁶ in C 1893 was 15,206; of these, 3100 commitments, or over one-fifth of the whole, were

* The exceptional leniency of the Paisley police force does not seem to have blinded them to the fact that the increased fine which could be imposed under the Burgh Police Act inferred a legitimate increase in the pledge that could be exacted in suitable cases. The customary pledge had accordingly been raised to 5s. 6d. or 7s. 6d., and in the case of a prisoner with £1 in his possession the Chief Constable told us that he would make it 10s.

A for prostitution. This is such a startling proportion that we feel bound to consider the state of the law and that of the police administration which gives rise to it.

B Scottish Law as to Prostitution.—At common law in Scotland 'loitering or importuning,' the offence with which prostitutes are charged, is not a crime, and it is not punishable outside burghs which come under the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act or of Local Police Acts. To constitute the offence under the Burgh Police Act the person must be (1) a common prostitute or street-walker, and (2) must either 'loiter about,' or 'importune passengers for the purpose of prostitution,' and the maximum penalty prescribed is 40s. fine or one month's imprisonment. In most of the special Police Acts the offence and penalty are the same, but in Edinburgh the penalty ranges to £5, or in the discretion of the Magistrate, imprisonment not exceeding 60 days.

C In police administration and magisterial treatment the greatest diversity prevails in this class of cases. In Glasgow we were informed that women arrested for the first time, when brought to the police station, are dismissed by the Lieutenant with a caution. If again arrested they are brought before the magistrate; the evidence adduced against them being that of two constables, who swear that they have known them for so long as common street-walkers, and that on the previous night between such and such an hour, and in such and such a street, they saw them accost a certain number of men. The evidence of the persons importuned is never forthcoming, and that of the constables is described as almost invariably identical.¹ Of the 2421 cases arrested in 1893, 2214 were dealt with by admonition, fine, or imprisonment, pledges not being accepted in these cases, and the maximum penalty of 40s. or 30 days being imposed in a very large number of instances. In 1894, 1831 of these women went to prison, 778 of them for 30 days or a month.² In Glasgow the average sentence of these women was $21\frac{3}{4}$ days, and the cost of their maintenance to the country, over £2180. In Edinburgh, on the other hand, although the maximum penalty is fixed at 60 days without the option of a fine, the administration of the law on the subject is much more lenient. In that city Sheriff Rutherford shares the jurisdiction of the Bailies in cases of the sort, and he refuses to inflict more than 5s. or 24 hours for the offence, even in the case of repeated convictions. He holds that many of the sentences passed under Police Acts would, if challenged in the Court of Session, be quashed as oppressive, and his views have influenced certain of his colleagues on the Bench. In that city, too, according to the Chief Constable, the police are instructed not to arrest women for loitering, and only to arrest them for solicitation when they persist in it after a warning given on the same night. The result is that the ratio of arrests for 'loitering or importuning' in Edinburgh in 1893 was only 13 per 10,000 against 36 in Glasgow.³ Of the 351 women arrested in 1893, 337 were convicted and dealt with by admonition, fine, or imprisonment.⁴ In 1894, 370 were committed to the prison or police cells. Their average term of imprisonment (including 33 sentences of four weeks or a month, one of 40, and another of 60 days), was 7 days.⁵ Respectable witnesses, familiar with the aspect of both cities by night, described the condition of the Edinburgh streets in point of decency as quite equal to that of Glasgow. In Dundee, where the law on the subject is the same as that under the Burgh Police Act, the ratio of arrests for 'loitering and importuning' to population is 20 per 10,000; the number of women taken up on the charge being 335, of whom every one was in 1893 accounted for by fine or imprisonment, admonition, or forfeited pledge. In 1894, 252 women went to prison, 74 of them for a month, and the average sentence was 19 days. In point of decency the streets of Dundee did not compare so favourably with what was observed in Edinburgh and Glasgow. In Aberdeen, where the law is the same, the ratio of arrests for 'loitering and importuning' was but 10 per 10,000, or 120 in all, of which all but five were, in 1893, accounted for by fine, imprisonment, admonition, or forfeited pledges; in 1894, 100 women were sent to prison, their average sentence being $11\frac{1}{2}$ days, and the highest sentence 14 days. Notwithstanding the exceptionally small ratio of arrests, and the shortness of the sentences, the streets of Aberdeen in point of decency seem to compare favourably with those of any other Scottish city.

D Wide-Spread Desire to Reform.—Your Committee interviewed a number of these unfortunate women in gaols and refuges, and the story which they reiterated with striking uniformity was that once they were known to the police as prostitutes they 'had no chance,' but were 'run in' whenever they appeared; that it was no use pleading not guilty, as two constables were ready on oath to justify their arrest. Many of their cases were very sad, one prisoner, for example, telling us that she had taken to the streets because she was beaten by her husband for refusing to prostitute herself for his gain in a brothel kept by his mother. The sacrifices to which many of these women submit in their effort to escape from their wretched existence are convincing proof of the earnestness of their purpose. In the Magdalene asylums¹ in which so many of them find refuge, they voluntarily undergo close confinement for periods of 12 to 24 months, labouring hard at laundry or other work, and in many cases supporting the institutions in which they are immured by their toil, their monetary remuneration, postponed to the end of the term of voluntary confinement, amounting to about £3 a year, including the value of their outfit. This they do in the hope of being restored to the paths of honest labour. Of those whom we interviewed many were young, the victims of one false step or of unfortunate domestic circumstances, and when spoken to kindly they were easily moved to tears. It does seem a pity that so many girls and women should in our gaols be submitted to a treatment which appears with each committal but to render them more reckless and abandoned. In their case, according to the evidence of those most active in their reclamation, drink is not usually the primary cause of their fall, but it is resorted to in order to sustain them in their repulsive life, and, reacting, confirms them in their degradation.

INEFFICACY OF PRESENT SYSTEM OF DEALING WITH HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

One result of the diversity of the law regarding petty offences in Scotland, and B the still greater diversity in the method of police administration, is that it affords an exceptional opportunity of judging as to the comparative efficacy of a number of different systems for the repression of the class of offences with which we are called on to deal. It was therefore most significant that, with one accord, the witnesses connected with the administration of the law and police throughout Scotland testified to the utter inefficacy of any of the systems adopted to cope with the evil of the habitual offender. They told us that the short sentences of imprisonment imposed, practically only allowed prisoners time to recruit their health, impaired by previous dissipation, and sent them back to the world ready and eager for another bout. Not only so, but we received from representatives of all classes, magistrates, clergy, as well as parochial and police authorities, the strongest assurance that public opinion in Scotland was ripe for action being taken by the Legislature to inaugurate a better system of dealing with habitual offenders.

The Question of Longer Sentences.—Many witnesses advocated increased powers of C imprisonment. Now this proposal raises several questions. In the first place, would the police and the magistrates, if entrusted with extended powers, generally avail themselves of them? When your committee came to the case of towns where the punitive powers of the magistrates had been greatly extended by the provisions of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, we found that in many instances, as in that of Paisley already referred to, little or no use had been made of these new powers in the ordinary run of cases, and that they had only been taken advantage of in one or two very exceptional instances; again, Aberdeen, although like other towns empowered to adopt the provisions of the Burgh Police Act on the subject of drunkenness, has not thought proper to do so. As a matter of fact, in all but a small percentage of cases, penalties much under the maximum are inflicted, and when heavy penalties are awarded, it is generally either in consequence of some peculiar sensitiveness of local feeling (as in the case of the 30-day sentences on women for solicitation in Glasgow), or in consequence of some individual crotchet of the sentencing magistrate or some seasonal coincidence, as in the case of known offenders, who in the latter part of December are often sent to prison for a fortnight instead of the customary five or seven days, with the avowed object of withdrawing them from the temptation of the New Year's festivities. On the whole, however, the punishment meted out to petty offenders, even where they may have been repeatedly in the hands of the police, is in the vast majority of cases very much less than that authorised by law at present, and the fact that a new power of imprisonment without the option of a fine, authorised by the Burgh Police Act in the case of repeated convictions for drunkenness has, so far as your Committee could learn, during three years remained a dead letter—leaves it open to doubt whether, if heavier penalties were authorised, they would be imposed except in very rare instances.

General Adequacy of Present Sentences.—As to the deterrent effect of the present D sentences it seems clear that in the great majority of cases they are sufficient for their

A purpose. In Glasgow, for instance, in the year 1893, the number of persons arrested or cited for various petty offences was over 34,000, while the number of those who were re-arrested within the year was 4328.¹ In the case of over 29,000 the fact of their arrest and the loss of the pledge forfeited, or the disgrace of their appearance in Court and the fine or punishment to which they were subjected was apparently a sufficient caution. Of the remainder the great proportion owe their second arrest to drunken habits, and among them were about 500 men and women² who were apprehended five times or upwards during 1893, and doubtless many more who should be classed as habitual offenders in respect of previous convictions within twelve months. To deal with these habitual offenders the present system is admittedly inadequate, but for casual offenders, who constitute nearly 90 per cent. of the whole, it seems to require no strengthening.

B Do heavy Penalties repress repeated Offences?—As to the third question, whether the simple increase of penalties tends to lessen the number of habitual offenders, some most instructive figures will be found in an Appendix which continues down to date statistics as to recommitments drawn up thirty years ago, and for which we were indebted to Mr. David M'Laren³. From these it appears that of 32,017 persons committed to Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dundee prisons during the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, 10,135, or 31·6 per cent., were recommitments within the same year. While of 106,367 committed to the same prisons in the years 1891, 1892, and 1893, 33,666, or again 31·6 per cent., were recommitments within the same year. The percentage of recommitments was the same, therefore, in the two series of years, but in the former series the average imprisonment was over 30 days, while in the latter it was under 15. These figures prove that the shortening of imprisonments by one-half has not increased the number of recommitments, and would seem conversely to show that to double the present sentences would not diminish it.

³ Appendix LXIII.
—David M'Laren.

C This conclusion is emphasized by another set of statistics prepared by the Secretary to the Prison Commissioners, and given in our Appendix.⁴ These figures show that whereas in all the prisons in Scotland the percentages of recommitments within a year for the decennial periods ending 1873, 1883, and 1893, were 31, 30, and 29 respectively; the average imprisonment had in the interval progressively decreased from an average of 30½ days in the decade ending 1873, to 20½ days in that ending 1883, and 15½ days in that ending 1893. These figures are the more suggestive when it is remembered that the shorter average imprisonment in the latest decade rendered it possible for a man to be twice as often recommitted during a year as he could have been under the longer imprisonments of the first decade. We have also had testimony from a large number of experienced witnesses supporting the view that long sentences of imprisonment effect no good result.

⁴ Appendix LV.

D We may summarise our conclusions on this branch of the subject, thus :—

- (1) That penalties, much smaller than the maximum of those competent under existing laws, are sufficient in the great majority of cases to deter from repetition of the offence, and that therefore any general increase in the severity of penalties is uncalled for and to be deprecated ;
- (2) That although the number of confirmed petty offenders appears to have increased, the number of recommitments to prison has decreased coincidentally with the shortening of the average term of imprisonment.

E With reference to the first of the above conclusions we have one single exception to make. As we have said, in Counties and in one or two Burghs, 24 hours' imprisonment is the highest penalty competent for the offence of being drunk and incapable. We consider it very undesirable that any person should be sent to gaol except with a view to a substantial punishment. A 24 hours' confinement in all probability enables him to realise that his night in prison has passed more comfortably than the previous one in a police cell, and that, with a recovered appetite, prison fare is not unpalatable if somewhat frugal. In many cases, moreover, a sentence of four-and-twenty hours' imprisonment does not involve a night's detention.⁵ The Governor of Aberdeen prison, for example, told us that he received a good many prisoners on short sentences 'for 24, for 6, and for 4 hours,' and that those sentenced on Saturdays to 24 hours are sent to prison and liberated on the same evening between six and seven o'clock. This involves considerable trouble, and so little of punishment, that we think increased powers to be called for in this particular case. While believing that penalties considerably less than those contained in the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act would sufficiently meet the case—we suggest later on a modification of some of the penalties which it lays down—that Act embodies the general law on the A subject of drunkenness in Scotland, and its provisions are to a large extent identical with those of the Police Acts of the larger Burghs. To extend its provisions would therefore be a step towards the most desirable end of uniformity in the Scottish law as to petty offences, and in the counties, both magistrates and police, would, we are sure, use its powers with moderation.

We therefore recommend that those sections of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, B 1892, which relate to drunkenness (modified as afterwards explained) should be extended to the counties, and that in all cases prisoners whose sentences do not involve a night's detention should not be sent to prison but detained in police cells.

OPTION OF FINE OR IMPRISONMENT.

Before passing from the question of punishment we have to call attention to another C matter. In Scotland, in the case of petty offences, the repealed Lindsay Act and the various Local Police Acts and the Burgh Police Act which follow its drafting, prescribe in almost every case a money penalty, and that penalty, under the Scottish Summary Jurisdiction Act and the Burgh Police Act is enforceable by a scale of specified equivalent periods of imprisonment. The result is that, if the prisoner has the money, he, and not the magistrate, exercises the option as to whether he shall go to prison. There are certain exceptions to this rule, as in vagrancy and begging, punishable under the Burgh Police Act by 30 days', and if repeated by 60 days' imprisonment without option; the case of persons thrice previously convicted of being drunk and incapable within twelve months, whom under the same Act a magistrate may sentence to imprisonment for 14 days without the option of a fine, persons six times previously convicted as drunk and incapable, whom under the Greenock Police Act the magistrate may sentence to 60 days' imprisonment, or importuners, who in Edinburgh may be sent to prison for the same term, without the option of a fine. Such provisions, however, are exceptional, and in the majority of cases the magistrate has no authority in dealing with police offences to impose imprisonment without the option of a fine. This, we think, is wrong in principle. It enables the rich offender to get off without imprisonment, however frequent his offence, while his poorer fellow, it may be convicted for the only time in his life, has to go to prison. This inequality we propose to remedy by allowing the magistrate, in dealing with cases aggravated by previous convictions, to impose imprisonment without the option of a fine.

Imprisonment in Default of Fine.—But there remains another anomaly. In our D Appendix will be found details of the sentences imposed on 461 prisoners admitted to Glasgow and Barlinnie Prisons during the week ending March 25th, 1895, and the money in their possession when admitted.¹ Among the females we find one, with a sentence of 15s. or 14 days, who had 8s. in her possession; another, sentenced to 10s. 6d. or 7 days, who had 4s. 5d.; a third to 7s. 6d. or 5 days, who had 2s. 6d., and so on. Among the males was one sentenced to 40s. or 14 days, who had 18s. 11½d.; another sentenced to 42s. or 30 days who had 10s. 8½d.; a third to 21s. or 14 days who had 10s. 3½d., and so on. Some of these prisoners, or their friends, by pawning their effects or borrowing money, may have raised the amount of the fine and obtained their release, but unless that is effected within the first day or two after committal it is almost never done; so much so that the Governor of Greenock Prison informed us that within a year he could only recall one case where it had occurred—that, namely, of a woman committed for 30 days, in default of payment of a fine of 40s., whose husband died during her imprisonment, and his life being insured, her friends borrowed the 40s. on the security of the funeral benefit, and paying the fine, after she had been locked up for 21 days, set her free to attend the funeral. Had that woman, when convicted, possessed 40s. she would not have gone to prison at all, and would possibly have experienced a more improving and reforming influence in ministering to the wants of her dying husband. But being moneyless at the time of her conviction, she had ultimately to expiate her offence by payment of the full fine imposed and three weeks' imprisonment into the bargain. Now the law, in imposing a fine as the penalty for an offence, and prescribing imprisonment only in default of payment, evidently meant to mitigate and not to aggravate the punishment, for it authorises magistrates to give time for the payment of the fine, to require securities for it, or to order its payment by instalments. Owing either to some defect of machinery in the Act which confers this power, or to intentional or unintentional disregard of its provisions, so

A far as Police Courts in Scotland are concerned it is practically a dead letter. The result is that a considerable number of prisoners are sent to prison only to be liberated after a few hours' detention on payment of the fine, and a large number of others, who cannot scrape together its full amount, are kept in prison at the public expense for the full term of the alternative sentence. In order to inform ourselves as to the proportion or prisoners incarcerated in default of payment of fines, we had a return compiled showing the actual numbers of them in the various Scottish prisons at midnight on March 28th, 1895.¹ The result showed that they numbered 678 out of a total of 1951 prisoners, and that they constituted 24 per cent. of the male, 62 per cent. of the female, and close on 35 per cent. of the total prison population.

B Fines Paid after Admission to Prison.—As we have said, in a few cases fines are made up and paid within the first day or two of the prisoners' committal. These, in the case of Police Court fines, are handed over to the Local Police Authorities, and in that of Sheriff Court fines, are accounted for to the Treasury. Police Court fines amount to by far the larger portion, and Sheriff Court fines so paid constitute so small an amount, that for the sake of simplifying the reform which we are about to propose, we suggest that both should be dealt with in the same manner, and that instead of being surrendered to the local Police Authorities or the Treasury, as the case may be, all fines paid after a prisoner's admission to prison should be paid to the Governor of the Prison, to be by him accounted for as we shall hereafter explain. The result of this would be to prompt local magistrates to avail themselves of powers which they possess to recover fines without committing the prisoners on whom they have been imposed, and to discourage the practice which very generally prevails of sending men and women to prison without allowing them reasonable opportunity to raise money.

C Combination of Fine and Imprisonment.—We further propose that prisoners committed in default of payment of a fine should be permitted to work out their sentences by a combination of fine and imprisonment, and that it should not be necessary for them, having worked out half their term of imprisonment, to remain in prison for the full term unless they pay the entire fine, but that they should be liberated on any day of their imprisonment on payment to the Governor of such proportion of their fines as the term of imprisonment still to be undergone bears to the entire sentence. We are informed that this system was at one time prevalent in Scotland, but that it was given up because it was found to be illegal, but so far as the Committee is concerned, it is but fair to give the entire credit of the suggestion to Mr Napier, Governor of Greenock Prison, in whose letters in our Appendix will be found a detailed description of the manner in which his proposal could be best worked out. The fines recovered, and which are at present altogether lost, would, for administrative reasons pointed out by Mr Napier, be paid to the Governors of Prisons, and we propose that they, together with all full fines paid to them, should be accounted for as hereafter explained.

D The Greenock Experiment.—In order practically to test the effects of Mr Napier's suggestion, your Committee placed £5 at his disposal to be applied in paying the balance of fines in cases where prisoners could raise a part but not the whole. Mr Napier received the £5, and instructions to apply it in illustration of his scheme, on March 20th, 1895. On March 25th he sent in his report, which will be found in the Appendix.² W. J. C., a case of assault, committed for 5 days in default of payment of 7s. 6d., had, after 3 days in prison, succeeded in raising 3s., and the balance of 4s. 6d. being provided out of the fund, he was liberated and 2 days of his imprisonment saved. J. S., a case of assault, committed for 10 days in default of payment of a fine of 20s., after 5 days' imprisonment raised 10s., and the balance being paid out of the fund, 5 days' imprisonment was remitted. E. M., another case of assault, committed for 20 days in default of payment of a fine of 40s., after 5 days' imprisonment raised 30s., and the balance being paid out of the fund, got 15 days remitted. At a cost, therefore, of 24s. 6d. to the fund, 43s. was collected in the shape of fines paid, which would never otherwise have been got, and the State was saved 22 days' maintenance of a prisoner in jail. During the 5 days that this experiment was being carried on, 42 prisoners were confined in Greenock Prison in default of payments of fines. Mr Napier thought it would be waste of money to continue the experiment, as, to secure it full justice, it would be requisite that the system should be generally known; but he expressed his belief that if it were known that less than the fine imposed would be accepted, 'a large number of prisoners, probably a half, would take advantage of it.' Even at the rate shown by the actual results of the experiment, the saving in Greenock Prison was at the annual rate of 1606 days' (or 4·4 years') maintenance of a single prisoner, or at the rate of 4·4 prisoners for one year. A Greenock Prison, however, contains only $\frac{1}{10}$ th of the total prison population of Scotland, and assuming the actual results of the Greenock experiment to apply to the entire prison population, the adoption of our recommendation as to allowing persons committed to prison in default of payment of fines to work out their sentences by a combination of imprisonment and fine, would result in a saving to the State of the cost of the permanent maintenance of 118·8 prisoners, and the collection of over £4,200 per annum of fines at present not recovered; and for the reasons stated by Mr Napier, we consider that this estimate is much under what the actual figures would prove when the system was once fairly at work and generally understood.

This concludes what we have to say on another branch of the subject, as to which B our recommendations are:—

- (1.) That in all cases of drunkenness, disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, petty assault, vagrancy, begging, or solicitation, aggravated by previous convictions, where not already punishable by imprisonment, police magistrates should be empowered to inflict imprisonment without the option of a fine, such imprisonment, however, in no case to exceed that prescribed by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act (amended as hereafter proposed), for the particular offence, or the equivalent term of imprisonment in default of payment prescribed in that Act as the alternative of a fine in offences for which a pecuniary penalty only is at present enacted.
- (2.) That the Burgh Police Act should be amended by enacting that no police magistrate should in the case of the offences just specified, notwithstanding anything contained in the table of equivalent fines and imprisonments in that Act or in the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, be authorised to impose a maximum term of imprisonment exceeding 14 days whether with or without the option of a fine;
- (3.) That in all cases in which a prisoner is committed to prison in default of the payment of a fine, the prisoner should be released at any period of his detention, not solely on payment of the whole fine imposed as at present, but on the payment of such proportion of that fine as the number of days' imprisonment still to be undergone bears to the entire sentence of imprisonment in default of payment;
- (4.) That all fines paid by prisoners after their admission to prison should be paid to the Governor of the Prison, and by him remitted to the Secretary for Scotland as the administrator of a special fund, supported by such payments, and to be appropriated to uses hereafter described;
- (5.) That in all cases of persons brought before Sheriffs charged with being habitual offenders, where the offence charged is by statute punishable by fine, and only by imprisonment in default of payment according to the scale laid down by the Summary Jurisdiction or other Act, the Sheriff should be empowered at his discretion to impose imprisonment not exceeding that which would have been competent had the fine not been paid.

The effect of these amendments of the law would be—

(a.) To enable police magistrates to inflict short sentences, and Sheriffs full sentences, of imprisonment, in cases where they thought imprisonment deserved;

(b.) To do away with the invidious anomaly under which inveterate offenders possessed of money or monied friends, meriting in the opinion of the judge 30 days' imprisonment, can go free on payment of 40s., while the casual but moneyless offender, whose friends may have to starve themselves in order to raise a 7s. 6d. fine, may have to undergo 4 or 5 days' imprisonment, in addition to the payment of the whole fine imposed while they are scraping together its amount; and

(c.) To prevent the possibility, except on the responsibility of a trained Sheriff, of such excessive sentences as 60 days for begging or vagrancy or repeated drunkenness; or 30, 40, or 60 days for importuning, hurriedly proved by the uncorroborated evidence of two police witnesses, who in hardly any case have other than visual evidence to rely on. These long sentences may be necessary now when there is no other means of dealing with habitual offenders, but if, as we shall propose, three successive commitments to prison within twelve months sufficed to bring habitual offender before a Sheriff armed with the full powers, there would no longer be any reason or excuse for them.

C

BASIS OF A DEFINITION OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

A Before attempting to formulate any scheme for dealing with habitual offenders, we have first to determine the basis on which any definition of an habitual offender should be founded. If we go on that of a certain number of convictions, we are at once brought face to face with the great diversity of practice in different parts of Scotland—(1) as to records of previous convictions, and (2) as to liberation on deposit of a 'pledge.'

B Proving Previous Convictions.—The diversity of practice as to records of previous convictions has arisen within the last few years. Under Lord Kingsburgh's Act, Sec. 67, in case of jury trials it was enacted that the system which has long prevailed in England should be extended to Scotland, and that, in cases aggravated by previous conviction, evidence on that point should be withheld until after the jury had found the prisoner guilty, when it should be given only for the purpose of guiding the judge as to the sentence to be pronounced. The 71st section of the Act which extends the same principle to police-court cases is somewhat obscure, and the result is that the public prosecutors in some towns, as in Glasgow for example, use every precaution to prevent the fact of previous convictions being brought before the magistrate until the prisoner has been found guilty, while in others, as in Edinburgh, the police as systematically prove previous convictions as part of their case. Mr Dewar, the Chief Constable of Dundee, who appears to have looked into the law of the subject very closely, handed in some weighty opinions,¹ from which it would seem that in point of law there is something to be said in favour of the Edinburgh system. From a practical point of view too it is doubtful whether it is possible in some cases to withhold from the presiding magistrate a knowledge of previous convictions. The point, however, should be decided one way or the other—if necessary by legislation—as it is obviously too important, and bears too directly on the rights of the subject, to be safely left to the determination of the police authorities in each locality. We must add that it seems to us most desirable that, if previous convictions are to be used for the purpose of aggravating the punishment, they ought, at the proper stage of the case, to be regularly proved. There is an extensively entertained doubt, which should be removed by legislation is necessary, whether this can be done; and magistrates and police are often found trusting to their recollections and impressions on the point,—which undoubtedly seems to us to be an objectionable practice.

LXXXVIII.

C Diversity of Practice as to Pledges.—As has been already mentioned, a very large number of persons arrested for petty offences are in every part of the country liberated on pledge. But in some places, as in the City of Edinburgh, in Fifeshire and elsewhere, it is held that this pledge is simply bail, that the prisoner is bound to appear for trial, and that if he fails to do so his pledge should be forfeited in consequence of his non-appearance, and proceedings taken to bring him before the magistrate for trial for his offence. In the majority of towns, on the other hand—in Glasgow, Dundee, and Paisley for example—a pledge is exacted which the Inspector in charge at the police office considers would cover the probable fine that would be inflicted in each case. No inconvenient questions are asked, and, when the case is called, forfeiture of the pledge takes the place of the fine, and the offence is considered to have been purged. So well understood is the system that we were told of frequent offenders whose practice was to be present in Court if they thought there was any chance of getting off with a smaller fine than the amount of their pledge, and to answer to their names or not according as the sentences which they saw given in similar cases convinced them of the hopefulness or the futility of recovering half-a-crown from the deposit they had left with the police.

D Although the theory of the system pursued in Edinburgh is evidently the correct one, we had no complaints regarding the opposite practice elsewhere, and we may take it that in a rough and ready manner it suits the local circumstances and requirements.

E It is quite obvious, however, that any definition of habitual offenders based on the number of convictions would work very unequally in two places—in one of which every offence is followed up and noted, while in the other a prisoner can four times out of five escape any record of his offence by giving a false name or address and forfeiting his pledge. It is clear, therefore, that it would be very difficult to formulate any equitable scheme for dealing with habitual offenders based solely on convictions, the record of which is often most imperfect, and which, when correctly recorded, may be hidden away in the archives of different police authorities. What in practice seems to us to be required is a plan which will deal with those inveterate offenders for whose case the A penalties at present in use are found to be of no avail. In Scotland, under the various Police Acts in force, the penalties prescribed for drunkenness, disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, and importuning—offences which make up the great majority of those with which we have to deal—are fines, with imprisonment only in default of payment. As a matter of fact, however, the finances of habitual offenders generally soon fall into such a state that the greater number of them have to go to prison. Thus, in Scotland in 1893, about 1068 persons were apprehended five times and upwards within the year,¹ and 669 were imprisoned five times and upwards within the year, while the number of those imprisoned four times and upwards within the year² was 1083, or almost the same as that of persons apprehended five times and upwards. The prison records are not absolutely accurate,³ but they are the most accurate we possess, and might easily be made more so. By taking the number of imprisonments as our basis we should, if allowing a certain number of habitual offenders to escape, at least make certain of dealing with those who at present are the most troublesome to the police authorities, and whose maintenance in prison most heavily taxes the national exchequer. The 1083 persons imprisoned four times or more during 1893 comprised 238 men and 845 women, and accounted for 6569 commitments, or close on 13 per cent. of the total commitments for the year. In the case of these Habituals, and especially in the case of the women, the universal testimony is that the repeated imprisonments do them no good. Many of them when not in prison are to be found in the poorhouse, and when out of prison they occasion a great amount of trouble to the police, and are a source of serious moral contamination to those with whom they come in contact.⁴ If, then, some scheme could be devised by which they could be dealt with, and by which they could effectively be kept out of mischief, and educated in habits of industry and self-control, a very important object would be gained.

³ Boyd's Reports, quoted by M'Laren.

Adult Reformatories.—The suggestions of many witnesses, the example of our B own Reformatory and Industrial School system, and the experience of various foreign countries, and notably the United States, suggest the establishment of institutions to which habitual offenders might be sent on their discharge from prison, and where their treatment, extending over a considerable period, would be purely reformatory, its object being to train them in such a manner as to enable and encourage them, when sent forth into the world, to fall back into the ranks of honest workers.

Prisoner-Paupers.—Any plan for such a purpose to have a reasonable prospect C of success must be framed with a careful regard to the classes of persons with whom it is proposed to deal. There is, for example, a large class which seems to oscillate between the prison and the poorhouse. In Scotland it need hardly be said the law does not entitle the able-bodied to relief, but a large number of habitual offenders are not able-bodied, and of those who are another large proportion know that by feigning obscure symptoms and alleging illness they can compel the medical officer of the parish either to certify them as fit subjects for temporary relief, or to undertake a very grave responsibility in case of real illness assuming a serious character.

With a view of forming an estimate of the number of habitual offenders who D fluctuate between prisons and poorhouses, your Committee have procured returns⁴ showing the number of men and women in the ten largest prisons in Scotland, on 17th September 1894 and on 15th January 1895, recognised by Poor Law Officers as ex-inmates of the poorhouses to which they were attached, and showing also the number of inmates of fourteen poorhouses on the same dates, recognised by prison officials as ex-prisoners. The result was to disclose in the prisons on the first occasion 212, or 9 per cent. of ex-paupers out of a population of 2341; and on the second 164, or 8·8 per cent. out of 1861; in the poorhouses on the first occasion 279, or 5·1 per cent. ex-prisoners out of a population of 5431; and on the second 568, or 8·7 per cent. out of 6833. As the prison officials only visited the poorhouses in their own towns and the Poor Law Officers the local prison, it was only in cases where the district of poorhouse and prison happened to coincide that recognition could be effected, and the figures obtained so far understate the extent of give-and-take which occurs between prisons and poorhouses

⁴ Appendix XIX.

* In Edinburgh prison, for example, we found a female prisoner who, we were told, had been twenty or thirty times in prison. Dr. Sutherland, a member of our Committee, and medical officer to Glasgow prison, recollected her as having been nearly a hundred times in that prison, and on being interrogated the prisoner admitted that it was so. The Edinburgh prison authorities did not know anything of the previous Glasgow record.

A in this class of inmate. In a large number of cases their history is that they go into the poorhouses for a short time, get tired of its monotony, leave it, beg, get drunk, and are sent to prison, on their discharge from which they repeat the same round of life.

B Weak-minded Habitual Offenders.—Another class who bulk largely among habitual offenders is that of weak-minded persons. Thus, in Greenock prison there was, and probably is imprisoned, a woman of over seventy, who, when she leaves the poorhouse, which she regards as a pleasanter abode than prison, proceeds to steal in the most open fashion, and so strong is her propensity that even when in gaol if an opportunity occurs she will appropriate her fellow-prisoners' oakum or knitting. At first she was constantly under punishment, but for long her mental weakness has been recognised, and her offences against prison discipline are, as far as possible, overlooked. Again, in Edinburgh, we met a man who had borne an excellent character as a soldier, but who had had a sunstroke, and since his discharge had taken to swindling lodging-house keepers. Whenever he left prison he took lodgings, lived in them as long as he was permitted, and then changed his quarters until again arrested and imprisoned. He could not work, he said, as he had a mission to watch over the conduct of persons frequenting public parks, and as that brought in no income he could not pay his landladies. Another case of the sort was that of a woman whom we found in Edinburgh prison awaiting trial, but who had been several times previously in prison, and when out of it had been twice in a lunatic asylum.

PROPOSED TREATMENT OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

C Instruction as to Financial Considerations.—In your remit to us we are directed in any remedies we may suggest to have due regard to their cost, as well as to the practicability of their being carried into effect. This instruction we have kept steadily before us, and we feel that it would be useless to propose any scheme involving a large initial expenditure on brick and mortar, or to recommend what, after all, must be regarded as an experiment and judged by results, on the extended scale which would be requisite to afford it the fullest prospects of success. A person who having been twice in prison within twelve months is arrested for a third offence within that period may fairly be regarded as affording prima facie evidence that he ought, if again convicted, to have his case looked into with a view to his being dealt with as an habitual offender; but the number of persons in Scotland who were imprisoned twice or oftener during 1893 amounted to many thousands. With each extra commitment during the year the number falls rapidly, being for persons committed four times and over 1083, and for those committed six times and over 419. Now, as the 419 are responsible for 3744 commitments, or 7 per cent. of the whole, and the 1083 for 6569 commitments, or 13 per cent. of the whole, it would clearly be a very great public gain to deal with even the smaller category of cases; but it is equally clear that they would, from a reformatory standpoint, present a very hopeless material to work upon as compared with the thousands committed twice or thrice during the year.

D Proposals for Definition and Treatment.—In seeking for a manageable number, we would suggest that it might be found in those who, having been imprisoned three times within twelve months, are again within that period brought before a magistrate. What we propose is

That this class of prisoners should no longer be dealt with summarily by the police magistrate, but should be remitted to the Sheriff, whose duty it would be to try them for the offence charged, and also to determine whether or not they should be classed as habitual offenders. In respect of the offence itself, we propose to retain existing penalties, but recommend that the Sheriff should in all cases be empowered to inflict imprisonment without the option of a fine. If he considered the evidence as proving that the prisoner is an habitual offender, he should be authorised to add that finding, and to order his name to be recorded in a Register of Habitual Offenders where it should remain for say thirty months, and to warn the prisoner of the effect of this addition to his sentence, which would, if our recommendation were adopted, be this—that if at any time while his name remained on the Register he was again charged with an offence, he would again be dealt with by a Sheriff, the option of a fine in this case being abolished, and that in addition to his sentence the Sheriff should have power to order on discharge from prison his detention in an adult reformatory for a period of not less than twelve and not more than thirty months.

Further, we propose that in the case of registered habitual offenders apparently of weak A intellect, or not able-bodied, or whom the Sheriff might deem better suited for reception and detention in a poorhouse, the Sheriff should have power, either directly, or on the expiration of any sentence of imprisonment which he might impose, to order their reception and detention in a poorhouse, subject to the same conditions as if they were ordered to be received and detained in a reformatory.

And that in all cases the Sheriff should have power, instead of committing an habitual B offender, to release him after passing sentence, on his entering into a recognizance, with or without securities, and during such period within the thirty months as he may direct, to appear and submit to the sentence pronounced when called upon.

Object of the Recommendation.—Before explaining the details of our proposal we C wish to make perfectly clear its object. As we have shown, in Scotland lengthy sentences of imprisonment have not been found more efficacious in preventing re-commitments to prison than shorter ones, and we agree with the Lord Advocate that ‘while short sentences may not be so punitive . . . they do not bring about the listlessness, helplessness, deprivation of energy and capacity for earning a living, which so often result from long sentences.’¹ We therefore deprecate lengthy imprisonments for petty offences. The tendency of the time is in favour of shorter sentences. Within the last 30 years the average term of imprisonment has progressively decreased by about a half, and it would be still less than it is were it not for the heavy sentences pronounced on repeated offenders whom magistrates, in default of other remedies, often send to prison for the maximum term. In many cases these long sentences are a matter of local accident. In Glasgow,² 778 women were in 1894 sentenced to 30 days each for loitering and importuning; and the average sentence in 1831 of such cases sent to prison was 21½ days. Had they been convicted on the same charge in Edinburgh, they would have got off with an average of 7 days. It serves no public interest to crowd our gaols with prisoners who, with every re-admission, and with every day’s imprisonment, become more callous to their punishment. The one object which these heavy sentences achieve is temporarily to clear the streets of a demoralising and troublesome element of the population. But this we propose to deal with much more effectively in another manner, and, that having been done, we are of opinion that the power of inflicting such heavy sentences as we have quoted should be confined to Sheriffs, and that the maximum penalties laid down in the Burgh Police Act as competent to be inflicted by police magistrates in the case of begging (60 days), drunkenness (30 days), and importuning (30 days), might with advantage be greatly reduced, and we have already recommended an amendment of that Act to that effect.

In every town we were told that there are 50, or 100, or 500 persons who are respons- D ible for a very large proportion of the offences and disorder that prevailed, and that, if we could effectively grapple with these, the police force might be materially reduced. It is with this class that our recommendation is designed to grapple. In order to restrict the experiment to persistent and troublesome offenders, we have based our selection, not on the number of convictions, a correct record of which it would be often impossible to obtain, but of imprisonments which can be easily verified. To prevent injustice being done by the inclusion of persons of whose spontaneous reform there are reasonable hopes, we propose that the Sheriff shall decide whether or not a prisoner brought before him is an habitual offender, and that he may, if he thinks fit, liberate him on recognizances to come up for punishment when ordered. In the case of persons pronounced to be habitual offenders, there is, as we shall show, good reason to hope that a considerable number would be pulled up by the warning; and in every case we propose to allow the Sheriff a wide discretion in dealing with them, such as would enable him to select the most merciful and most hopeful method of securing society against further offences at the hands of those with whom he deals.

We propose that the particular offence with which the habitual offender is charged E should be punished with imprisonment before his committal to a Reformatory in order that the punitive part of his sentence should be absolutely distinct from the reformatory, the object of which would be to dissever the inmate as far as possible from every association suggestive of crime.

A 'Labour Settlements.'—To assist this object, we recommend

That the institutions for the reception of habitual offenders should not be designated Reformatories but Labour Settlements; that in those Settlements the inmates should be put to such labour as they are capable of; that so far as practicable such labour should be in the open air; that in selecting the labour care should be taken to employ the inmates at such remunerative work as would give them the best prospect of employment after liberation; and that every effort should be made to encourage the co-operation of charitable and temperance associations and selected visitors in the moral improvement of the inmates, both during their detention and after their liberation.

B These Labour Settlements we propose to place under the control of the Secretary for Scotland, who should have power to frame rules for inmates and officers (any infraction of which should constitute a statutory offence), to liberate inmates unconditionally or conditionally, or to send them out on licence to approved institutions or persons in the same manner as is at present done with the inmates of juvenile Reformatories.

C Licensing out.—This last suggestion we regard as a most essential one; and it is in view of the probability of its being largely made use of that we have ventured to recommend that the period of commitment to a Labour Settlement should be for so long a period as 30 months. In average cases it might be quite safe to allow an inmate to depart much sooner, but it would strongly tend to assist him in resisting any tendency towards relapse if he knew that he was under control, and could be sent back to work in a Labour Settlement on the occurrence of the smallest irregularity. In the case of women of the prostitute class, too, it would enable the machinery of Magdalene Asylums to be utilised, and a large number of cases to be dealt with by private institutions which at the present moment, without any compulsory or other powers, effect a vast amount of solid reclamation work. We believe that a number of this class of women sent to such Asylums on licence from Labour Settlements would prove amenable to their good influences, and would be permanently reclaimed.

D Enforcement of Discipline.—In Labour Settlements the means of maintaining discipline would require to be effective. The machinery which we propose is similar to that laid down in the Inebriates Acts, under which the Home Secretary is empowered to make rules, any infraction of which constitutes an offence rendering the offender liable to penalties prescribed by those Acts. Under such rules the officer in charge might, as in the case of prisons, be authorised to inflict minor penalties; while, as in the case of prisons, punishments for more serious offences would be meted out by order of visiting Magistrates. On the other hand, inducements to work, such as allowances of tea and tobacco, gratuities on liberation, and remission of period of detention, should be freely offered.

E Selection of Labour.—As to the sort of labour in which inmates might be engaged, we have already laid down the general principles which, in our opinion, should guide its selection. It is of the utmost importance that it should as far as possible be selected with a view to the class of work for which each inmate had an aptitude. We have no wish to suggest that a labourer who through his bad conduct found himself an inmate, should, at the expense of the country, be taught a trade which on his liberation would place him at an advantage over his well-behaved fellow; but the man who had learned a trade, even imperfectly, would evidently be able to contribute more towards his maintenance by working at it during his detention, and would also have a better chance of earning a living when dismissed, if perfected in that trade, than if employed on unskilled work. We should therefore hope to find, as in Wakefield prison¹ which we visited, ^{1 Appendix LXXXIV.} workshops where skilled labour of various sorts would be employed for the good of the community, and any surplus production of which could be appropriated for use in Government institutions. Unskilled labour is already utilised in a number of our Scottish prisons, notably at Barlinnie, and opportunity for its employment would, of course, require to be an important factor in the selection of the site of a Labour Settlement. In all cases, what should be aimed at is real and useful hard work, and all such punitive and unremunerative employments as picking oakum should be excluded.

F Employment for Women.—Women constitute a majority of over two-thirds of habitual offenders, and although your Committee have on every opportunity sought suggestions as to suitable employment for them, the result has not been very encouraging, as most of the remunerative manual employments in which women are engaged are A branches of industries in which men are also employed, and could not be suitably carried on in Homes intended for women only. In prisons, sewing, knitting, cleaning, washing and cooking, make up the principal useful work to which female prisoners can be put; while in Magdalene Asylums the almost invariable industry in which they are employed is washing. In addition to these, fruit market and poultry farming have been suggested as likely to afford a useful and healthy employment, and where land was available occupation for a number of them could be found on that. An interesting memorandum on that subject by Professor Wright will be found in our Appendix.¹ A large number of female habitual offenders have been employed in mills; and as a profitable means of utilising their labour and fitting them when discharged to earn their living, we would suggest the establishment of a small factory where blankets, sheeting and cloth for use in Labour Settlements and other Government Institutions could be manufactured. Such a factory exists in Wakefield prison, but those employed in it are males. In our opinion, such work would be admirably suited for females who have commenced life as mill-workers. In the Salvation Army Refuges a number of women are employed in binding Bibles and Prayer-Books for the Salvation Army, and as a great many books are used in prisons, there would seem to be an opening for similar employment in Female Labour Settlements. As to laundry work and domestic service, we should expect that a large number of female settlers would, under judicious regulations, find their way into these occupations through transfers under licence to the various asylums which at present deal with women of very much the same class.

Susceptibility of Women to Reformatory Treatment.—Although women seem B to lose their self-respect and become utterly reckless more readily than men, it is encouraging in dealing with them to know that they are, in the vast majority of cases, more easily governed, in their better mood more earnestly desirous of restoration to an honest life, and more susceptible to humanising influences. We arrived at this opinion after interviews with many female inmates of Magdalene and inebriate institutions—interviews at which no official or fellow-inmate was allowed to be present, in which the frankest statement of opinion was invited, and in most of which the women interviewed appeared genuinely grateful for the assistance they were receiving for the purpose of enabling them to abandon their former life. But one illustration, which by itself proves the remarkable aptitude for reclamation possessed by women is afforded by the fact, to which we shall have to recur later on,² that in Scotland the percentage of female prisoners who have been inmates of Reformatories to the total persons living who have been discharged from these institutions since their commencement, is nearly $3\frac{1}{2}$ times less than the analogous percentage in the case of males.

² See Table, p. xxxiv.

That hopeful material to work on is to be found even in apparently the most C abandoned was shown by the case of a woman, who, with her husband, was described to us by the Inspector of St Cuthbert's Parish³ as a typical pest, oscillating between prison and poorhouse, and causing a great amount of trouble. That woman we afterwards came across in Edinburgh prison, and Canon Donlevy, the chaplain who visited her, assured us that on one occasion he procured a situation for her at a farm in the country, that she remained there six months working steadily and well, and that she owed her relapse to a pardonable desire to revisit her husband, whom she found in Edinburgh, and with him she returned to her old mode of life. So convinced was Canon Donlevy that there was at bottom something good in the woman, that he expressed the intention of endeavouring to find another suitable place for her on her discharge.

Liberation on Licence.—Our proposal to send out settlers on licence to approved D persons is an adaptation of a system adopted in connection with juvenile Reformatories, where young men and women are in a large number of cases licensed out to approved employers before the expiration of their term, with a view of gradually accustoming them to their freedom; and it is analogous to the system under which criminal lunatics detained during Her Majesty's pleasure are on their recovery allowed their freedom, on some approved person undertaking their charge and the duty of reporting their conduct to the authorities from time to time. In dealing with Labour Settlers, such a provision would not only be suitable for cases like that of the protégée of Canon Donlevy, to whom we have just referred, but it would enable well-conducted settlers to be utilised for public works, such as the building of fishing harbours, the reclamation or planting of waste land, &c., under the charge of an approved person, who might be a trustworthy warder or retired petty officer accustomed to responsibility and control.

COMMITTAL TO POORHOUSES.

A It will have been observed that in the case of habitual offenders apparently of weak intellect or not able-bodied, or whom the Sheriff may deem better suited for reception and detention in a poorhouse, we recommend that the Sheriff should have power, either directly or on the expiration of any sentence of imprisonment which he might impose, to order their reception and detention in a poorhouse, subject to the same conditions as if they were ordered to be confined in a Labour Settlement. The object of this is to enable that class of cases to be dealt with who are unfit for the discipline of Labour Settlements, or who have passed an age at which there is reasonable hope of their conversion into useful citizens. Had your Committee not been instructed to have a strict regard to financial considerations, they would probably have suggested special institutions for dealing with this class, but any financial margin that can be looked for is so small compared with the demands which might, were it larger, with advantage be made upon it, that we believe that in suggesting the use of the poorhouse for this class of cases we have made the only practicable suggestion open to us. Two objections may be urged against our proposal: (1) That the inmates of Scottish poorhouses consist in large number of decent poor, whom it would be unfair to associate with habitual offenders; and (2) That it would be unfair to the parish ratepayers to cast upon them the burden of maintaining habitual offenders.

B Question of Fairness to Decent Paupers.—As we have already mentioned, on September 17th, 1894, fourteen, and again on January 15th, 1895, sixteen of the largest poorhouses in Scotland were visited by officers from prisons in their vicinity, who took a note of the ex-prisoners whom they recognised among the inmates. The number recognised was, of course, below the actual number; for an Edinburgh, Dundee, or Aberdeen prisoner, however well known, lodging in a Glasgow poorhouse, would pass unnoted, and vice versa. But the result on the last occasion was that 8·7 of the total population were recognised as having been in jail, and the average of the two visits showed 6·9 per cent. of ex-prisoners among the inmates. Among them were, doubtless, many of the very worst type of habitual offender, men and women who had been scores and even hundreds of times in both prison and poorhouse, of whom one Inspector of Poor after another gave us lists of instances. Any evil which might result from the introduction of the habitual offender into our poorhouses therefore already exists. It may, however, be neutralised, and is, we believe, largely avoided, by a proper classification of the inmates. Habitual offenders would, of course, at first be classified apart, and would, where admitted at all among the ordinary inmates, be only so admitted on good behaviour. They would be all the while under a sterner set of rules—which we suggest should be drawn up by the Local Government Board, with the approval of the Secretary for Scotland, and which, when so approved, should have the same statutory force as in the case of Labour Settlements—and they would, if at all turbulent or troublesome, be at once relegated to the stricter discipline of the probationary class. As a matter of fact, however, when deprived of drink, habitual offenders are readily amenable to discipline. Of 568 ex-prisoners found in the sixteen poorhouses¹ on 15th January² referred to, whose conduct is reported on, we find that it was 'good' in 464 cases, or nearly 81 per cent. of the whole, and 'fair' in 71 more, or nearly another 12 per cent., leaving only 33 cases, or 5·8 per cent. of 'bad,' 'indifferent,' 'troublesome,' or 'discontented' cases, of whom only one is returned as 'very bad.'

C The true principle of Law as to Decent Paupers.—The real answer to this objection, however, is to be found in the evidence of Mr Malcolm M'Neill,³ who spoke⁴ as representing the Scottish Local Government Board, of which he is one of the ablest and most experienced officials. The poor law of Scotland, he told us, is not one of in-door but of out-door relief. Parochial authorities do not nowadays use the poorhouse for all and sundry, but only for selected cases, as suggested by the Local Government Board, and there is a growing tendency among them to board out the respectable poor. Parochial authorities have learned and are learning the true use of the poorhouse, which paupers in Scotland have always shown the greatest reluctance to enter, and which should be utilised not for the purpose of starving out respectable and deserving cases, but as a test in the case of the dissolute and lazy. In other words, the aged respectable poor, under the principle of the Scottish poor law, if the system were administered in accordance with the Local Government Board's interpretation of that principle, should be rarely met with in other departments of the poorhouse than the hospital or lunatic asylum.

² Q. 5872-3.

Question of Cost to Poor Rates.—As to any additional burden which, under A our proposal, might be thrown upon the poor rates, it must be recollected that if an additional cost were incurred through the prolonged detention in poorhouses of weak-minded, feeble, and aged habitual offenders, the rates would be relieved of the support of a large number of persons at present chargeable to them who would be dealt with in Labour Settlements. To show the effect of this system of give-and-take, we may mention that on the second occasion of our prison-and-poorhouse census, of ex-paupers recognised as having been in prisons, and ex-prisoners recognised in poorhouses, 244 were under forty years of age, against 488 who were over fifty. Moreover, the trouble and expense of dealing with the habitual-offender pauper class is so great that every Inspector of Poor whom we examined demanded further powers of detention, and Mr M'Neill, on behalf of the Local Government Board, said that such powers 'were very much required.'¹

Troublesomeness of Present System.—Under the present system the rule is that a B pauper can at any time leave a poorhouse on giving twenty-four hours' notice. In some of the larger parishes the Local Government Board have, under their powers, granted authority to extend the requisite notice to seventy-two hours in the case of paupers who within six months have been twice in the poorhouse.² The late chairman of the City Parochial Board, Glasgow, told us that in their poorhouse there were not less than thirty paupers in the habit of 'running in and out,' and he thus explained the reason for wishing for further powers of detention³:—

Q. 3757.

Q. 641, Ogilvie.

'Where a woman comes like this so often, four or five days in and out, it is a very C great hardship to our officers. The woman has first to make an application, after this she has to be interrogated, and the result of those inquiries has to be written down in a schedule; she has then to attend the medical officer in the district and be examined by him; then she attends a meeting along with the inspector and one of the members of the Board—that is what we call our relief committee; then she has to go and be admitted through the gate of the poorhouse; and when she is admitted she must undergo the changing of her own for the poorhouse clothes, undergo a bath, and go through all the necessary cleaning operations, and we have the trouble of fumigating the woman's clothes and stowing them away. We think we should not be put to that trouble for three or four days' residence.'

Q. 5875.

'We have cases,' said Mr Malcolm M'Neill,⁴ 'where 50 times a year the same thing D —clothing and so on—has to be gone over again.'

Costliness of Present System.—In Edinburgh we had some amusing evidence on E another branch of the subject. Thus, in St Cuthbert's Parish the inspector told us that there were a dozen or more people who lived between the poorhouse and the prison, and were very troublesome. Knowing the rules of the parish they generally turned up after office hours, which meant that, pending medical examination next day, they were sent under a local arrangement to the Night Asylum, where they got their supper, bed, and breakfast, and then if they chose they could go their way. If after entering the house a man chose to leave it, which he could do on giving twenty-four or seventy-two hours' notice as the case might be, the parochial authorities were by no means certain that they had got rid of their guest. If the latter chose he might and often did go on the tramp at their expense. 'Last year one man thus visited ten 'different places': Stirling, Dunfermline, Dysart (twice), Paisley, Hamilton, Old Monk-land, New Monkland (twice), and the cost of the bills will come in at the end of the 'half year—a considerable amount.'

Q. 3729.

For these travellers can claim relief in whatever parish they find themselves, and F the inspector of that parish at once advises the inspector of the pauper's parish of settlement, which must refund the relief given. Accounts are squared every six months. The only remedy possessed by the parish of settlement is to order the pauper to be sent back, but before that can be done the man is away to another parish, and runs up another bill.⁶ All this involves an immense amount of correspondence and bookkeeping, and when the wanderer, who may have got as far as Perth or Inverness, considers it time to return to Edinburgh, he allows his parish of settlement to order him back and pay his railway fare, and, if his health is not strong, the expense of an attendant to look after him. 'Although they find their way to Perth or Stirling by themselves,' continued the inspector, 'in many cases we have to be at the expense of having an attendant with them when ordered back.' Mr Greig, the inspector of the City Parish, Edinburgh, mentioned a claim of this sort, and told us how he got rid of it. One of his paupers went

Q. 3734-5.

A to Inverness last year.¹ 'I got a claim for him. He told the inspector I knew him very well, which was quite true. I said that was so, but I could not find that he had a settlement in Edinburgh, and therefore I refused to have anything to do with him. He left Inverness. He tramped further. I got another claim. I gave the same refusal, and he had to tramp all the way home, applying to five or six parishes on the journey. He came back and is in the poorhouse again. He is a very useful man in the house.'

B But even Mr Greig was not a match for a pauper expert, for Mr Ferrier of St Cuthbert's told us that 'he knew in his experience of many paupers who, having been provided with tickets to their parish of settlement, and having been seen into the train at Waverley Station by attendants, have left the train at Haymarket, and the same day applied perhaps for relief to my friend Mr Greig of the City Parish.'

C Economy of Proposed Change.—This will serve to explain the costliness of the habitual-offender in-and-out class of pauper to the parochial authorities, and enables us to understand their universal demand for further powers of detention, and to appreciate the economic soundness of the proposal of the inspector of the Glasgow Barony Parish—that certain cases of the sort should be detained in poorhouses for periods ranging from six months up to two years. It will, therefore, be seen that if our proposal in one direction would impose a slight extra charge upon the poor rates—a charge which we shall show would be equitably distributed, and would not amount to $\frac{1}{100}$ of the present expenditure—in others it would materially relieve them. In any case, the habitual offender is at present a burden on the poor rate, on the imperial exchequer, and on the local police rates, as well as a nuisance to the public. In any scheme for dealing with him, the poor rates should be made to bear a part, and we consider that under that which we suggest the parish would make a fair contribution to a work which most intimately concerns it by keeping out of mischief, without unnecessary restraint or severity, that class of habitual offenders who, from age or other causes, are unfit for severe reformatory discipline, and converting them at least from disreputable and troublesome 'in-and-out' sojourners into respectable members of the pauper community.

D Liberation on Recognisances.—Our final recommendation as to the powers of the Sheriff, viz., that he should in every case have power, instead of sentencing an habitual offender, to release him on his entering into a recognisance, with or without sureties, and during such period as may be prescribed, to appear when called upon and submit to the sentence pronounced, is intended to meet cases where, for example, parents or respectable relatives may be willing to take back girls or weak-minded lads who for a period may have got beyond their control, but who, with a suspended sentence of imprisonment and possible detention as habitual offenders hanging over their heads, might, and in many cases would, prove amenable to the influence of their friends.

E General aim of Proposal.—It will be thus seen that the proposal which we submit aims not at increasing punishments but reducing them, and that its object, based on many years' experience of a similar system in the treatment of youthful delinquents, is to safeguard society from the injury and annoyance which it at present suffers at the hands of habitual offenders, and with the minimum amount of compulsion and restraint, by industrial training and discipline, to restore as many as possible of them to the ranks of law-abiding citizens. With this object in view we have endeavoured to shape our proposal in such a manner as to avoid initial expense, and avail ourselves to the utmost of existing agencies, parochial and voluntary.

THE HOUSING OF LABOUR SETTLEMENTS.

F Coming to the question of the Housing of Labour Settlements, the most satisfactory solution would, of course, be the erection of specially designed buildings on sites specially selected for the purpose. That, however, would involve a cost which would probably prove a fatal preliminary objection, and we have therefore to fall back on existing structures which might be utilised for the purpose. These are most obviously to be found in our prisons or in our poorhouses. A number of prisons throughout the country have recently been closed. Some of these might at a small expense be adapted for labour settlers, but they have been handed over to the different Local Authorities, by whom they have already been converted to various public uses, and in many cases it would be difficult to recover them for State purposes. Besides these there is in several of the existing prisons, such as Perth, and Peterhead, so much surplus accommodation that at small expense wings, capable of accommodating several hundred persons, might be cut off from the main buildings and practically converted into A separate establishments, and at these places there is available adjoining ground belonging to the Prison Commissioners—at Perth to the extent of about four acres, and at Peterhead about 17 acres. At Peterhead there is, too, a practically unlimited field for male labour in connection with projected works, capable of being carried on without the slightest risk of contact with the convicts employed at the quarries and breakwater. These prisons being national property, no difficulty or expense would present itself in the way of their acquisition, and under our proposal a further very large diminution might be expected in the number of ordinary prisoners to be provided for in them.

On the other hand, we feel that it is most desirable that Labour Settlements should be B kept entirely distinct from prisons, and that any association, even of ideas, which should connect them in the public mind with prisons or convict establishments should be avoided.

Poorhouses available.—Another class of public property is, however, available, which C on this consideration seems greatly to be preferred. In the Appendix to our Report¹ will be found a map showing the position of 66 poorhouses in Scotland, and attached to it a table grouping together those that are contiguous, giving their accommodation and the number of vacancies in each, and showing how, by transfers of the inmates to other poorhouses in the group, 23 poorhouses, with accommodation for 2400 persons, might be made available for other purposes. All of these might not be suitable for Labour Settlements, but one advantage which they present is that, being scattered over the country, they offer a wide field for the selection of suitable localities, and their structural arrangements would require little or no modification. On the other hand, being the property of their respective parishes or combinations, they would have to be leased or purchased by the nation, and provision would require to be made for the reception of their pauper inmates elsewhere. This, however, should not be a matter of insuperable difficulty as, under the Local Government Act of last year, several important parishes have already been amalgamated with the result of consolidating their poorhouse accommodation. Besides, it must be remembered, as stated by Mr M'Neill of the Local Government Board,² that the poorhouses in Scotland are emptying because Parochial Authorities are learning their true use, and are displaying a growing tendency to board out the respectable poor. This being so, it seems to us that, in cases where it is requisite to apply the poorhouse test, arrangements could easily be made with adjoining parishes similar to those already in being in those parishes where no poorhouse exists.

Your Committee, therefore, think that every effort should be made to obtain D possession of such vacant poorhouses as may be capable of being adapted for the purpose of Labour Settlements, and that vacant prison accommodation is not to be recommended if other accommodation can be obtained.

PROBABLE NUMBER OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

Coming now to the number for which it would be necessary to provide accommo- E dation, we find, from a carefully compiled return given in our Appendix, that the number of persons who during 1894 were imprisoned in Scotland for the specific offences with which we have to deal, and who in every case had been imprisoned four times and upwards during the twelve months preceding their last conviction in 1894, was 497 males and 1290 females—in all 1787.³ This number, or say 1800, is therefore the number which we estimate would probably be brought before Sheriffs charged with petty offences aggravated by their being habitual offenders, during the first year of the operation of our proposal. Some of these the Sheriffs would acquit; others they would punish for their offences, but refuse to pronounce habitual offenders; in other cases they would probably suspend execution of sentence, on friends or charitable institutions undertaking the charge of the prisoners; and in the balance they would punish the offence, pronounce the prisoners habitual offenders, warn them of the effect of that rider to their sentence, and explain to them that if within 30 months they were again brought up on a charge, they would again be tried before a Sheriff, and that, in addition to imprisonment, they would be liable to detention for two and a half years in a Labour Settlement.

³ Appendix LXXXV.

Deterrent effect of pronouncing Persons Habitual Offenders.—The effect of F such a warning would unquestionably be to pull up a very considerable proportion, especially amongst the women. If anyone doubts this let him consider the following

A facts. Prior to 1874,¹ as we have said,² in connection with drunken, disorderly, and assault cases the custom in Glasgow was for the lieutenants, on the prisoners becoming sober, to dismiss them wholesale, and so avoid the trouble of bringing them before the Magistrates. In 1873, the last complete year during which this practice prevailed, 54,287 such cases were brought in to the Police Offices, and 29,963 discharged without pledge by the lieutenants. The Magistrates, having resolved to put an end to the system, gave instructions that no prisoner should be liberated by the lieutenants unless he left a pledge. Ten months of 1874 passed under the old system, and 22,892 prisoners were discharged by the lieutenants. But during the last two months of that year the new rule was in operation, and the result was that, during 1874, the numbers of arrests of drunken, disorderly, and assault cases fell to 49,629. 1875 was the first complete year during which the new rule was operative, and in that year the number of arrests for the same offences fell to 38,133, and, in 1876, when the new arrangement had become thoroughly understood, it dropped to 34,276 being a decrease of almost 37 per cent. on 1873. Or, to put the matter in another form, the number of arrests for those offences which, in the two complete years (1872-3) immediately preceding the adoption of the change of rule, amounted to 106,702, in the two complete years immediately succeeding its adoption (1875-6) fell to 72,400,—a reduction of 34,302, or over 32·1 per cent. This shows the deterrent effect of greater certainty of punishment upon the offender class, and though that effect would probably be less in the case of habitual offenders, it must be remembered that while what produced the reduction in Glasgow was the dread of 7s. 6d. pledge, or fine, or a week's incarceration, the habitual offender would have before him the unfamiliar and repulsive prospect of two and a half years' compulsory abstinence and steady work. Assuming, however, this warning to prove considerably less efficacious than it proved in the case of Glasgow, and that instead of pulling up between 32 and 37 per cent. of offenders as it did there, it only sufficed to pull up 25 per cent. of the 1800 charged before the Sheriff as Habitual Offenders, that would leave us with 1350 to be subsequently provided for. Of these, however, all would not require under our proposal to be provided for in Labour Settlements. At least one-third would probably, from age and bodily or mental feebleness, be unfitted for their discipline, and would be relegated under powers of compulsory detention to poorhouses, or to their friends. This would reduce the number for whom provision would have to be made in Labour Settlements at the outset to 900: a figure which, after the first few years, would be largely reduced from the fact that the individuals who constitute the class of habitual offenders would perforce be prevented from offending. It must be recollected, too, that our 900 habitual offenders would consist in round numbers of 250 men and 650 women, and that of the latter we anticipate that after a short probation it would be practicable to place a number out on licence with Magdalene Asylums and other similar institutions, so that vacancies might soon be created sufficient to meet the reduced stream of incomers after the first year or two. In any case the exceptional demands of the first period of the experiment might be cheaply met either by the erection of temporary structures in suitable situations, or by utilising the empty prison accommodation of which we have already spoken.

B Elasticity of Proposals.—But if our proposal was considered to be on too large a scale, or if in its initial stage it was anticipated that there was a likelihood of larger numbers of habitual offenders being consigned to Labour Settlements than could properly be dealt with, or if it were desired to proceed tentatively with the experiment, this could easily be effected in the following manner:—

C We have proposed that the liability of a prisoner to be registered as an habitual offender should be constituted by the fact of three imprisonments followed by a conviction by a Sheriff within a given period. The period which we have selected has been twelve months, and on that we have based all calculations. But nothing could be easier in any legislation on the subject than to introduce a provision cutting down that period to eight months, or even six, during the first five years of the operation of the new system, and empowering the Secretary for Scotland by Order in Council from time to time during the currency of those five years to extend the prescribed period up to twelve months gradually and as the capabilities of the system were developed. If, on the other hand, the success of the system turned out such as to render admissible its extension beyond the limit proposed by us, the Secretary for Scotland might be empowered, say after it had been ten years at work and its financial and reformatory efficacy had been proved, to extend the prescribed period from time to time to fifteen or sixteen months, by an order to be laid on the table of both Houses, and to become law, as in the case of the Education A Codes, unless within a given time an address was carried against it. With each month's reduction of the prescribed period below the twelve months which we have proposed a large reduction would be made of the cases falling within the category of Habitual Offenders, and with each month's extension beyond the twelve months a number of fresh cases would be brought in, without in the slightest degree affecting the other machinery of the scheme. It would always require to be borne in mind, however, that the smaller the class embraced within the scope of the scheme the more inveterate would be the offenders of whom that class would consist, and that its possibilities of success from a reformatory point of view would increase almost in geometrical ratio with each enlargement of its scope. For to afford the system fair play in that respect it is of primary importance to deal with the habitual offender at the earliest possible stage, and the more promptly the work is taken in hand the better will be the results for the offender, and ultimately for society.

Cases of Relapse.—In cases where habitual offenders, after undergoing detention in B a Labour Settlement or poorhouse, resume their old habits and again fall into the hands of the police, the reasons would be wanting for delay in dealing with them which have led us to suggest so many preliminary steps before final committal in the case of persons for the first time declared habitual offenders, and we would therefore propose

That in cases of the relapse of persons so committed, the commitment shall be C deemed to have been an imprisonment at the date the said commitment expired, and that if after two subsequent imprisonments they are again charged with an offence within twelve months of the expiration of their term of commitment, they should again be brought before the Sheriff, who in such case should, on conviction, again order them to be registered for 30 months as habitual offenders, and should in that case deal with them by committing them to a Labour Settlement or poorhouse, or otherwise disposing of them, as if such prisoners' names had been upon the Register of Habitual Offenders when charged with the offence.

FINANCE.

Value of Male Labour.—As the backbone of our proposal is that able-bodied D Habitual Offenders should be compelled to work for their maintenance, the first question to be dealt with is the value of the work which they could be made to do. In estimating this in the case of males, we have the following data to go upon:—At Peterhead Convict Prison¹ the average daily population, according to the last report, was 331·37. The convicts are principally employed in quarrying, stone-breaking, concrete-making, and other operations connected with the Admiralty works, and the work accomplished, which is measured and valued, is returned at £9061, 7s. 2d., or £27, 6s. 8d. per convict per annum. In the English convict establishments the work done per convict constantly employed is set down as ranging in value from about £15 per annum in cases where the labour is reclamation work, to £45 where it is the construction of fortifications or building. Taking all the English male convict establishments,² we find from the last report of the Directors of Convict Prisons that the average daily population amounted to 3457·76 men, and the earnings for the year to £93,010, 0s. 6d., or £26, 18s. per convict per annum. Again, in our Appendix³ will be found a 'return showing the financial results of the industrial departments in Wakefield Prison, based on the market value of articles supplied by it to public departments, not allowing for initial cost of buildings, but allowing for wear and tear of tools.' According to this return a daily average of 53½ prisoners employed earned profits amounting to £1727, 3s. 8d., or over £32 per man per annum. On this evidence, we consider ourselves justified in assuming that, if we set down the labour of male settlers at £26 per head per annum the estimate should, with proper management, be within the mark. As the total average cost of a Scottish prisoner is £20, 0s. 7d.,⁴ even if we allow of an extra £3 for food and clothing, it is clear that a considerable margin remains within which the labour of the male settlers could be made to pay for their maintenance:

⁴ Scottish Prison Commissioners' Report, 1893-4, p. 52.

A Value of Female Labour.—Coming now to the case of females, there will be found in our Appendix¹ a statistical return concerning a number of Magdalene Homes and Shelters in Scotland. From this it appears that in 9 such institutions in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Greenock, the average daily population during 1893 was 520, and that the profits from work amounted to £15,204, or £29, 4s. 9d. per head. The results of female labour in the Scottish prisons give us no data to go on, for the reason that the female convicts are very few, and their work is not distinguished from that of the other female prisoners, 59 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. of whom are imprisoned for a month or under, and almost 21 per cent. for a week or under, and much of whose labour, therefore, is practically worthless. If, however, we turn to the English female convict establishment at Woking, we find that with an average daily population of 212·46 its earnings are set down at £2549, 9s. 8d., or £12 per head per annum.² With these facts before us, if we put down the value of the labour of a female settler at £12 a year, we consider that we should be within the mark.

² Report, Directors of Convict Prisons, 1893-4, Appendix X.

B Debit and Credit.—Starting from these premises, and estimating as we do for the maintenance of 900 persons (250 males and 650 females), at our Labour Settlements, our figures for labour would be :—

250 men at £26 per annum	£6,500
650 women at £12 per annum	7,800
	<hr/> £14,300

C We have seen that the sentences of the 1083 prisoners committed four times and upwards during 1893 amounted in that year to 79,646 days, which would represent an average daily number throughout the year of 218·2.³ We propose to deal with 1800 of precisely the same class, and at the same ratio their imprisonments would give a total representing a daily average number throughout the year of 362·7. Besides this we have shown how the experiment of allowing prisoners to work out their sentences, partly by imprisonment and partly by fine, secured in the course of five days in Greenock Prison⁴ a saving of twenty-two days' imprisonment, equivalent to 1606 days' imprisonment, or 4·4 years' imprisonment of one individual in the year, or to one year's imprisonment of 4·4 individuals.* We have pointed out that as the average daily population of Greenock Prison is only $\frac{1}{7}$ th of that of the Scottish Prisons as a whole, assuming the same proportion to hold good over all, the saving would amount to the permanent cost of an average daily prison population of 118·8 prisoners; and the experiment having been sprung upon the Greenock prisoners, we may take its results as much under what might be expected if the system were practically at work. Allowing for a 50 per cent. increase on the actual result, as we think might safely be done, it would give a saving of 178 in the present average daily number of prisoners in Scotland. Besides this we have proposed a large curtailment of the sentences of imprisonment competent to be imposed by Magistrates in Police Courts, and it will be seen from our Appendix,⁵ that, if the average term of imprisonment so imposed on the 1222 prostitutes last year sent to prison for more than 14 days were reduced to the maximum term of 14 days which we have recommended, a saving would be effected equal to the cost of the maintenance of one prisoner for 45·9 years, or an average daily prison population of 45·9 prisoners for one year. Allowing, however, that this saving has already been partly taken credit for by half of the women concerned having been pronounced Habitual Offenders and relegated to Labour Settlements, there would remain a saving under this head equal to the cost of an average daily population of 23. We estimate therefore a reduction of the average daily population of Scottish Prisons thus :—

	Daily Average Saving.
Under the proposals for Labour Settlements, &c., of	362 prisoners.
Under the working out of sentences by combination of Fine and Imprisonment	178 „
Under Shorter sentences in Police Courts (case of Prostitutes alone)	23 „

* A repetition of the same experiment at Baslinnie Prison, made since the above was written, and particulars of which will be found in our Appendix,⁶ gives much more favourable results as regards the saving of imprisonment, for though the trial was confined to a single day and to seven petty cases, it resulted in the remission of imprisonment amounting in all to 20 days.

As the total average daily population of ordinary prisoners in Scottish Prisons in A 1893 was 2196, this would be equivalent to over 25 per cent. of our prison population. When the incubus of Habitual Offenders with which the scheme would start had had time to be cleared off, and its full effect to be felt, we should be disappointed if its efficacy in emptying the prisons did not bring out a figure very considerably higher. Even taking it at 560, however, this at the rate of £20 per prisoner per annum would show a saving to the Treasury of £11,200. If the Habitual Offenders were all drawn from one prison, and that prison suppressed, the full saving would be effected, but they would be drawn from a number of prisons, the principal establishment charges of which would remain unaffected. In a few years after the system of Labour Settlements had been at work, however, unless it belied altogether the results both of Juvenile Reformatories in this country and Adult Reformatories abroad, the average daily number of our prison population would be decreased by a much larger number than we have set down; and by closing our smaller and more expensive prisons savings much in excess of the figures we have stated might be brought about. But taking only the saving on prisoners, and assuming that not a prison was closed, it is estimated by Mr Donaldson, the Secretary to the Scottish Prisons Commission, that the actual economy on a reduction by 560 of the average daily population of our prisons would be £7840¹ (or £14 per head per annum), and with that sum slightly increased, or say £10,000 a year, we propose that the Treasury should endow the Labour Settlement Scheme.

Alien Habitual-Offender Paupers.—But there remain several other items to be B provided for. In the first place, we have assumed that 450 of the 1800 Habitual Offenders with whom we started would be found unfitted for the discipline of Labour Settlements, and would be committed for detention to poorhouses. Those who possessed a 'parish of settlement' in Scotland, in whatever poorhouse they might be interned, would be chargeable to that parish, and from it the cost of maintaining them would be recovered under well understood existing rules and arrangements. But there would be a certain proportion without any Scottish settlement. Mr Donaldson² considers that this might be set down at 20 per cent., which, to be on the safe side, we will put down as 100 individuals. It would be necessary to make provision for the maintenance of this 100 persons out of the central fund, and if this were done at the rate of £8 per head per annum (the average annual cost of a pauper in Scottish poorhouses is slightly over £7 per head), £800 more would be absorbed.

XLVIII A.

Provision for a new start in life.—Again, to give the settlers a start in life C when they left the Labour Settlements it would be necessary to provide for gratuities payable on dismissal. In the case of convicts the official calculation is that by good conduct a gratuity of £1 per year can be earned. In the case of labour settlers we would propose a much higher scale of gratuity, and for this reason. The conditional possession of a considerable sum on discharge, to be given not as a matter of right but as a gratuity, which might be withheld if likely to be injudiciously expended, and the judicious expenditure of which could be secured through the medium of philanthropic agencies like the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies—the possession of a sum which would enable a discharged settler to be sent away to a new home with still a sufficient balance in hand to allow for a fresh start, would constitute one of the most important factors in securing his permanent reformation. We should therefore fix the gratuity (subject of course to deduction for laziness or insubordination) at the rate of £3 a year, which in thirty months would furnish £7, 10s.—a sum sufficient not merely to enable those who chose to settle in this country to do so far from their old haunts, but those who preferred it to emigrate. To provide gratuities at this rate would run away with another £2700 per annum.

Necessity for a Surplus.—In order to avail ourselves of the labour which D constitutes the foundation of our revenue, a considerable surplus would be necessary. Not only would all labour not directly applied to the maintenance of the Settlements themselves, require to be paid for by the various Departments for which it was performed or which purchased its products; but in the case of labour employed on reclamation work, there would need to be sufficient money in hand to carry on until its value could be realised. We are quite aware, also, that an estimated margin of £2000 or £3000 a year would be too small on which to start a scheme involving many calculations, and encroaching on a region where no actual experience is available for our guidance. Knowing this, we have endeavoured to keep our estimates on the safe side. Thus we have put

A down for the cost of a settler £23 per annum, a sum £3 in excess of that which in the case of a prisoner covers every expenditure, administrative and otherwise, although these administrative charges in the case of the prisoner include £12, 3s. 5d. for pay and allowances of officers, against £4, 9s. 7d. for 'victualling' and 'clothing, bedding, furniture, &c.,' and include besides 7s. of gratuity on dismissal, of which we have taken no account. But, in order to provide for every contingency, we have another resource to fall back upon.

B The Labour Settlements Fund.—It will be remembered that we proposed that in order to encourage in Scotland the application of those provisions of the existing law, intended to secure for prisoners sentenced to fines, reasonable facilities for payment before commitment to prison, and to discourage the practice which prevails of sending them off to prison if they cannot pay at once—we have proposed¹ that all fines paid after admission to prison should be paid to the Governor of the prison, and accounted for by him through the Prison Commissioners to the Secretary for Scotland, to be credited to a fund the application of which we promised to explain; and we proposed to deal in the same manner with all monies arising from the new mine that would be opened up by permitting prisoners, committed in default of payment of fines, to work out their sentences by a combination of imprisonment and fine. We have shown how, even on the basis of the results of our Greenock experiment, these reduced fines would amount to £4200 a year, and have pointed out that that experiment having been conducted under great practical disadvantages, the actual results might be reckoned at a much higher figure. Let us take the new reduced fines at only £5000, and add to them the fines at present paid after admission to prison (which amount to some £3000 a year),² and if we put down the total at £7000 to £8000 we should be well within the mark. This we propose should be paid into a fund to be administered by the Secretary for Scotland, and to be called the Labour Settlements Fund.

Recommendation (4).

LIIIA.

C Provision for Initial Expenditure.—It will have been observed that up to this point we have made no provision for the large initial expenditure which would be required for the adaptation of buildings, furnishings, acquiring ground, &c. The capital required for this purpose, which might amount to any sum from £15,000 to £25,000, we propose that the Treasury should advance as a loan, repayable as to principal and interest by substantial instalments (say £2000 to £3000 a year) out of the Labour Settlements Fund, which would also be drawn on to meet any other expenses incurred in connection with the general working of Labour Settlements.

D Balance Sheet.—To enable financial position of this Scheme to be seen at a glance, we will now put it into the form of a balance sheet.

By Cost of 900 settlers at £23 per annum,	20,700	0	0	To Value of settlers' labour (as per estimate, page xxviii), per annum,	14,300	0	0
„ Board of 100 aliens without settlement, interned in Poorhouses, per annum,	800	0	0	„ Treasury grant out of savings on diminished prison population, per annum,	10,000	0	0
„ Gratuities to settlers on dismissal, per annum,	2,700	0	0	„ Labour Settlements' Fund, as above, say,	7,500	0	0
„ Temporary annual charge for repayment of capital borrowed for initial expenditure, say	2,600	0	0
	£31,800	0	0		£31,800	0	0

This surplus of £5000 should, in our opinion, amply suffice to provide for every contingency.

E A Substantial Guarantee.—But in order to meet the objection that experience might prove our estimate of the monies to be derived from the sources indicated to have been exaggerated, or the demands upon it greater than we have allowed for, or that from causes which we have not foreseen, it might prove inadequate, we propose, in case in any year it should prove inadequate—and in that case only—to authorise the Secretary for Scotland to make up the balance required by a levy of the amount per pound necessary to restore equilibrium, on the fines and 'pledges' at present paid in to the various Police Authorities throughout the country. That this would place the financial position of the scheme beyond question is at once evident from the fact that, as will be seen from a A return in our Appendix,¹ the fines and pledges received by the Police Authorities in eleven of the larger burghs in Scotland during 1893, amounted to over £20,000, and we are safe in saying that throughout Scotland their amount exceeded £25,000. We do not propose to confiscate these fines and pledges. We do not even anticipate that it would often be necessary to encroach upon them materially, or at all; but behind the financial provisions which we have already proposed, this solid guarantee of over £25,000 per annum would stand to protect the scheme against all possible deficit, and to assure its credit. The Police Authorities in every town visited by us told us that if we could devise means to rid them of a few scores or hundreds of Habitual Offenders in their respective communities, their labours would be immensely lightened and their expenses decreased; and we consider that in proposing that they should guarantee the financial soundness of our scheme to the extent of the fines and pledges which they receive—a guarantee which in all probability would never require to be drawn on,—we are asking them to pay a very moderate price indeed for the attainment of the object that with one voice they professed their anxiety to secure.

² Par. 'Elasticity of Proposals,' p. xxv.

At the commencement of the new system, when the whole Habitual Offenders of a B generation would be to be dealt with, unless provision were made for its inauguration on a gradual and restricted scale, there might not improbably be so much stress put upon it as to lead to a breakdown. We have already anticipated this difficulty,² and shown how it might easily be avoided.

Briefly stated then, the financial basis of our proposal is this—

The exceptional expense of governing and maintaining Habitual Offenders in Scotland, so far as it does not directly fall on the public, is borne by the Imperial Exchequer (which maintains the prisons) and the Police and the Parochial Authorities. C

That exceptional expense, if our proposal were adopted, would almost entirely devolve upon the Administration of the Scottish Labour Settlements, by which all the revenues of the Settlements would be received and disbursed.

To enable the expenditure of the Administration to be met, we propose to look to the labour of the settlers, which we put down at about £14,000 a year, assisted by £10,000 a year from the Imperial Exchequer in the shape of an annuity, which would represent—and in a few years under-represent—the amount of its savings in the maintenance of prisoners.

In addition to this annuity, we recommend that the capital necessary for the initiation of the scheme should be advanced by the Imperial Exchequer as a loan amply secured and to be rapidly repaid.

To enable this to be done we would call into existence a fund arising out of fines at present lost, which, together with fines now paid by prisoners after their admission to prison (which for reasons of policy we propose to alienate from their present recipients), would amount to £7000 or £8000 a year.

This fund, which we propose to call the Labour Settlements Fund, we propose to apply in the first place to the repayment by annual instalments of the money borrowed from the Imperial Exchequer for initial expenditure, and in the second to the general administrative purposes of the scheme.

This Labour Settlements Fund would, we believe, prove amply sufficient for those purposes; but lest its amount should fall short of our anticipations, we propose to give to the Secretary for Scotland power from year to year to make up any deficiency which might arise, by a levy to the extent required on fines and pledges received by the Local Authorities in Scotland, which at present amount to over £25,000 a year, and which would thus form an unquestionable guarantee for the solvency of the Labour Settlements Fund.

The Police Authorities would contribute to the scheme by consenting to this guarantee, which, we believe, would never require to be drawn on heavily, and in all probability would never require to be drawn on at all.

As to the Parochial Authorities, their contribution to the scheme would consist in the detention and maintenance of—in round numbers—100 infirm, aged, and weak-minded, alien, habitual-offender paupers at the expense of the Labour Settlements Fund, and 350 native habitual-offender paupers at the expense of their respective parishes of settlement.

The expense of the detention and maintenance of these habitual-offender paupers, which would be thus devolved upon the ratepayers throughout Scotland would

- A barely increase by £3000 the £894,500 at present expended on the relief of the poor; and in return for it the Parochial Authorities would get rid of the trouble and expense to which they are now exposed at the hands of the 'in- and-out' habitual-offender pauper class, a trouble and expense of which they everywhere demand to be freed and everywhere loudly complain.

PART II.—VAGRANTS AND BEGGARS.

- B Having dealt with habitual offenders generally, we now come to those special classes to whom attention is specially called in our remit, first among which comes that of vagrants and beggars. According to a night census of this class, taken by the police in June 1893,¹ the vagrants and beggars in Scotland numbered 9655, giving ^{1 Appendix XVII.} a ratio to population of 20 per 10,000. Of these, 6326 were men, 1927 women, and 1402 children; 6728 were found in counties where their ratio to population was 26 per 10,000, and 2927 in burghs where their ratio to population was 13 per 10,000.
- C Tinkers or Gipsies.—The persons grouped together as beggars and vagrants may be sub-divided into three classes—Tinkers or gipsies, professional vagrants, and working men on the tramp. The tinkers and gipsies form a class apart. They live principally in tents, and marry among themselves, according to their own rites; support themselves ostensibly by petty industries, such as tinker-work, umbrella mending, and occasional field labour, but really to a large extent by begging. The number of them reported by Chief Constables as having encamped in their respective counties in 1893 was 977 adults and 725 children.² As their movements often extend through several counties, the same gipsies must ^{2 Appendix XVIII.} have been returned as passing through their districts by several Chief Constables, so that the number reported should be considerably over the truth; but taking the figures as we find them, the number of arrests among them was 232, or 136 per 1000, as against 37 in the general population. They differ from the ordinary vagrant in the high proportion of women and children to men,—the numbers of the women being nearly as great as that of the men, and that of children 50 per cent. greater; while, among vagrants and beggars generally, men figure to women in the proportion of over 3 to 1, and to children in the proportion of over 4½ to 1. These tinkers and gipsies are represented by Chief Con- ^{3 Chief Constable M'Pherson, Q. 6433-4; Col. Williamson, Q. 6551-2; Dr Macallum, 6604.} stables, landowners, and others³ as not given to stealing or poaching, but as inveterate beggars, levying contributions in the shape of food, money and sites for their encampments on the rural population, spending what money they obtain in drink, and when drunk fighting amongst themselves. In their domestic relations they are depicted as faithful to their own marriage ties, and fond of their children. The charges against them, so far as the general community is concerned, is that they are troublesome beggars; that their unions not being recognised as marriages, their children increase the illegitimacy ratio of the counties in which they abound; and that, owing to their wandering habits and mode of life, their children are exposed to hardships amounting to cruelty, and grow up practically devoid of education, except in the border counties, where they seem to have settled down. Various drastic proposals were made to us, especially in Perthshire, for getting rid of a nuisance which was described as intolerable. These included the suggestion that living in tents should be made illegal, and that the children should where necessary be forcibly removed from their parents and sent to industrial schools.
- D The law already makes it an offence for gipsies to encamp on any ground without permission of the occupier. The Public Health Act provides for the suppression of an unsanitary dwelling of whatever description, condemned as a nuisance by the Medical Officer for Health; and the Prevention of Crimes Act,⁴ 1871, already ^{4 See Appendix XXI.—Prof. Dove Wilson.} enacts that 'any person wandering about and lodging . . . in the open air, or 'under a tent, not having visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good 'account of himself,' is to be deemed a rogue and a vagabond, and may be apprehended and imprisoned with hard labour for three months. With all these provisions of the law to fall back upon, we cannot endorse the suggestion that the mere fact of living in a tent should itself be made a crime. Examples of neglect of children amounting to cruelty were mentioned, but for the punishment of such cases the ordinary law provides. As to marriage, the law of Scotland is one of the most liberal in the world, recognising it as constituted by contract however proved. Further, the Registrar-General informs us⁵ that if parents state that they are ^{5 Appendix LXXIX.} married it is the duty of the Registrar to enter their child as legitimate, warning the parents before doing so of the consequences of making any untrue statement. He A admits that, in dealing with persons of nomadic habits, Registrars are often placed under difficulties, as they have to dispose of the case on the spot, and the parties sometimes make ambiguous averments, stating that they are married for the time being, or using other qualifying expressions. Nevertheless, he adds that for the most part he believes entries made by the local Registrars would stand the test of a trial in a court of law or any other investigation.

Public policy evidently demands that if the gipsy contract constitutes a legal B marriage, it should, in as many cases as possible, be registered as such, and this could be done, and we believe would willingly be done, by the Sheriffs in every case where no legal impediment to marriage exists, and where the desirability of such a step could be brought home to the spouses by missionaries, clergy or others who take an interest in their welfare. Whether the marriage is registered or not, if it is a legal one, it is important, both in justice to the child and in connection with the law of settlement, that the child should be registered as legitimate; and we would recommend

That, to remove any doubt as to this being done, the Registrar-General might issue C to each Registrar a circular suggesting questions as to whether, in cases where nomadic parents registered the birth of a child, they were incapacitated from marriage by relationship, affinity, or prior existing ties, and directing him to explain that if this were not the case, if the parents had taken each other as man and wife, they were, according to Scottish Law, married and their child legitimate, whether the marriage had been registered or not.

With regard to begging and vagrancy the Chief Constables of several counties D explained that, although under the Local Government Act, 1889, County Councils were empowered to make bye-laws for their suppression, owing to a judgment recently given in the Court of Session (Eastburn v. Wood, 1892, 19 R. 100), doubt had been created as to whether a bye-law, couched in the language of the vagrancy sections of the Burgh Police Act, was not ultra vires. To remove any doubt which may exist on this point, we would suggest That the vagrancy clause of the Burgh Police Act (with limitation of the penalty E as we have already proposed) should be made specifically applicable to counties.

Education of Gipsy Children.—As to the education of gipsy children there is a F twofold difficulty. The families being constantly on the move, it is practically impossible as the law now stands to enforce the compulsory school attendance of the children. In the second place, witness after witness informed us that if the gipsy children were to go to school they so abounded with vermin that the general population would not allow their children to sit in school alongside them,¹ and Mr Stewart, schoolmaster,² told us that were they to present themselves at his school he would refuse to receive them. Suggestions were made that the law should step in and forcibly separate gipsy children from their parents by sending them to Industrial Schools, or that the parents, while their children were of school age, should be compelled to select a district of settlement, and to send their children to school within it. Your Committee see grave objections to any legislation that would render migration, which to other men is lawful, a crime in the case of one particular class, or which would deprive parents belonging to that class of rights of guardianship of their children which other parents enjoy. If, as a class, gipsies and tinkers are remarkable for the excessive percentage of their offences, as would seem evident from the number of their arrests, the law prescribes conditions under which law-breakers of all classes may be deprived of the custody of their children. At the same time, we fully recognise the evil of permitting any class of children to remain outside the pale of the law which enforces compulsory education. We believe, however, that the enforcement of the law against begging, vagrancy, cruelty to children, and drunkenness, on the one hand, and of existing powers as to committal to Industrial Schools on the other, might greatly mitigate the evil of the want of education among tinker children, and we believe that one of the chief reasons why the law is not enforced is because to do so would entail expenditure on the parish enforcing it. In illustration of this we would refer to the evidence of the Chief Constable of Perthshire.³ He issued a circular to his police explaining how the law stood. One of them acted on his circular and arrested a little girl for begging; but the Magistrates declined to proceed with the case because of 'the expense that would be incurred in sending the girl to an Industrial School.' In order to diminish this cost as falling on any particular parish we would suggest that

A powers should be given to School Board districts and parishes in a county or adjoining counties to unite for the purpose of enforcing the school attendance of vagrant children. Where districts refrain from thus uniting, and where there is evidence that a class of vagrant children is growing up in their midst without education it may even be advisable to enforce their duty on the School Boards by withholding from them their share of the Imperial grant.

B We recommend therefore that powers should be given to School Board districts and parishes in a county or adjoining counties to unite in enforcing the attendance at school of the children of nomadic parents, and that such united districts and parishes should be empowered to frame bye-laws for the purpose of carrying on the education of such children, which bye-laws, if approved by the Secretary for Scotland, should have the force of law.

C The effect of this recommendation would be (1) to enable the powers of co-operating compulsory officers to extend over a very large area, and so to bring home to the parents responsibility for the education of their children, and remove the obstacles which exist to their being brought within the scope of the ordinary law; (2) to enable to be borne by an extensive area the expense (a) of contributing to the maintenance of children liable to be sent to Industrial Schools, under any of the provisions of the Industrial School Acts, but whom, to avoid expense, Local Authorities at present refuse to send there, and (b) of the erection of a special Day Industrial School or schools, with provision for lodging children when their parents were out of school range, or the setting up of any special educational machinery which might be deemed necessary in consequence of the aversion of the general population to receive gipsy children into their public schools.

D Professional Beggars and Vagrants.—As will be seen by reference to the Appendix,¹ the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, embodies very stringent provisions for dealing with vagrants wandering about and lodging in out-houses, &c., not having any visible means of subsistence, and unable to give a good account of themselves. Such persons are liable to be dealt with as rogues and vagabonds, and imprisoned with hard labour for three months. The fact, however, that in those counties where the complaints against vagrancy are most acute, these powers, and even the milder provisions of the Prevention of Trespass Act, 1865, are little used, would show that what is wanted to check vagrancy is not the power of inflicting heavy penalties, but facility in bringing home the offence. The offence most widely complained of and most easily proved in the case of vagrants is begging, and that in Scotland is not an offence at common law—at least since an old Scotch statute inflicting branding on the cheek and banishment upon unlicensed beggars fell into desuetude. In burghs begging is an offence under the Burgh Police Act and the special Police Acts of the various excepted towns. We have recommended that the Vagrancy Clause of the Burgh Police Act (with restricted penalties) be extended to counties. The only further recommendation which we have to make is

XXI.

That, in view of the trouble and expense caused by pauper vagrants, and already described,² the Local Government Board should make regulations, if necessary,³ by an extension of their powers, authorising the detention in poorhouses for a week or ten days (instead of 24 or 72 hours as at present) after they have notified their intention of leaving, of pauper vagrants known to have been inmates of poorhouses, say more than twice or three times during the preceding six months, and thus obviate the trouble and expense caused by these vagrant paupers.

THE WORKING-MAN TRAMP.

E This class of wanderer constitutes the great difficulty of dealing with the question of vagrancy. What proportion of the total number of vagrants embraced in the police census are genuine seekers after work it is impossible to say. Some estimates put the figure very low, but the fact that when any great public work, such as a new railway, is being carried out, a stream of tramps sets in towards it from distant towns, shows that the number of tramps honestly in search of employment must be very considerable. These naturally suffer far greater inconveniences than the professional vagrant, being unfamiliar with the various halting-places in the shape of night-shelters, brick-kilns, &c., along the road, and with the tricks and subterfuges by which they, though able-bodied, might obtain parochial relief. In England they would be entitled to food and lodging in casual wards; in Scotland, so long as they are able-bodied, the poor-law forbids them relief. Even if they break down on the road and become eligible for relief, A they may be unable to obtain it, 507 parishes in Scotland having no casual sick poor accommodation. Circulars issued by the Board of Supervision, and the evidence of

 ' Q. 5845-6. Mr M'Neill,¹ show that in certain parishes inspectors of poor, when applied to by vagrants suffering from disease or injury, assisted them with money and sent them on to the next parish, with the object of getting rid of liability for their maintenance.* In some cases,² to quote the circular of 1887, 'the vagrants have proceeded on their journey till, wholly disabled, they have at length become finally chargeable to the parish where their final breakdown took place, and have even died within a few days.' The Board therefore called the attention of inspectors to the inhumanity of the practice as regards the applicants and its injustice towards the parish where the ultimate chargeability took place, and instructed them as to the duty of providing casual-sick homes for such cases. If a vagrant dies through neglect of duty on the part of an inspector of poor, the latter may be tried for manslaughter.

'Shelters' and their Results.—In some of the southern counties this responsibility B seems to have created a panic, and caused them to exceed their duty in one direction as far as they had previously fallen short of it in the other. At all events the explanation which we got from Mr Porter, the Chief Constable, of a system which prevails in Roxburgh³ was this:—'Some years ago the Board of Supervision came down upon Parochial Boards. Some two or three instances of starvation had occurred, people lying out being found dead in the morning, and the consequence was that every parish was called upon to provide a shelter—a place for the reception of tramps. I know that was the case in Kelso, Jedburgh, Selkirk, Hawick, and Galashiels. The number of tramps was so great that shelters were established on a pretty extensive scale. They were fitted with benches on which the tramps could lie down and huddle together for the night, and they received so many ounces of meal night and morning, and were passed on.' The Parochial Boards (without any legal authority) defray the cost of this entertainment, which is about 2d. per head per night, and entrust to the police the duty of granting tickets of admission to the shelters, which they do after entering the applicant's name and description in a book, and searching him for money if they suspect him of possessing it. ('We don't want to be imposed on,' remarked the chief constable, and 'the British police are often obliged to take powers.'⁴) The result was that the number of tramps in Jedburgh and Kelso alone increased from 2095 in 1890 to 5290 in 1894, which convinced both the Parochial Boards⁵ and the Chief Constable that the system was a mistake. The Parochial Boards had, therefore, given instructions to the police to reduce the number of tickets issued, while the Chief Constable stated that the system only tended to increase the number of tramps, and that 'it had been discovered that these fellows went the round. It was a day's march from Jedburgh to Kelso, and from Kelso to Galashiels, and then back they went the opposite way. It was a common thing for them to go from Kelso to Galashiels, Galashiels to Selkirk, Selkirk to Hawick, and into Dumfries,' where he believed there were shelters also. From Mr. M'Neill's evidence⁶ it appears that the Board of Supervision had strongly remonstrated against the system, but they had no power to put it down, and the Local Authorities would not be guided by them 'because, as was said, they objected to these able-bodied beggars going about the town at night.' An analysis of the persons sheltered at Jedburgh and Kelso yielded the following results:—3012 of them were under 40 years of age, and 1857 above it; 4633 were men, 455 women, and 202 children. Of the men 1235 were Scotch, 2534 English, 829 Irish, and 35 foreign; and of the women tramping by themselves 106 were Scotch, 69 English, 49 Irish, and 3 foreign. The Chief Constable considered that the majority of the tramps sheltered were men in search of work,⁷ and he attempted to account for the recent increase by the fact that at Newcastle extensive waterworks were being constructed, and the southern counties were covered with tramps going back and forward to the works. This explanation might possibly account for the increase of some 439 Scotchmen and Irishmen shown in the figures of 1894 as compared with those of the previous year, but it certainly could not account for an increase of 653 in the number of Englishmen or for the fact that the number of Englishmen who have obtained shelter at Jedburgh and Kelso during the past two years is more than twice the number of the Scotch. These facts admit of but one explanation, and that is that the offer of a plank bed and a rug in a warmed room, and 2d. worth of meal, afford an inducement sufficient to attract hundreds even of able-bodied men from a dis-

* The chief constable of Fifeshire informed us that it was formerly the practice in that county for the police to arrest all vagrants and ship them across the Frith of Forth or Tay, and that the practice was only put a stop to by an action being raised or threatened against one of his predecessors in office.

A trict where work is plentiful to distant towns where there is no chance of work but where these luxuries can be got without payment either in money or equivalent labour.

B Experience of Musselburgh.—This is corroborated by other evidence. Thus Lieutenant-Colonel Borthwick, Chief Constable of the Lothians and Peeblesshire, told us the result of a Mr. M'Kelvie having left in trust to the Town Council of Musselburgh £700, the interest of which was to be applied to assisting persons passing through that town in search of work. The interest amounts to £22 per annum, and the inspector of police looks after it, and gives tickets to persons who may apply for food and lodging. The arrangement came into operation in February 1892. During eleven months of that year 715 persons received tickets. In 1893 the numbers rose to 956, and in 1894, by the end of October, it had risen to 1124. Besides these, many more applied and were refused, either because they had been relieved a short time before or because the annual £22 had been exhausted. The consequence was that tramps and beggars multiplied in Musselburgh so much that an application was made to the Court of Session to get rid of the charity, but the decision was that it must remain, 'and,' added the Chief Constable, 'the tramps swarm into Musselburgh, and the number 'gets larger every day.'

C Experience of East Lothian.—The experience of Dunbar, Haddington, and Tranent demonstrated the same fact in a different way. In these towns, up to 1891, shelter houses were maintained by the Burghs and Parochial Boards for the accommodation of tramps. In 1884 the system was in full swing, and 2721 tramps were accommodated. Then some of the Boards dropped payment, and the number of shelters was reduced, and in 1888 the number accommodated dropped to 2584. In 1891 the County Council resolved to abolish the shelter houses, and in 1893 the number of tramps challenged in East Lothian dropped to 349, representing, according to police calculation, only 116 individual tramps. In other words, the withdrawal in that county of free shelter and breakfast sufficed to reduce the number of tramps to less than one-twentieth of its previous amount. On the other hand, in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and many other towns, night shelters worked by charitable organisations exist, which certainly meet a crying want, and regarding any evil effects of which we heard no complaints.

D The Ayrshire Mendicity System.—The Committee has had a large amount of information placed before it by Mr Loch, the Secretary of the London Charity Organization Society, and others with reference to the methods adopted in England in dealing with the vagrant class. Captain M'Hardy, R.N., the Chief Constable of Ayrshire, which has always been a favourite county for the tramp, told us that having studied the plans on which various English Societies, more particularly those of Dorset, Hereford, Kent and Worcestershire, grant relief to tramps, he had devised a system on similar lines, and with the assistance of the Ayrshire Mendicity Society, had put it into operation in that county. The method in which the Society, which was founded in 1885, set to work was as follows:—Bread tickets, which could be given to tramps when they begged for relief, were supplied to the public at a very moderate rate. These tickets could be exchanged for bread in the various towns and villages in the county, so that at about every five miles of his journey the tramp, if he had a ticket, would be able to get two pennyworth of bread. Lodging tickets were also provided by the Society and sold to the public at a slight loss. These tickets were for issue to beggars who asked for money to pay for a bed, and a wayfarer, on presenting one at a Police Station received an order for a night's lodging. The object of the Society was to repress mendicity, and at the same time to assist the deserving travelling poor.

E The experience which has been gained by the operations of the scheme is very instructive. In the first place, the public interest in the matter seems to have varied considerably. In 1887, 1,418 tickets were purchased, while in 1891 only 94 were bought. Altogether in the nine years tickets providing for relief of the value of £656, were sold under the scheme and £609 received by the Society for them, thus leaving a deficit of £47 which had to be covered by subscriptions and donations. Strange to say only half of the bread tickets given away were used by the tramps, but it was otherwise with the tickets for lodging, which were in great demand. Indeed, Captain M'Hardy found that they were abused, being used by men who were earning wages as well as by vagrants who had sufficient money in their pockets to pay for a night's shelter. One man was found to have £1, 5s. 11d. in his possession when he applied for a free bed. Having regard to the experience gained in Ayrshire by this lengthened experiment of a system based on the English plan, Captain M'Hardy, although he did not think that providing for the relief of tramps in the manner above described had led to an increase of vagrants in the county, nevertheless hesitated to recommend it for adoption generally in Scotland.

- Indeed, he stated that he had been unable, after investigation, to establish the fact that A one really respectable man had ever used the tickets.¹ Asked if he could recommend a National scheme for the repression of the professional tramp, and at the same time for helping on his way the honest labourer actually in search of work, he replied—‘No, I

Some Hardships of the present System.—Certainly some provision for sheltering B and feeding the honest workman, who has exhausted his funds in a search for employment, is urgently required. If, in a county, he is caught sleeping in the open air or an outhouse, he is liable to be taken up as a rogue and vagabond; if, in a town, he seeks shelter in a close, he infringes some provision of the local Police Act, and is liable to thirty days’ imprisonment. If he begs in a burgh, he brings himself within the grasp of the law, and so long as he is technically able-bodied, he is ineligible for parochial relief. Under these circumstances, it is not astonishing to learn that in 1893,³ 5300 persons sought and obtained shelter in police offices in Glasgow alone. There, when there is room, applicants for shelter are allowed to be locked up for the night, and receive a slight supper and breakfast, the expense being defrayed out of the police rates, and this system prevails very generally over the country. There is, however, no legal sanction for this expenditure, and when the system of audit enacted under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, comes into operation, it will probably be disallowed and the practice put a stop to. To prevent this and to legitimise the practice so far as it affects the honest workman we recommend

Q. 46.

That the police authorities should be empowered to grant temporary relief to the C extent of a night’s lodging and food to the necessitous, homeless, and travelling poor, where they think it expedient to do so, and that they should also have power to exact, if they think right, a labour equivalent from those that are able to work.

In order to secure this it would be necessary, as in Germany, to constitute it an D offence to refuse to work after accepting assistance on the condition of paying for it by work. We recommend that this duty should be entrusted to the police rather than to the parochial authorities, because police stations are much more thickly scattered over the country than poorhouses; because the system is already adopted—though without any labour test—over a large extent of Scotland, so that it would involve less dislocation of existing practice than any modification of the able-bodied disqualification of the Scottish Poor-Law; and finally, because we think it desirable to keep the honest searcher for work as much as possible out of contact with the pauper vagrant, under whose tuition he would soon acquire a knowledge of the devices necessary to sham sickness and insist on parochial relief. We would give the police wide discretion in the matter of exacting a labour equivalent, in order that travellers who could show that they were really in search of work might not be impeded in their mission, and we would limit the lodging to be given to a single night, and make it optional and not compulsory, in order to avoid inconvenience to the primary work of the police. If, in addition to this, it were made lawful for Local Police Authorities to contribute to approved night asylums, as a condition of persons sent by them being received, and with power in these cases also to exact a labour equivalent, a much wider provision might be made for the respectable class of tramp than at present exists, while the labour test would safeguard the community against those evils which experience has shown to result from the giving of unconditional assistance, even to a small extent.

Permanent Organisation for Relief Works.—As to the question of dealing with such E exacerbations of vagrancy as may result from time to time through the indirect effect of a great strike or exceptionally severe weather, we might suggest that most of our large towns possess what is known as a ‘Common Good,’ a reserve of property which is drawn on for a great variety of purposes, but which, it has, in some places been held, cannot legally be applied to the relief of local destitution, however acute. If the doubt, believed to exist on this point, were removed and expenditure for such a purpose sanctioned, money would be available to meet temporary crises, while the local authorities might be trusted not to draw on the fund unless driven to it by necessity. The experience of relief works instituted at the cost of private charity in Scotland, as elsewhere, has proved that when labour is paid for by the day as little work as possible is done. At present it is not until a crisis has lasted for some time in an acute stage that subscriptions can be raised and work provided, and when that is done the struggle is to provide for all and sundry, and piece-work is never, or almost never, at first

A insisted on. If permanent public funds were available the destitution could be met promptly while it was manageable in extent, and relief given solely on the principle of piece-work, without danger of attracting loafers from a distance. The experience of Glasgow,¹ where relief works were opened in the beginning of this year, 1895, and in 1893, went conclusively to show that with the substitution of payment by results for payment by time, the number of men at work underwent a rapid and marked diminution, although the piece-work was intentionally calculated at a scale which allowed of maximum weekly wages being earned in three or four days, so as to afford ample opportunity to the men at work for seeking regular employment.

B By means such as we suggest above it would be possible at the shortest notice to carry out the leading recommendations contained in the circular on the subject of the granting of relief issued by the Board of Supervision in the winter of 1879², namely that 'means should be adopted to apply what may be termed an artificial labour test, and that no person who refuses to submit to it should be admitted to participation; that covered sheds should be erected, so as to admit of work being carried on in all weathers; that labour masters should be appointed to superintend this work, whose duty it would be to check and report idleness or absence; and if any person alleges inability to do the work required of him, he should be examined by a Medical Officer, whose report would guide the administrators of the Fund; and that in the case of women, work for which they are fitted should be provided for them, either in rooms lined for the purpose, or at their own homes.'

PART III.—JUVENILE DELINQUENTS.

C Owing to the general adoption of the option given to magistrates, under the Act of 1893, of committing juveniles to reformatories without sending them to prison, the number of juvenile offenders imprisoned in Scotland has been greatly reduced. A return to be found in our Appendix³ shows that during the month of January 1885, there were confined in our Scottish Prisons 21 prisoners under 16 years of age with aggregate sentences amounting to 35 months. This is equivalent to a permanent average daily number of slightly over 7, and accords with another return which we had taken on the 18th of December 1894, which showed that the number of prisoners under 16 on that date was 8. A third return⁴ which we also give shows that in 1893, 64 children under 12 years of age were committed to prisons and legalised police cells in Scotland. Of the youthful offenders incarcerated during January 1895, one child of 11 had been sentenced to 24 hours' imprisonment, and a boy of 15 to 7 days, in default of payment of a fine of 20s. All the girls except one of 13, who was imprisoned as a witness, were locked up in default of payments of fines ranging from 5s. to 10s. 6d.

D Mr Morrin, who ceased to be a magistrate of Glasgow in November last, after having served as a bailie for five years, in the course of his evidence said,⁵—

E 'We have an enormous number of apprehensions for very trivial matters. We have boys brought up in great numbers for kicking pieces of paper on the street in the form of a ball, and any number of lads who are perhaps found standing at the street corner and obstructing the free passage of the people. We get such cases brought up in great quantities. The apprehensions with regard to football-playing on the streets are enormous in the football season, and it is a difficult matter for the magistrate to know how to deal with them—and I speak all their minds—because if it happens to be a damp day, and the ball flies up and goes against the passengers, the ladies get their dresses soiled, or the passengers get their ankles kicked. As I say, there is an enormous number of little boys from six to twelve years brought up for such offences as these.'

F For first offences,⁶ Mr Morrin went on to say, they are usually admonished. For playing football, after having been admonished, he had sometimes felt it to be his duty to fine them a shilling with no alternative of imprisonment; and he did not know of boys who had been sent to prison unless they were habitual offenders.⁷ Even for thieving⁸ he preferred to order whipping rather than imprisonment, but he believed his colleagues⁹ were of a different mind.

G Having interviewed a number of young persons in various prisons, we are most strongly convinced that no boy or girl under sixteen should be sent to prison if it can by any possibility be avoided. Once imprisoned, the fear of imprisonment and its deterrent influence seems to vanish, and they are found in prison again and again.¹ In an analysis² of the ages of female prisoners in ¹ Rev. H. M'K. Glasgow Prison on the 27th of October last, will be found a girl of fourteen, A one of fifteen, and one of sixteen years of age. Two of these whom we interviewed were in for 60 days for malicious mischief. They had found a box of matches, and happening to pass a sheet that was hanging up to dry, they set fire to it, and by doing so nearly ignited the building from which it was hanging. One of them had been twice imprisoned for short periods for disorderly conduct (apparently simply horse-play) within the previous six months. A boy, whom we found at Barlinnie committed for a serious offence, had a short time previously been imprisoned for kicking a football into a 'sweetie' shop. Till recently, all inmates of reformatories were committed to prison before being sent to a reformatory. The percentage of commitments to prison among men who have passed through reformatories is, as we shall see, nearly four times that of the commitments among men who have passed through industrial schools, but who, as children, were never familiarised with prison. The fact is that the life of many children of the class from which criminals chiefly spring is a very hard one, and when they find that in jail they are regularly fed and comfortably housed in warm cells,—that they are not starved, or kicked, or beaten, or even sworn at, and that, for children at least, there is no hard work or harsh discipline in Scotch prisons, the terror vanishes with which, when known only from the outside, the prison is regarded, and the salutary deterrent effect disappears.

We recommend, therefore—

- (1.) That no child under fourteen years of age, who is not charged with a crime punishable by penal servitude, shall be committed to prison before trial; and
- (2.) That no person under fourteen years of age shall be sentenced, after trial, to imprisonment, except by a sheriff or superior judge.

Inspector of Reformatories,
p. 22.

The number of juvenile offenders (under sixteen years of age) committed to C prison in Scotland in 1893 was 741, of whom only a comparatively small number were committed by sheriffs.³ The effect, therefore, of the adoption of these rules would be largely to reduce the number of juvenile commitments. As Mr Morrin explained, magistrates often experience great difficulty in knowing what to do with the juvenile petty offenders who are brought before them. Cases of petty theft, especially of coals, are very common, and boys and girls, convicted a second time of such offences, certainly deserve some punishment.

Appendix
XLVIII.

Whipping of Juveniles.—By 23 & 24 Vic. c. 105, sec. 74,⁴ whipping is authorised D for males under fourteen years of age who are guilty of any offences for which it is competent to imprison or fine with the alternative of imprisonment, and the whipping may be inflicted instead of the imprisonment, or in addition to it; but, from the way in which the Act is worded, it is held to be doubtful whether a whipping can be made the alternative of failure to pay a fine.

We recommend that this doubt should be removed, and that it should be made clear E that whipping could be ordered as a substitute for any fine in default of payment of which the prisoner would have to go to prison.

In certain courts, as in the Glasgow River Bailie's Court, the magistrate does not F seem to have the power to order whipping, and other magistrates, from a mistaken idea of mercy, prefer to send boys to prison to having them whipped. So much is this the case, that Sheriff Rutherford, who, under an arrangement peculiar to Edinburgh, has sat in the Police Court of that city since 1882, told us⁵ that before he took his seat on the bench the provisions of the law as to whipping had never been put in force. He introduced the punishment, which he thought was much better than sending boys to prison. No other magistrate, however, resorted to it, and Sir J. A. Russell, ex-Lord Provost, told us that he, as a bailie, had once ordered a boy to be whipped, but he believed that was the only case of this punishment being ordered except by Sheriff Rutherford which had ever occurred in Edinburgh. In the year 1893 in all Scotland, 335 boys were whipped. These whippings, under a regulation issued by the Lord Advocate in 1886, are inflicted without the boys being sent to prison. We are of opinion that in police-court cases, where punishment of some sort must be inflicted, whipping is infinitely preferable to imprisonment, and that the age up to which it is competent might with great advantage be extended. Whipping with a birch is not a punishment suitable for girls, but so lamentable does your Committee consider the results of sending young girls to prison that they venture to recommend that in cases similar to those in which whipping can be inflicted on boys, girls might be subjected to a punishment which is meted out to them at public schools, and which has been sanctioned in the case of certain female industrial schools,⁶ namely, strokes on the hand with a leather strap or 'tawse.' Such a punishment would meet the case of boisterous conduct in the streets, or a petty ⁵ See Report by Inspector of Reformatories, &c., 1893, p. 25.

A theft of coals, much more fitly and with infinitely less disastrous results to the girl's future than a sentence of imprisonment.

B We therefore recommend that in convictions of persons under 16 years of age, whether the punishment enacted be imprisonment or a fine with the alternative of imprisonment, the magistrate should have power at his discretion in the case of males to order whipping as an alternative, and in the case of females strokes on the hand with a leathern strap or 'tawse.'

C As among certain Magistrates there appears to be a strong dislike to whipping as an alternative to imprisonment in the case of young persons, on the ground that it stirs up public ill-feeling, we would point out that our recommendation of it in such cases as preferable to imprisonment is supported not only by the practice of many Sheriffs, but by the resolution of the Petty Offenders Committee of the Glasgow Association for Improving the Social Condition of the People, and the admission of Mr Tallack, Secretary to the Howard Association¹, and Mr. Quarrier.² To meet the widespread objection to the use of the birch, however, it might be well to allow Magistrates in all cases to order the punishment to be inflicted on the hand with a leathern tawse, an implement to the innocuous yet deterrent effects of which many of them will be able to testify from personal experience.

D It may be well here to bring to mind that the necessity for either whipping or imprisonment in the case of a very large proportion of young offenders can be avoided by a judicious use of admonitions addressed by the Magistrate, either in public or in private, both to them and to their parents, and by a free use of the powers of the First Offenders Act.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

E Under the Reformatory Schools Act of 1893 a youthful offender may be sent to a certified reformatory school, either in lieu of punishment or in addition to it, if—(1) being under 12 years of age he is proved to have been previously convicted of a crime punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, or being not less than 12, and not more than 16 years of age, he is convicted (without need of proving a previous conviction) of a similar offence. Every boy or girl therefore sent to a Reformatory must have been convicted of a crime punishable by imprisonment or penal servitude, and the period of detention prescribed is not less than three years, nor more than five, and never beyond the age of 19. In the case of committals to Industrial Schools, the inmates must not have been convicted, and there is no limit of the period of detention beyond the stipulation that it shall not extend beyond the age of 16.

F Prior to the Act of 1893, it was necessary before committing juvenile offenders to a reformatory to subject them to a term of imprisonment, and many Magistrates whenever it was practicable, refused to convict, and committed the boy or girl to an Industrial School. The Act of 1893 by giving Magistrates the option of sending youthful offenders direct to Reformatories has met the objection entertained to the preliminary imprisonment, and the number of commitments to reformatory schools, which, in Scotland in 1892 only amounted to 199, in 1893 suddenly rose to 270, the number of girls included in that total rising from 24 to 42. In 1894, however, it fell back to 207, the number of girls included being 29. The number of commitments to Industrial Schools was correspondingly checked, falling from 1020 in 1892 to 1006 in 1893, and 955 in 1894. There are nine Reformatory Schools in Scotland, and there were under detention in them at December 31st, 1893, 781 boys and 91 girls, numbers much larger in proportion to population, both in the case of boys and girls, than in English Reformatories. Larceny is stated to be by far the commonest offence for which juveniles are committed to Reformatories, 235 out of a total of 278 having been committed under this head in 1893. The cost of maintenance is a little over £17,000 which is met to the extent of close on £11,000 by a Treasury Capitation Grant. The total cost per male inmate in the same year averaged £18, 1s. 8d. (against £21, 2s. 3d. in England), and for girls, £26, 7s. 4d. (against £20, 1s. 4d. in England). The balance between Treasury allowances and total cost is made up of subscriptions, legacies, payments from voluntary associations, payments from county and burgh A authorities, payments for hire of labour, 'sundries,' and the profits of the industrial departments of the Schools which in 1893 amounted to £2,482. To entitle them to receive the grant, Reformatories must be certified by the Home Office, under whose control they are, and they must submit to inspection, and comply with prescribed regulations, but otherwise they are managed by local committees, without whose sanction no boy or girl ordered to be sent to a Reformatory can be received.

Reformatories,
1893, p. 11.

Interim detention.—One result of the latter provision is, that juvenile offenders, B except in cases where local authorities have made special arrangements, cannot be sent direct to a Reformatory, but must be detained, and often they are sent to prison for detention until arrangements for their reception in a Reformatory can be made. Such interim detention is permitted where necessary for a period not exceeding 14 days.¹ The Act of 1893 permits of this temporary detention taking place in a poorhouse or other approved place not being a prison, and in view of our strong conviction of the undesirability of sending children to prison when it can be avoided,

We recommend that the power of committing children consigned to reformatories C for interim detention in prisons should be abolished.* We further recommend that local authorities should be encouraged or compelled to make arrangements with reformatories for the reception of children committed to them by Courts within their district.

This might easily be done by requiring such arrangements to be made as a condition D towards the payment of the imperial grant in aid of the police. At present, juveniles committed to a reformatory when the statutory period of interim detention expires, unless some reformatory has consented to receive them, must be discharged, and the same in similar circumstances is the case with juveniles sentenced to imprisonment and subsequent detention in a reformatory. The arrangement we suggest would obviate this in the great majority of cases, but not in all. Under a regulation of the Home Office a medical certificate of health is in every instance required before admission to a reformatory. In Dundee prison, for example, we found a boy who had been repeatedly convicted. He had been ordered to be sent to a reformatory, but as he suffered from lupus of the face no reformatory would receive him. He had consequently to be discharged, and was rapidly degenerating into a regular gaol-bird. To meet such cases, we would recommend

That when a juvenile offender committed to a reformatory is found to be ineligible E for admission on the ground of health, he should be sent to a poorhouse to be detained there for medical treatment until liberated on a report by the medical officer of the poorhouse to the magistrate or court which had committed him, which magistrate or court should have power at his or its discretion to cancel his commitment, or modify its terms if the obstacle to his reception had been removed, and to make such order generally as would best meet the exigencies of the case.

The same rule might, with modifications, be with advantage made applicable to the F much rarer cases of friendless reformatory inmates discharged before completion of their sentence in consequence of illness.

The Success of Reformatory Work.—The question of the efficiency of reformatory G schools for the purpose for which they are designed has a very important bearing both on the proper treatment of juvenile delinquents and on the probable success of any reformatory treatment of adult habitual offenders. We have, therefore, gone into this branch of the subject with great care. The Inspector of Reformatories receives reports concerning pupils discharged from reformatory and industrial schools for three years after their discharge, and his annual reports contain tables showing the number of cases reported on, the number of those doing well, of those convicted, and of those classed as 'doubtful' and 'unknown.' Concerning ourselves only with those respecting whom there is a positive report, we find that in Scotland

* In view of the case of the girl of 13 imprisoned as a witness, referred to page xxxvii, paragraph C., we would further suggest that the provisions of the Act of 1893 as to the temporary detention of youthful offenders committed to Reformatories in other places than prisons, should be extended to include the case of witnesses under 16 years of age whom it is deemed necessary to retain in custody.

A the number of cases reported as 'doing well' or 'convicted' for the last five years for which reports have been issued, has been as follows:—

Total,	2,755	2,119	472

Showing a total of 76·91 per cent. of boys reported on as 'doing well,' and 17·13 as 'convicted' within three years of their dismissal from the Reformatories.

1892	625	571	10
1893	613	564	10
Total,	3,247	2,980	41

Showing a total of 91·7 per cent. of girls reported on as 'doing well,' and 1·26 per cent. as 'convicted' within three years of their dismissal from Industrial Schools.

B In connection with these statistics, the curious fact deserves to be noted that while the percentage of females reported as 'unknown,' i.e., as having escaped from surveillance, during the three years reported on, is twice as great in Scotland as in England in the case of Reformatories (being 10 per cent. in the latter country against 20 per cent. in the former),—in the case of Industrial School girls, exactly the reverse holds good, the ratio of such 'unknowns' being under 5 per cent. in Scotland, as against 12 per cent. in England.

C The report of the Inspector of Reformatories each year contains a further paragraph quoting from reports sent to him by the prison authorities, the number of prisoners in English and Scottish prisons who during the year had been identified as having been inmates of Reformatory Schools. In the case of the Scottish prisons, the figures for the last five years for which we have the annual report on Reformatories is as follows:—

Year.	Males.	Females.	Total.
1889,	127	6	133
1890,	142	11	153
1891,	204	11	215
1892,	202	15	217
1893,	178	13	191
Total,	853	56	909

D Before passing from the reports of the Inspector of Reformatories, we would point out that the proportion of ex-reformatory prisoners recognised in Scottish gaols is very much larger than that in England.

Being struck with the number of persons whom we encountered in prison who A were stated to have passed through Reformatory or Industrial Schools, we obtained from the Secretary to the Scottish Prison Commissioners independent returns for 1894, which will be found in our Appendix.¹ These returns show that 248 prisoners received in Scottish prisons during 1894 were recognised as former inmates of Reformatories, and 317 as former inmates of Industrial Schools.

A Statistical Comparison.—For the purpose of ascertaining how the percentage B of ex-reformatory and ex-industrial school population committed during the year compared with the corresponding percentage in the general population, we obtained from the office of the Inspector of Reformatories a return showing the number of inmates annually discharged from Reformatories and Industrial Schools in Scotland since their establishment there. These figures we submitted to Mr J. Stewart, F.F.A., F.I.A., actuary to the City of Glasgow Insurance Company, who most obligingly calculated for us actuarially the probable surviving population which the respective numbers represented,² and the following table gives the results worked out on this basis :—

In dealing with these figures we must of course bear in mind that in the case of ex-C reformatory and ex-industrial school pupils identified, they necessarily fall short of the actual percentage. In view of the information required by the Reformatory Department, prison officials naturally question young prisoners as to whether they have been in a Reformatory or Industrial School, and in many cases recognise them as having been imprisoned before being sent to Reformatories. So long as a prisoner so identified is sent to the same prison, he is recognised and identified; but if he shifts his quarters, and after the lapse of a few years is sent to prison elsewhere, unless he happens to have been placed on the register of habitual criminals, the trace of his Reformatory career may be, and doubtless often is, lost. The same considerations, however, apply to the case of males and females and to ex-inmates of Reformatories and Industrial Schools; and the foregoing table is instructive as illustrating the different results afforded by the ratio of imprisonment to living population in the case of males and females and of the former pupils of Reformatories and Industrial Schools, respectively. The results shown do not lead one to doubt that the high percentage of cases 'doing well'³ reported during the first three years after their dismissal from Reformatories and Industrial Schools to a large extent holds good in the later portion of their career. It indicates, too, very markedly the much greater amenability to reformatory and educational influences manifested by females as compared with males, but it shows also that where females become habitual offenders they find their way to prison much oftener than males, doubtless owing to the shortness of the sentences inflicted for the offences into which they are prone to fall (offences connected with drunkenness and prostitution) as compared to the long terms which males run the risk of incurring when they gravitate into the ranks of habitual criminals. That this is the case is shown by the fact that at Peterhead 20 of the 330 male convicts confined there during 1894 had at one time been inmates of Reformatory or Industrial Schools.⁴

⁴ Appendix LXXV. c.

A Speaking roundly, the proportion of ex-pupils convicted within three years after their discharge is about four times as great in the Reformatory as in the Industrial School class,¹ and this general result accords, though not to the same extent, with the results brought out in our last table. The latter shows that while the percentage of individuals committed to population in the ex-reformatory class was largely in excess of the normal ratio of commitments to population, that of the ex-industrial school class pretty closely approximated to it. Reformatories, and especially male Reformatories, are therefore institutions where, in our opinion, young persons should not be lightly sent, and we recommend

That no young person in future, who has not been convicted of a crime punishable by penal servitude, shall be committed to a Reformatory except for a second or subsequent offence.

We further recommend that the period of residence in those institutions should be shortened by a more extensive use of the power of licensing out, and that in the case of males, a much more frequent use should be made of the power of apprenticing to trades as provided for by the Act of 1891, a system which is adopted with the greatest success by some Parochial Boards in the case of boarded-out children under their care.

B This appears at present to be generally the practice in the case of girls who are in large numbers sent out 'to service,' in the first place under licence, and find themselves established in the ranks of honest workers, and probably removed from all old associations, before they become free agents.

C An Unwise Economy.—Male prisoners who have passed through Reformatories, whom we have cross-examined, have shown a wide acquaintance with other ex-reformatory pupils. They have told us that on returning to their native towns after their discharge they got among old companions; that youths discharged, even when not personally known, were recognised as from a Reformatory by the clothes they wore, and so introduced into the set—and on inquiry we find that this statement is not unfounded. While so much money is expended on our Reformatories, it is folly to permit their work to be neutralised, even to a slight extent, for the sake of petty economies in the clothes presented to pupils on leaving, and no trouble should be spared to settle them in a district removed from all old associations, and to avoid all chance of their being tempted back into the criminal ranks.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

D There were in Scotland in 1893 in all 28 certified Industrial Schools. Two of these were training ships for boys, the 'Empress,' the 'Mars,' (with her tender the 'Lightning'), and of the remainder three were mixed schools for boys and girls. The total inmates under detention in schools, on the 31st December of that year, were 3298 boys and 1294 girls; on licence, 213 boys and 53 girls; and retained in school, sentence expired, 8 boys and 7 girls—in all, 4873. Their ages ranged from 6 to 16. These schools are maintained by a Treasury allowance,—varying largely according to class and age of case, and amounting in 1893 in all to £55,384,—by subscriptions, legacies, &c., contributions from county, burgh, and district authorities; by payments from parents and Parochial Boards (amounting in 1893 to £5585); hire of labour (£1189); and 'sundries'; and the nett profit of their industrial departments was £4962, 19s. 11d. The average cost per head in 1893 was for boys £14, 18s. (against £19, 0s. 4d. in England) and for girls £13, 10s. 9d. (against £17, 10s. 5d. in England).²

² Report Inspector of Reformatories for 1893, page 33.

E The children who may be sent to industrial schools are (a) those found begging; (b) those found wandering, and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence; (c) those found destitute, or orphans, or having a surviving parent, who is in prison or penal servitude; (d) consorting with thieves. In addition to these, under another sub-section of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, children under 12, charged with a crime, may be sent to an Industrial School, but they must not be formally convicted, otherwise they are disqualified; and under a third section, unmanageable children can be committed at the parents' request. Under the Industrial Schools Act, 1880, children living with prostitutes, and frequenting their company, can be committed to industrial schools, as they can also now be under the Day

Industrial Schools Act, 1893, and the Prevention of Cruelty Act, 1894. Details as to the whole legal position of the matter are fully and clearly given in Memoranda drawn up by Miss Flora Stevenson and Professor Dove Wilson,¹ which will be found in our Appendix, and we need not therefore repeat them.

In his report for 1893, p. 11, the Inspector of Reformatories and Industrial Schools writes as follows:—‘I should like to see powers given to managers of Industrial Schools to deal with their children beyond the age of 16. Children who have found their way into the schools, less from any fault of their own than from the culpable negligence of their parents, should not be allowed to fall under their influence again. A good deal has been done in this direction of late years, by allowing managers to place in situations, to enlist, or even to emigrate children, without their parents’ consent, where the character of the parents or of the homes is notoriously bad. But something more than this is wanted; and where parents are not to be trusted with their children, the managers should be allowed to act in loco parentis until the age of 18 at the earliest. In Victoria, managers have very extended powers till the juvenile is of age, the parents being completely set aside where they have entirely neglected their duties towards their children. I cannot help thinking that the Colonial Legislature has taken a sensible view of the case.’ We observe with satisfaction that the recommendation embodied in the above extract has been given effect to by an Act passed in 1894.

With regard to these institutions, we repeat the recommendation that we have made for Reformatories—viz., that every opportunity should be taken to secure that a large proportion of the boys should be efficiently taught a trade, whether in the school itself or by sending out the boys, after their literary education has been completed, into ordinary workshops.

ADMINISTRATION OF REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

Finally, in the case both of Reformatories and Industrial Schools in Scotland, we are strongly of opinion that the control and supervision should be transferred from the department of the Home Secretary to that of the Secretary for Scotland, in which is already centred the control of Scottish Prisons, Poor Law Administration, and Education.

The Irish Reformatories and Industrial Schools are administered from Dublin Castle, but independently of this precedent, it is of great practical importance, in order to enable the results of a system on which much public money is spent to be efficiently checked and followed up, that these institutions should be administered by the same head as the Prisons and the Poor-Law. From an educational point of view, too, it is absurd that the inmates of Reformatories, Industrial Schools, and Day Industrial Schools should be taught according to the English Code, and the rest of the community according to the Scotch. As illustrating the practical effect of this anomaly, we may mention that on visiting a girls’ Industrial School at Dundee, we found in the highest class a number of girls going through the Fifth (English) Standard. About half of them had already passed in that Standard; about a quarter of them had already passed it twice, and were now going up a third time, while one girl had passed it three times, and was now going through it for the fourth time. Under the Scotch Code, these girls could have advanced to Standards VI and Ex-VI. Again, in the case of Day Industrial Schools, whence children are constantly being transferred to Board Schools, the anomaly of working under distinct codes requires no argument to make manifest its bad effect. Independently, however, of purely educational considerations, we have already remarked on the importance of avoiding anything that in after-life may ear-mark pupils trained at Reformatory or Industrial Schools, and nothing can be more likely to lead to their identification than the fact that, being Scots, the standards as known to them differ entirely from the standards familiar to the general Scottish population. The transfer of Reformatory and Industrial Schools to the administration of the Secretary for Scotland, involving, of course, the control of their education by the Scotch Education Department, would get rid of this evil, extend the choice of Scottish teachers available, and enable the inspection, so far as educational requirements are concerned, to be undertaken by the Inspectors of the Department instead of being intrusted to an officer who, however willing and able he may be, has other

A important details to attend to, and whose responsibility extends over an area, the size of which alone must render effective supervision a matter of extreme difficulty.

B The Orphan Homes of Scotland.—We must not pass from the subject of Reformatory and Industrial Institutions without a reference to the excellent work done at Mr. Quarrier's Orphan Homes. These Homes, a magnificent range of buildings situated at the Bridge of Weir, have been constructed and are maintained by voluntary contributions. Although, if Mr. Quarrier chose, he might claim a handsome donation from the Education Grant, he informed us that he prefers to keep himself entirely free from Government interference and control. The average daily number of children resident at the Homes is about 1,200, while that in the Reformatory Schools in Scotland is 872, and in the Industrial Schools 4,878—together 5,745. Besides a considerable sum made up by voluntary contributions, each Reformatory inmate costs the State about £13 per annum, and each Industrial School child over £11; while the total cost at Mr. Quarrier's Homes, including outfit and emigration expenses, is only between £11 and £12 per head.¹ q. 10,17a. Of the children who pass through these Homes many have been in prison, and the rest belong to very much the same class as Industrial School children. The training they receive too is very similar, comprising not merely primary education but instruction in a variety of trades and industries. There is one essential difference, however, between the system pursued at Mr. Quarrier's Homes and that adopted in Reformatory and Industrial Schools, and that is to be found in the much shorter period of training at his institution which he considers necessary in order to transform the mannerless, ignorant, and, it may be, criminal waif or street arab into the civilised and God-fearing boy or girl, who with a very moderate amount of help, guidance and supervision will honestly make for himself a respectable position in the world. Acting on this principle, out of his average daily population of 1,200, 250 are annually drafted to Canada and about 200 placed out in this country—a percentage very much in excess of that shown by Industrial Schools. The results of his Canadian emigration scheme have been especially satisfactory. Some 4,000 children have already been sent out to the Dominion. Many of them are married; some of them are now grandparents; and many of them have achieved excellent positions. In Canada their career is carefully and permanently watched by Mr. Quarrier's son-in-law and daughter, who superintend his work on the other side, and by Mr. Quarrier himself in the course of his frequent visits to the Colony; and he assures us that 98 per cent. of the 4,000 are known to be doing well, and that he does not believe that it would be possible to find the names of 1 per cent. on the prison records of Canada. This is a much better result than that claimed for our Industrial School children, even within the three years during which they are kept under observation; and in view of this fact, it seems to us that a useful lesson is to be drawn from the results of the two methods of reformatory treatment of the young, and that the principle adopted by Mr. Quarrier—that of a comparatively short moral and educational training and a speedy transfer of his charges to a country where they are kept under supervision and effectually cut off from old companionship and old surroundings—might with advantage be borne in mind by those in charge of our Industrial Schools.

PART IV.—HABITUAL INEBRIATES.

C The remaining class regarding which your remit calls on us to report is that of Habitual Inebriates. These may be divided for practical purposes into two classes: (a) those who find their way into the hands of the police and into prison, and (b) those who simply come within the definition of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, as 'persons who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, are, notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to themselves or others, or are incapable of managing themselves and their affairs.'

D Habitual-Offender Inebriates.—As to the first category, the proposals which we have already made under the head of Habitual Offenders fully meet their case. When dealing with that head, we called attention to the fact that habitual offenders seldom confined their appearances before the magistrate to one specific offence, but ran more or less through the whole list of those with which we have had to deal, branching off in the case of male offenders into more serious crimes, indictable or punishable by penal servitude. We illustrated this by analysing a return² as to ³ Appendix female Habituals in Dundee, and we may further do so by briefly referring to ^{LII.}

some other evidence on the subject which we have collected. Thus a return¹ A showing persons brought before the Dundee Police Court during the month of November 1894 for assault, breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct,—but excluding persons charged with being drunk and incapable, driving without lights, football-playing in the streets, brothel-keeping, shebeening, and contraventions of local bye-laws,—shows that of 130 males charged with these offences, only 17 were sober when the offences charged against them were committed; that of 41 females so charged, only 6 were sober; and that of the whole 171, over 86½ per cent. were under the influence of drink when the offence was committed. Had drunk and incapables been included, this percentage would, of course, have been largely increased, and we are well within the mark if we take it that 90 to 95 per cent. of the adult offenders charged before police magistrates in Scotland with offences other than contraventions of local police regulations are under the influence of drink at the time when the offences are committed.

XI.

From an 'analysis of the offences of males apprehended in Edinburgh upwards of B '4 times in 1893' which will be found in our Appendix² it appears that 46 men were responsible for 282 apprehensions. Seventeen of them had run up their record (two to the extent of 7 apprehensions within the year) exclusively on charges of 'breach of the peace or assault.' Four had achieved their record (one to the extent of 7 apprehensions within the year) exclusively on the charge of 'drunk and incapable.' One had been apprehended 5 times for begging only, and another 5 times for theft only, and the remaining 23 had mixed records. But, with the two exceptions of the beggar and the thief, in every case when the record does not include 'drunk and incapable,' it includes 'breach of the peace or assault,' charges rarely dissociated from drunkenness.

II.

As to women, an analysis of the offences for which female offenders in Glasgow C Prison were convicted 6 times and upwards in 1893³ reveals some curious facts. The return records the cases of 238 prisoners, of whom 45, with convictions ranging from 6 to 17 each, had had no other charge against them than 'drunk'; only 3 of the 238 had no charge of drunkenness against them; 2 more had been imprisoned, one 7 and the other 8 times, exclusively for breach of the peace, and the remaining 188 had mixed records, generally including importuning, and less frequently breach of the peace and petty theft. Of the 238, 200 had been imprisoned 3 times or upwards for drunkenness during the year, and of these, 2 had each been sent to prison 18 times and four 17 times during the year for that offence.

Q. 286-7.

Rapid Intoxication and 'Finish' Drinking.—The rapidity and frequency with which D some of these wretched women contrive to get drunk is astounding. When visiting one of the Glasgow Police Offices we saw a woman lying in a cell dead drunk. The Inspector informed us that she had been arrested in the course of the day and locked up; that her son and daughter had come to look for her, and wanted to take her home, but she was still too drunk to be let out; that after a few hours, when she had sobered, she was liberated on leaving a pledge, and that within a couple of hours she had been again apprehended and locked up in the condition in which we found her. In giving evidence before us, Mr Motion, Inspector of Poor to the Barony Parish, Glasgow, detailed the history of a woman named Jane M'Polland.⁴ He told us that this woman, whose mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother had all been chargeable to the parish, and whose illegitimate child was then boarded out by the parish, was 34 years of age; that since 1878 she had been almost continuously chargeable in Barnhill and other poorhouses; that she was in the habit of quitting the poorhouse 'when sufficiently recovered for 'another booze,' and when at liberty subsisted by begging and prostitution; that she had been convicted 63 different times since September 1887, and had been in prison 737 days, the charges against her being drunkenness, disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, malicious mischief, importuning, and theft. 'Since this statement was made up,' Mr Motion went on to say, 'she appeared last Wednesday at the office about 4.15 in the 'afternoon. She had been dismissed from Duke Street Prison that morning, and when 'she appeared in the afternoon she was almost unable to stand. She did fall in a heap 'at the applicant clerk's window, and then Mr Ferguson, my chief assistant, went to 'her side, and she was so weak or incapable that he had to put his ear to her lips, but 'even then could get no answer to his questions, and could make nothing of her. He 'sent for two constables, and she was taken to the Central Police Office, and again sent to prison.' On the following day, about 11 o'clock, while your Committee were taking other evidence, a note from Mr Motion was handed to the Chairman, in which it was stated

A that M'Polland had again appeared at his office drunk, and that he had sent her to the Municipal Buildings, where we were sitting, as a sort of object-lesson in support of his evidence. On calling in the Removing Officer he informed us¹ that M'Polland was at that moment lying in a state of stupor in a room below ('but,' he added, 'in endeavouring to get her to rise, she may get up and drive at me'); that she had got out of prison that morning, and at once got drunk, but that he had no idea where she got the drink. 'On many occasions,' he told us, 'he had taken a cab and gone with her to the poorhouse, so as to keep her till the doctor gave the necessary certificate,' and he intended doing so then unless she made herself so noisy that the police would take her up. Female prisoners with whom we spoke on the subject informed us that when dismissed from prison they were plied with offers of drink, and could generally get as much of it as they wanted, although they could not get food. Many of these drunkards, too, drink 'finish' (a solution of shellac in methylated spirits, used in furniture polishing), of which a couple of penceworth suffices to produce insensibility.

B The case of inebriates of this criminal class would be fully met by provisions for adult Reformatories, which we have recommended and explained in dealing with the general subject of habitual offenders. Into the 'Labour Settlements' which we have described they would gravitate automatically, and there they would be restrained for prolonged periods from drink, and subjected to the influences best calculated, according to the evidence of all who have made a study of the question, to cure them of their infirmity. That in many of these inveterate cases no permanent cure would be effected we should expect, but the inebriate would at least be kept sober and out of mischief for periods which would give him every chance; wherever he was able to do so, he would be compelled to contribute by his labour towards his maintenance, and society generally would benefit by getting rid of an expensive nuisance, and a source of danger and demoralisation to the community.

C Habitual Inebriates within the meaning of the Inebriates Acts.—We come now to the second class of inebriates, those, namely, who do not fall within the ken of the police, but are within the definition given in the Habitual Drunkards Act 1879, namely, that by reason of habitual intemperance they are at times dangerous to themselves or others, or are incapable of managing themselves and their affairs. Regarding this unfortunate class a large amount of evidence was placed before your Committee. The misery caused by them in many domestic circles in all ranks of the community is very great. Some of the clergymen who were witnesses had given much attention to the matter, and taken considerable trouble to arrive at some idea of the extent of the evil. The Rev. D. M. Ross of Dundee,² who has made the subject a special study, stated that 87 non-criminal habitual inebriates were known by 28 ministers in Dundee in connection with their pastoral work.³ The representative of the Glasgow Presbytery said there were hundreds of such cases; and the Rev. Dr Blaikie,⁴ that in all classes of society, the upper as well as the lower, this evil prevails. The unanimous opinion presented was, that if anything could be done to relieve the many households throughout the country which suffered silently from the affliction of having among their members an habitual inebriate, and, if possible, to effect the reformation of the individual himself, a very great step would be secured towards the social well-being of the country.

D One illustration of the extent to which this unanimity prevails, mentioned to us by Mr Martin, an Edinburgh missionary, was so unique that we give it in his own words:⁵ 'A week last Monday night, I was in our Reading and Recreation Rooms in the Canongate. I went out about half-past seven o'clock to where there might be close upon 100 men drawn from model lodging-houses, &c., and I asked them if they would give me half-an-hour to discuss with them the best method of treating habitual drunkards. At first there was a little resentment, which arose out of their thinking that they were to be treated as criminals. But when I explained to them that they would be treated from a medical stand-point, they at once started to discuss the question, and after a good deal of discussion I put it to the meeting that habitual drunkards be treated irrespective of their own wills; and at once it was unanimously agreed that that would be a great boon and blessing for habitual drunkards.'

EXISTING RETREATS.

In dealing with the subject it seems best to set out at some length the various A means at present existing in Scotland for coping with the evil. The provisions of the Inebriates Acts extend to Scotland, but no licensed retreat exists in that country. There, are, however, several unlicensed institutions where inebriates, whose friends can induce them to enter them, are cared for. The largest of these is Queensberry House and Lodge, Edinburgh. That institution consists of two separate buildings devoted to different purposes, but within the same enclosure, and under the same Committee of Management and the same Governor, Major M'Cartney.

Queensberry Lodge.—The lodge is described as 'a temperance home instituted for B ' ladies,' and is also an invalid home.¹ The number of its inmates varies from 12 to 20, and in November 1894, when we visited it, there were about 16,² about half of whom were inebriate cases.³ The inmates pay from £50 to £100 a year—the majority of them £50 or £60.⁴ The money to build the lodge was originally raised by subscription,⁵ and it is self-supporting, and yields a profit⁶ of about £50 or £100, occasionally rising to £200 a year,⁷ which goes towards the maintenance of Queensberry House, which is not self-supporting. The number of admissions into the lodge from 1886 to 1893 was 759,⁸ of whom about half would be inebriates.⁹ This would give an average of about 54 inebriates per annum, and allowing for the shorter stay of invalid cases, and assuming even 15 of the 20 beds to have been monopolised by inebriates, the figures would show the average residence in the lodge to be between three and four months. Some of the inmates, however, reside there permanently,¹⁰ and would count as only one 'admission,' and as they encroach on the available accommodation the average stay of the remainder must have been correspondingly less. According to Major M'Cartney,¹¹ 'those who stayed there for a year or two rarely returned, that is to say, if the crave for 'drink had been starved out of their system, but if they had been in for a short time they 'frequently came back sometimes two or three times over.' The inmates of Queensberry Lodge are allowed out, but never unaccompanied by the Matron, Chaplain, or Governor, and on one occasion¹² when the last named had taken some ladies out to buy Christmas presents for their children, one of the ladies absconded. She was, however, subsequently brought back by her husband, who was a minister. If friends come to visit the inmates they must, before admission, give their word that they have no liquor about them. If there is any reason to suspect their truthfulness they are searched.¹³ Occasionally the inebriate inmates prove restive, and write to their law-agent or to the Sheriff, and the latter advises them to remain, or the Governor to release them, as he thinks proper.¹⁴

Queensberry House.—Queensberry House is a much larger establishment. It C embraces separate departments for men and women, and people of all classes are received as boarders at from 4s. 6d. to 10s. per week.¹⁵ It contains about 300 inmates altogether,¹⁶ of whom 200 are females,¹⁷ and embraces a hospital for 54 patients, half of them incurable,¹⁸ night shelters for 20 men and 20 women, and a department which supplies 100 poor children with food gratis, and a number of others at a penny per meal.¹⁹ Among the inmates are a number of pensioners, male and female,²⁰ young persons under detention while arrangements are being made for their committal to reformatories and industrial schools, and for whose keep the Local Authorities pay an annual subscription of £50, boarded-out paupers, and inebriates, of whom among the females there are about 50,²¹ and among the males about 12.²² Besides boarders, who pay in the aggregate over £3000 a year,²³ destitute men and women are admitted, and are made to do the work of the establishment in return for their keep. The institution is not self-supporting, and the deficiency is met by subscriptions from the public. The inebriates either come in of their own accord (often as 'destitutes') or are sent in by fathers, husbands, brothers, or other relatives on whom they depend. Sometimes a husband and wife come in together (apparently each escorting the other), and are both taken in.²⁴ To quote Major M'Cartney,²⁵ 'an unfortunate man will tell you that he cannot work by 'day or sleep by night owing to a drunken wife, and he asks me if I will take her in. 'If she is not willing to come, I do not mind taking her in until we sober her and put 'her into a right state of mind, and try to teach her by her surroundings the folly of 'her procedure.' In reply to the next question,²⁶ Major M'Cartney said that to accomplish this would take probably a month, possibly two. 'We have,' the witness went on,²⁷ 'a 'place called the nursery where we take in the first cases, and we have a moderate

A ' strong woman who is able to look after them. We give them as much buttermilk and
' potass water mixed up together as they can drink, and they drink any quantity of
' it. We give it to both men and women, and sometimes we give the buttermilk alone.'

B After that stage, Major M'Cartney keeps the patients within bounds for two months, and then commences gradually to entrust them with liberty, beginning on Sundays when the public-houses are shut, and stopping short at Saturday, when the temptations are too great.¹ After a certain time, however, there is no restraint placed, ^{Q. 3090.} upon their liberty,² but 'if they return under the influence,' added the governor, 'I shut' ^{Q. 3097.} ' them up for two months according to the rules.' If they refuse to submit they are turned out of the institution. Everybody is searched on coming into the house, and a prize of a shilling given for every bottle detected either on a boarder or a servant.³ The ^{Q. 3088.} results of this treatment are described as satisfactory. To quote the official report, 'information cannot in all cases be obtained as to the benefit derived, but good accounts ' have been received in regard to a large number of boarders, particularly those who ' have resided in the Home for a period of four months or longer.'

C Brownsland Home.—A small retreat concerning which we received a most satisfactory account, was the Brownsland Home for Female Inebriates, Peeblesshire. Mrs Lockhart, the honorary secretary of the Institution, who gave her evidence with exceptional clearness and intelligence, informed us that this Home had been in existence since March 1876, that it can accommodate 12 women, and that since it started, 190⁴ have ^{Q. 5728.} passed through it.⁵ So far as her information went, 78 of these had been quite reformed. ^{Q. 5789.} Women are not received unless they come willingly and sign a paper undertaking to comply with the rules—a copy of which is sent them, and which include an undertaking to stay there a year. Formerly, the residence stipulated for was six months, but the results were unsatisfactory, and it is now raised to twelve months.⁶ The result is that a ^{Q. 5782.} great many applications come to nothing, only 34 admissions having resulted from 122 applications received since 1891.⁷ The written undertaking as to residence, though not ^{Q. 5801.} legally binding, has an excellent moral effect. The want of legal powers was 'continually felt,'⁸ and Mrs Lockhart believed that a large amount of refractory conduct among ^{Q. 5748.} inmates occurred because they knew that the powers of those in control were limited. The charge made to inmates is 7s. per week, the first three months to be paid in advance, and the balance in advance monthly or quarterly, as may be arranged. The object of requiring this prepayment is to obtain a hold on the inmates. The cost per head is nearly double what they pay, being £35 a year, and the balance is made up by subscriptions. The Home is specially designed for women of the poorer classes, and they don't care for lady patients, who are apt to cause trouble, but they have passed through their hands a colonel's wife, a minister's wife, a sheriff's daughter, and a number of governesses.⁹ ^{Q. 5790-93.} The board of inmates is paid for by relatives or friends, and Mrs Lockhart could not recall a case in which it had been paid out of the inmate's own earnings. Although the women sign only for a year, when it is thought advisable an endeavour is made to persuade them to remain for a longer period. Of the 190 inmates passed through the Home, 56 had remained between twelve and eighteen months, 23 for over eighteen months, and 7 for two years.¹⁰ Two of the 7 two-years' cases broke down on dismissal, but ^{Q. 5798-94.} the remaining five did well.¹¹ When the women really desire to escape from the thralldom ^{Q. 5798-5801.} of drink, it is a great help, but when they submit to moral compulsion at the hands of friends, and only remain in the Home because they cannot help it, the prospect is less hopeful.¹² According to the rules of the establishment only women of respectable character ¹² are received, but women have been admitted who would have been refused had the managers known what they subsequently learned, and these women had turned out satisfactorily.¹³ There is only one paid servant in the house, and the inmates are kept busy with ¹³ domestic, gardening, dairy, and other work, and are encouraged to take exercise on the hills around. Examined as to specific cases, Mrs Lockhart evidenced a personal acquaintance with the history of ex-inmates which convinced us that her statement as to the high proportion of reclamations may be relied on. This, for example, is what she said when cross-examined about the colonel's wife above referred to:—

D ' Hers was an exceptional case, because her husband was given to drinking too. They had been in India for many years, and there she had formed the habit. She ' came into the Home by the wish of her friends. I was very averse to take her, simply ' because she was a lady, and the Home was not intended for such. Her husband, how' ever, had commuted a portion of his income, and she came for a period of twenty-two ' months into the Home. She left the institution six years ago, and she is now living in A

' ———, and has done splendidly. She is with her husband, who still takes drink, but 1 Q. 5761-64. ' she has held out notwithstanding.'

Another very encouraging case which Mrs Lockhart described was that of an inmate B who, after doing well in the Retreat, returned to her home in Glasgow.

' Her husband was waiting to meet her at the station there, and the first thing he C
' did on her arrival was to propose that they should go to the refreshment room and ' drink to her return. She declined, and was very indignant, and there was rather a ' row at the station. She would not take the drink, however, and, as a matter of fact,
' she remained an abstainer until her death.'

Isolated Inebriates.—There appear to be one or two other unlicensed retreats for D inebriates in Scotland, and we came across inebriates, within the meaning of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, inmates of other institutions. Thus in the Glasgow Hill Street Shelter for Fallen Women, among the inmates whom we interviewed was a widow (of good character), who, after her husband's death, had taken to drink—habitual drunkenness in 2 M'Cartney, women very frequently appears to date from widowhood,²—had sold her furniture and
Q. 3155. gone out as a cook, been dismissed from one situation after another for drunkenness, and finally been told by her father-in-law, to whom she applied for help, that if she would go into the Hill Street Home for a year and try to reclaim herself he would help her, if not she might go to the poorhouse. She elected to go to the Home, and professed to have quite got rid of all desire for drink. Another similar case we found in Lochburn (Magdalene) Establishment, near Glasgow—a wife (of good character) whose husband had induced her to try a two years' residence there as a cure for drunkenness. When we visited the institution she had rather overstayed her time and had been promoted to some petty charge in connection with the laundry.

INEBRIATE PATIENTS IN LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

A number of habitual inebriates throughout Scotland enter lunatic asylums as E voluntary patients. In order to do so they must first obtain permission from the Lunacy Commissioners.³ This in practice is never refused.⁴ Once in they can only leave on giving three days' notice, and during their residence the medical superintendent has the same authority over them that he has over lunatic patients.⁵
4 Q. 10,416. Medical officers of asylums almost unanimously discourage the reception of 5 Q. 10,418. habitual drunkards who are not insane, on the ground that they cause trouble
6 Wilson, and demoralise the lunatic inmates with whom they associate. In Mavisbank Asylum,
Q. 10,466. Polton, however, a contrary policy is pursued, and Dr Wilson, who had been six months medical superintendent there, and who had had four and a-half years' experience at Morningside (where the opposite view is strongly held by Dr Clouston), told us that in his opinion good rather than harm resulted from the admixture of sane inebriates with the ordinary 7 Q. 10,420. inmates of an asylum,⁶ and that he thought that even for the inebriates, association with 8 Q. 10,419. convalescent lunatics who are not drunkards had its advantages.⁷ In Mavisbank there is 9 Q. 10,463. an average of 12 alcoholic and 42 lunatic patients.⁸ The inebriates in a few cases come in of their own free will and at their own expense, from a feeling that they are getting beyond their own control, but they generally consent to enter under compulsion of their 10 Q. 10,487. friends.⁹ They pay at the rate of £100 to £150 a year, and payment for six months is exacted for the purpose of giving the managers 'a financial pull' over the patients—the rule being that if these are discharged before the expiration of the term paid for the balance of their board is refunded, but if they discharge themselves against the advice of the 11 Q. 10,409. medical superintendent or of the family physician the board is forfeited.¹⁰ The period for which they remain varies from six weeks to six months, but as a rule they don't stay 12 Q. 10,408. out the six months.¹¹ Dr Wilson considered that 'suggestion' would be even more effective in the treatment of uneducated than that of educated patients, frankly avowing that 'the method of treatment by suggestion is largely based on the gullibility of 13 Q. 10,500. 'the patient.'¹² He considered that the notion of the drink crave was very much 14 Q. 10,497. exaggerated, and stated that he had found very little of it among his patients.¹³ He believed that with compulsory powers of detention a great many inebriates might be cured, but he did not advocate prolonged detention in every case, stating that he had met with one or two cases in which he had evidence that prolonged detention, even for

A the length of a year, would do more harm than good—cases in which a man would do much better outside, occupied with his work and helped by his friends than exposed to the monotony of an asylum or retreat.

B We have dwelt at some length on Dr Wilson's views, because he was the only medical witness who came before us who approved of the treatment of inebriates in asylums, and because he had arrived at a number of definite conclusions, as the result of a practical experience. The weak point in his evidence was that the cases from his asylum had not been followed up, and, unlike Mrs Lockhart, he was unable to tell us of ultimate results. It should further be borne in mind that the Mavisbank is a private asylum, that therefore in its case the managers may not be in a position to regard the question of the treatment of inebriates in lunatic asylums from so disinterested a point of view as the directors of public lunatic asylums, and that medical officers connected with the latter institutions of such eminence and experience as Dr Yellowlees, Dr Clouston, Dr Rorie and others, condemn the admission of inebriates into lunatic asylums and recommend their treatment in separate institutions. As, however, their objections are based primarily on consideration for the lunatics who are the proper objects of their care, while commending them to the attention of the Scottish Commissioners in Lunacy, dealing, as we have to do, simply with the interests of the inebriates, we do not feel ourselves called on to recommend any change of the present law on the subject.

C We also received evidence from representatives of Committees which had been formed in Dundee to test the efficacy of the so-called 'Tyson Cure,' and in Glasgow that of the 'Metabolic Treatment.'

D 'The Tyson Cure.'—The Rev. David Macrae and Mr Thomson, solicitor, gave evidence on behalf of the Dundee Committee. From their statements it appeared that in consequence of statements published concerning the Tyson Cure the Good Templars of Dundee determined that a trial should be made with it. A Committee was formed, persons of very intemperate habits were selected for treatment, and Dr Tyson's London agent went to Dundee to superintend the experiment, which commenced on the 5th January 1894. The patient was given a bottle of a liquid the composition of which was secret, but of which strychnia was said to form an ingredient, and of this he was to take a small dose hourly for twelve hours each day for twenty-one days. Twice a day those under treatment took these doses under the inspection of members of the Committee. The other doses they were instructed to take as they pursued their avocations. Nineteen patients went through the twenty-one days' course.¹ The result at first seemed very satisfactory, and the Committee reported on the 2nd February 'that the statements made by Dr Tyson up to the close of the treatment were fully justified.'² The Committee followed up the cases. By the 11th of October, or 8½ months after the conclusion of the treatment, all but 4 had relapsed into their old habits. Of the 15 who had done so, however, it was asserted 'that in no case had the lapses been due to a return of the craving.'³ They had all resumed drinking because they wanted to join their old friends.⁴ The regular charge for the treatment was £10 per case,⁵ but if a temperance society recommended a bona fide case, and the party was not able to pay £5 or £6, they would supply it for £2 or £3,⁶ and Tyson's Belfast agent has sent round a circular offering supplies for £2.⁷ The medicine was described as in some cases not merely curing the drink craving, but occasioning a positive aversion to drink.

E 'The Metabolic Cure.'—Regarding the Glasgow experience, Mr King, solicitor, Dr Currie, and Dr Nairne gave evidence. From this it appeared that the Metabolic Treatment, invented by a Mr Coykendall, an American, owed its name to the theory that it effected a change in the tissues of the patient. The regular cost of the treatment is 20 guineas,⁸ but its discoverer made an arrangement with some philanthropic gentlemen in and about Glasgow under which, for a sum of £300 (£100 paid in advance), he accorded them the privilege of putting this treatment within the range of the poor⁹ at a cost, however, of about a guinea for medicine in each case,¹⁰ and Mr King acted as legal agent in the matter. These gentlemen set up an institution which they named the Glasgow Institute for the Treatment of Inebriety, and appointed Dr Currie, an M.D. of Cincinnati, its superintendent. For a time Dr Nairne, a registered medical practitioner, was associated with him, but the connection was severed in consequence of the General

Medical Council bringing Dr Nairne before them on a charge of infamous conduct in a professional respect in associating with Dr Currie. At that Institution 50 paying and 57 non-paying patients had been treated,¹ of whom Mr King stated the number of cures at one-half, and Dr Currie 'roughly two-thirds.'² The treatment consisted of the injection four times a day of a secret preparation which Dr Nairne from its effects supposed to be a compound of strychnine, morphia, and cocaine,³ combined with the administration by the mouth of a medicine which in certain instances Dr Nairne suspected contained an emetic among its ingredients. The result was after the first week to create an aversion to drink which lasted for a month or two,⁴ and patients were allowed to use liquor if they liked while they were undergoing the cure, which extends over three weeks. Mr King stated that they did not call a case successful unless abstinence had been maintained for over a year, and he knew two cases which had remained sober for 2½ years.⁵

Although Messrs Macrae, Thomson, and King had no other interest in these cures than a philanthropic one, and their evidence was doubtless given in all good faith, that of Mr King as to the high percentage of cures in Glasgow was not sufficiently detailed to carry conviction in a matter where the vendors of the medicines kept their nature secret and extracted large sums for their sale, and in connection with one of which the Medical Council had considered it necessary to take such strong measures as had been adopted in the case of Dr Nairne. Moreover, there was no proof in the course of the evidence that any results that were obtained were physical, and not due to 'suggestion' and the use of officinal tonics and well-known drugs, in the manner described by different medical witnesses as constituting an admittedly valuable part of regular therapeutical treatment of alcoholism.

Everything we have heard leads us to believe that no reliance whatever is to be placed upon these secret cures, which in our opinion are absolutely worthless.

The Theory of the Cure of Inebriety.—The opinion of the most eminent medical authorities, many of whom, such as Professor Gairdner, Sir Douglas Maclagan, Dr Yellowlees, Dr Clouston, Dr Urquhart, Dr Nicolson, Dr Norman Kerr, Sir James Crichton-Browne, and others gave evidence before us, is unanimous in bearing out the popular opinion that the effect of inebriety is to destroy the will power of the victim in a manner which can only be remedied by prolonged abstinence from drink—an abstinence which can in the great majority of cases only be ensured by effective physical control, supplemented for restorative purposes by appropriate medical treatment. This view of the subject is advanced not only by the medical gentlemen whom we examined, but practically by the whole medical profession; and the reasons given in support of it have sufficed not only to carry conviction to our minds, but to convince the Select Committee on Habitual Drunkards of 1872, and the Departmental Committee of 1892. We content ourselves by referring to the evidence of the gentlemen whose names we have quoted for particulars of the technical details of what from a psychological and physiological point of view is an extremely interesting problem, and at once proceed to the question of how best practically to deal with the matter.

Inebriates Acts provide only for Voluntary Admissions.—The Inebriates Acts provide only for the compulsory detention in retreats of patients who sign an application for admission and an undertaking to remain there for a given time. This application must be attested by two justices of the peace, who have to explain its effects to the applicants, and who adhibit their signatures only on the production of a statutory declaration signed by two persons that the applicant is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Inebriates Act, 1879. Such patients are known as voluntary patients; but though they may sign the application voluntarily, the majority enter the retreat under strong persuasion or even moral compulsion at the hands of relatives and friends, in precisely the same way as, in the case of the unlicensed retreats and lunatic asylums in Scotland, we have seen that inebriates are constrained into placing themselves under control. In many cases no doubt the persons applying for admission are themselves anxious for help to reform, and good advice, or a generous offer to defray their board, may be sufficient to turn the scale and induce them to enter a retreat or asylum; but in a large number of instances the step is taken, often very reluctantly, in obedience to a husband, father, or other purse-bearer, who gives the inebriate the alternative of treatment in an institution, or expulsion from home and the stoppage of further supplies.

A Want of Power of Compulsory Commitment.—Besides persons amenable to such influences, there are many habitual inebriates, and those of a class probably the most noxious to the community, who themselves are the purse-bearers and heads of families, and the want of some means of dealing with this class of cases has long been acutely felt. Provision for this purpose was contained in the Habitual Drunkards Bill of 1878, but at that time the whole idea was novel in this country, and it was found necessary by the promoters of the Bill, in order to carry the principle of the compulsory detention of habitual drunkards, to throw overboard every detail to which serious opposition was raised. Now, however, the experiment on a small scale has been in operation for many years, and there is a popular demand for its extension.

B Inebriates of the Wealthier Classes.—In dealing with such there is no great difficulty in suggesting the necessary legislative machinery. They or their friends can pay for their support in a retreat, and there is no departure from precedent in vesting property, if they have any, in a curator¹ for the support of their families while they are under treatment, and, with a proper judicial tribunal to decide whether the person whose committal is asked for is or is not an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Act, and to take care that his property is honestly administered, everything that is necessary is provided for. But a much more serious difficulty exists in connection with this class of cases which no amount of legislation can affect, and that is the indisposition of wives and children to apply legal compulsion to husbands and parents on whom they depend, and the reluctance of husbands and fathers to face that publicity which, if asked for by the recalcitrant inebriate, it would be impossible in the interest of the liberty of the subject to refuse. How far such considerations would operate to prevent the class of inebriates to which we refer from being dealt with, experience alone can show.

XXX.—R. P.
Lamond.

C The Inebriate Poor.—When we come to them the question is more difficult, and yet it is one of such pressing urgency that no proposal for dealing with the subject which did not endeavour to meet the difficulty could be regarded as at all complete. For our purposes, inebriates coming under this category may be divided into two classes. The first consists of persons who get drunk constantly, ill-treat their wives and families, and reduce them to beggary, but manage to keep clear of the police, and by their actions give no serious cause of offence to their neighbours. The wife or mother who is kicked or beaten during these drinking bouts is probably the person of all others most anxious to conceal the inebriate's misdeeds. If she chooses to do so, no legislation can compel her to make them public.

D Wife-beating Cases.—If the wife cares to call in the police, the recommendations which we have made as to habitual offenders would with a slight addition meet her case. Thus in Greenock prison we came across a prisoner whose habit it was when at liberty to get drunk whenever he could, and whenever he got drunk to beat his wife. She retaliated by calling in the police, and his record of imprisonments was such as would long ago have relegated him to a Labour Settlement had the plan we have recommended been in operation. As it was, he candidly admitted, as a matter of course, that when he got out he would get drunk again, and equally as a matter of course that in his drunkenness he would avenge upon his wife the hardships of his imprisonment.

E To meet such cases (and though we have quoted an extreme one, such cases are not rare)

We recommend the extension to Scotland of a provision of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, Section 4 of which provides that if a husband is convicted of an aggravated assault on his wife, the magistrate before whom he is tried, if satisfied that the future safety of the wife is in peril, may order that the wife shall no longer be bound to cohabit with the husband, which order shall have the effect in all respects of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and the magistrate may further order a weekly sum to be paid to the wife for her support, and may give her the custody of children under the age of ten.

F Committal at Instance of Friends.—So far as the poor inebriate under the Act of 1879 is concerned, with powers of compulsory commitment, the working man would stand in the eye of the law in the same position as the merchant or professional man, so long as he could, on cause shown, obtain that commitment on providing for the support of his wife. By the intervention of philanthropic institutions he can already do so at very much less than cost price; and the utmost recommendation which we consider ourselves justified in making to meet his case is that local authorities should be empowered to subscribe towards licensed retreats in consideration of their receiving at reduced rates inebriate cases recommended by them, and that in districts in which no such arrangement had been made, or where the rates stipulated for were higher than the friends of the inebriate could afford, the Sheriff might commit him to a Labour Settlement or Poorhouse, so long as his friends continued to pay a sum to be fixed by Rule, from time to time, by the Secretary for Scotland, and calculated not to exceed the nett cost of his maintenance in one or other of these institutions.

Committal at instance of Procurator-Fiscal.—There is, however, a second class of B inebriates within the meaning of the Act of 1879 who manage to keep clear of the police, but who yet give rise to so much annoyance to their neighbours that we think that the Procurator-Fiscal in the public interest should be empowered to take steps for their compulsory committal. A man, for example, living in a tenement house, constantly comes home drunk, terrifying the female and infant population of the building, but doing nothing which can render him liable to imprisonment. After he enters his rooms blows and wrangling are heard, keeping the neighbours awake night after night, but as the wife will not complain, or, if she does, perjures herself when the case comes up to obtain her husband's acquittal, he escapes, and the annoyance continues. In such a case we think the aggrieved neighbours should be entitled to lodge a complaint with the Procurator-Fiscal, and that if, on investigation, he considers it a proper case for the committal of the man as an habitual inebriate within the meaning of the Act of 1879, he should be empowered to bring him before the Sheriff and apply for his committal to a retreat, in the same manner as he at present does in the case of a dangerous or offensive lunatic.¹ If the inebriate, or any one responsible for his support, pay, he should be ordered to do so and allowed to select the retreat; if not, we consider that, the step being taken in the public interest and at the instance of a public prosecutor, the inebriate should be committed at the public cost to a Labour Settlement or poorhouse, as the Sheriff may think fit.

Q. 14,082.

Every Retreat should be licensed.—With regard to habitual inebriates who simply C come within the definition of the Act of 1879, we have arrived at the conviction that every institution or home receiving more than a small maximum number of inmates, or in which any inebriate is detained for longer than six months, should be licensed and inspected. At the present moment, in every house licensed under the Inebriates Act, as the condition of the powers of detention which those Acts confer upon licencees, the retreats are subject to inspection and controlled by the Home Office. The object of this inspection and that control is to secure the liberty of the subject. But it is open to any one who chooses to disregard the law, and detain patients as best he can, to set up an unlicensed retreat and conduct it as he likes, subject only to the risk of having actions raised against him for false imprisonment. In Scotland, although there are, as we have seen, several inebriate retreats none of them are licensed, and in England of all the retreats for inebriates only eight are licensed.² We don't wish to say that those who carry them on resort to illegal compulsion in a manner prejudicial to the well-being of the patients, but no one can have read the résumé which we have given of Major M'Cartney's evidence—of his reception of inmates when drunk, and his retention of them indoors for two months—without feeling that although that gentleman's mode of procedure was doubtless dictated by the very best intentions, in the hands of a man who had a direct interest in the board of those in his establishment it might lead to very dangerous results. On our visit to Queensberry Lodge, for example, we found a lady who told us that she had been persuaded by her husband to go in for a month, and who complained bitterly that she had been kept there four and a half years. She admitted that she was not forcibly detained, and that she remained there because her husband refused to take her back or to support her if she left.* But the same possibilities of abuse which dictated inspection and control in the case of Rickmansworth Licensed Retreat (an institution in which no one has any pecuniary interest) appear to us to indicate them in the case of Queensberry Lodge. In Queensberry House, again, we accidentally witnessed the following incident. Emboldened probably by our presence,

* Since the above was written we have been shown a letter from another lady, who also consented, at the instigation of friends, to go to Queensberry Lodge for a short time, complaining that, in a period now extending to close on six months, she has not once been allowed to leave its grounds, even under the customary escort, and that her letters home having all remained unanswered she is plunged into very grave anxiety.

A an inebriate inmate abused the governor for detaining him, and asked to be allowed to leave. The governor replied that his friends had sent him there for two months, and when these had elapsed, if they consented, he should be discharged. From the man's appearance it looked as if his detention was for his good; but the incident pointed very clearly to the necessity of inspection and control—a moral which was enforced by the stories of months of confinement within the precincts of the building by the governor's orders, for lapses from the path of temperance, of which inmate after inmate, who confided to us his or her experience, spoke. Major Mc'Cartney told us that he wanted no more powers than he had, and that he was able to rule his heterogeneous flock by 'force of character'; but while crediting him with every good motive, and the achievement of much good work in connection with very unpromising material, we cannot help believing that every consideration which calls for inspection and control in the best of the English retreats, applies with not less force to the case of the fifty female and dozen male inebriates who inhabit Queensberry House.

B Scottish Retreats should be administered from Scottish Office.—As Scottish administration generally has, since the passing of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, been transferred to the Secretary for Scotland, and as the Inebriates Acts, which up to the present have been a dead letter so far as that country is concerned, would come into operation for the first time were our recommendation as to the compulsory licensing of retreats adopted, we are of opinion that in any amendment of the Inebriates Acts the powers conferred on the Home Secretary should, in the case of retreats in Scotland, be conferred on the Secretary for Scotland. We are convinced that in this way an economical and efficient system of administration and control could be best secured.

C We make, then, the following recommendations (numbers 4 to 8 inclusive being identical with the recommendations of the English Departmental Committee of 1892, or differing from them only so far as is necessary to render them applicable to the case of Scotland) on the subject of Retreats for Habitual Inebriates, within the meaning of the Act of 1879 :—

- (1) That it shall be unlawful for any person or institution, not being already subject to Government inspection and control (as is a Poorhouse, Prison, or Lunatic Asylum), to receive unless licensed more than one habitual inebriate at one time.
- (2) That for the purposes of the Inebriates Acts, Poorhouses and Labour Settlements should be deemed to be 'Retreats.'
- (3) That all powers conferred on the Home Secretary by the Inebriates Acts should in the case of retreats in Scotland, be vested in the Secretary for Scotland.
- (4) That the Secretary for Scotland should be empowered to make rules and settle the form of affidavits regulating the admission and re-admission of voluntary applicants to retreats in addition to, or in substitution for the affidavits prescribed in the Schedule to the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, by which further facilities would be afforded to such applicants.
- (5) That the establishment of retreats should be encouraged for those who cannot provide the whole of the funds necessary for their maintenance, the residue being supplied by voluntary contributions, and that with regard to such retreats, the Secretary for Scotland should be empowered to make regulations by which a certain amount of work suited to each particular case should be enforced.
- (6) That the maximum period for which a patient may be confined in a retreat should be extended to two years.
- (7) That power should be given for the compulsory committal to a retreat at the instance of their friends of persons coming within the definition of an habitual drunkard, as laid down in the Act of 1879, and that the application for such committal should be made to the Sheriff in Chambers or in open Court, as the person sought to be committed may elect.
- (8) That the property of the person committed should be liable for his maintenance, and that the order for committal should provide, when necessary, for the appointment of a curator of the patient's estate during the period of committal, with power to apply the same towards the support of his wife and family.
- (9) That Town Councils and other Local Authorities should be empowered to contribute towards the support of licensed retreats, in consideration of such retreats agreeing to receive on their recommendation poor inebriates at a reduced rate.

- (10) That in cases where compulsory committal of an inebriate is asked for by his friends, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff that his friends are unable to pay the charges of an ordinary retreat, the Sheriff shall have power to order his commitment as an habitual inebriate to a Labour Settlement or a Poorhouse, as he may think fit, for such time, not exceeding two years, as he may deem necessary, on the condition that his friends pay the nett cost of his maintenance, such cost to be determined from time to time by the Secretary for Scotland; and that failing such payment in the manner prescribed by the Sheriff, the manager of the Labour Settlement or Inspector of the Poor shall have power to dismiss the inebriate so committed; and further, that in the case of inebriates so committed, the Sheriff shall have power to make such order regarding their property, if any, as he may consider equitable.
- (11) That power should also be given for the compulsory committal to a retreat at the instance of a procurator-fiscal in the public interest and at his discretion, of persons coming within the definition of an habitual drunkard, as laid down in the Act of 1879, who are a source of danger and annoyance to the public, and that in such cases the application for committal should be made to the Sheriff in open Court; that the Sheriff should have power to make such order as to the property of the inebriate as he might consider equitable; and that in the absence of funds available for his support, he should have power to order his detention as an habitual inebriate in a Labour Settlement or Poorhouse, as he may deem fit, for any period, not exceeding two years, which he may consider advisable.
- (12) That the definition of an habitual drunkard in the Act of 1879 should be extended to include persons reduced to the condition it describes through the abuse of opium and other drugs as well as alcohol.
- (13) That the fees for licences for retreats should be abolished or reduced to a nominal sum.

These recommendations are framed so as to meet the case of every class of habitual inebriate. That of the inebriate of the Police Court would be provided for by the Labour Settlement, to which he would find his way as an ordinary habitual offender. The machinery of the Inebriates Act (1879) already provides for the voluntary admissions and detention in retreats of patients whose friends are in a position to support them. The additional powers which we suggest would provide for the compulsory committal of habitual inebriates within the meaning of the Act of 1879, at the instance of their friends, if they could support them, and at that of the Procurator-Fiscal, at the public cost, in cases where their conduct, though not such as to bring them within the category of habitual offenders, was sufficiently objectionable to render them a public nuisance.

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

If we have refrained from making any recommendations in the direction of what is known as temperance legislation, it is certainly not because we have not been fully alive to its importance. But the licensing laws and the liquor traffic have been the subject of so many inquiries and reports, and the various proposals which have emerged from these have become the subject of so much heated controversy, that, dealing as we have had to do with comparatively fresh subjects, and making recommendations for which we bespeak unprejudiced and dispassionate consideration, we feel that we might render that impossible were we to venture into contentious questions not directly falling within our remit. There are two reforms, however, which have been urged upon us, regarding the desirability of which there appears to be a practically unanimous consensus of opinion in Scotland. The first is that the provision of the 'Public Houses Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887,' which exempts from its operation the five principal towns in Scotland, should be repealed, and the authorities in those towns should be entrusted with the powers enjoyed by the Local Authorities everywhere else in Scotland. The Act is permissive, but that the powers which it confers are prized is shown by the fact that every local licensing authority throughout Scotland empowered to adopt it has done so¹; that it conduces greatly to sobriety and order is shown by the universal testimony of the police²; and that the exempted towns desire the powers which it confers is proved by the fact that their municipal corporations have without exception petitioned for the repeal of the clause which exceptionally deprives them of them.

² See Reports of the Inspector of Constabulary.

A The second point, with respect to which there seems to be no difference of opinion, is the desirability of assimilating the Scotch law as to the supply of liquors to intoxicated persons to that which holds good in England. The Scotch law forbids the holder of a licence 'knowingly to permit any breach of the peace or riotous or disorderly conduct within his premises, or to supply liquors to persons in a state of intoxication,' under a penalty for the first offence of £5. The English law, on the other hand, forbids him 'to permit drunkenness, or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or to sell any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person,' under a penalty for the first offence of £10.¹ Chief Constables like Mr Henderson² of Edinburgh, who have had experience of both laws, give evidence as to the superiority of the English in enabling the offence to be brought home to guilty licence-holders, and the great practical difficulty of doing so under the wording of the Scottish Act. We are aware that complaints have been made of the inadequacy of the English Law on the subject, but for an answer to them we would refer to a letter addressed by the present Home Secretary to the Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, which will be found in our Appendix.³

³ Appendix LXXVIII.

B A further non-contentious suggestion is contained in a provision to be found in the laws of several of the States of the American Union and of our Colonies, prohibiting licence-holders from supplying drink to notorious drunkards, and we would therefore recommend

- (1) That the exemption of the large towns of Scotland from the provisions of the Public Houses Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887, be repealed.
- (2) That the Scottish law as to the permission of drunkenness on licenced premises, and the supplying of drink to drunken persons, be assimilated to the English; and
- (3) That it should be made an offence for a licence-holder knowingly to supply drink to any inmates of a retreat under the Inebriates Act, or to any person under sentence of commitment to a Labour Settlement or poorhouse.

C In order that the last of these proposals may not be evaded, it would be necessary further to provide

- (4) That it should be an offence for any person knowingly to assist in any way in the giving or obtaining of drink for the use of any inmate of a retreat, or of any person sentenced as above mentioned.

RÉSUMÉ.

D Having now dealt in detail with all the subjects remitted to us for consideration, it may be well to wind up with a résumé of the general nature and scope of our proposals. We were directed to inquire whether the number of Habitual Offenders in Scotland is increasing, and we have shown that it is, though not uniformly, and scarcely in proportion to the increase in the general population, but that the number of persons with ten convictions and upwards has largely increased. As to the causes of that increase, we have shown, by an analysis of the figures, that it is due, not to any increase of depravity in the Scottish character, but to the extension of new legislation to a number of 'populous places' in the counties, and the increased energy of police administration generally; and that, concurrently with it, there has been a material decrease in serious crime. We have shown that owing to diversity of laws and police administration, it is impossible to deduce any valid conclusion from the comparison, not alone of English and Scottish statistics as to petty offences, but of police statistics of different towns and districts in Scotland. We have shown that habitual offenders do not confine themselves to one offence, but that the drunkard of our police courts, in nine cases out of ten, figures also as the wife-beater, the beggar, the prostitute, or the thief; and we have shown that, in nine cases out of ten, petty offenders, when their offences are committed, are under the influence of drink. We have shown the utter inadequacy of the present system in all the variety of detail which throughout Scotland it offers to deter the habitual offender from a course of life which devolves the cost of his maintenance on the prison and the poorhouse when he is not preying directly on the public, and we have proposed to substitute for that system, which has admittedly failed so far as habitual offenders are concerned, a plan of prolonged reformatory treatment, which has proved A eminently satisfactory in the case of juvenile offenders in our own country, which in the case of adults in America, and in voluntary institutions working among the same classes in our own country, has achieved excellent results, and which, even if it failed, would at least rid society of a dangerous, a demoralising, and a costly element, under conditions intended to benefit the habitual offender himself, devoid of any element of vindictiveness, but compelling him to contribute by his labour to his maintenance, and applicable only after reiterated offendings and one solemn warning.

Directed to pay strict regard to the practicability and economy of our proposals, B we have framed them so as to involve the minimum of change in the law, to take advantage to the utmost of existing structures and institutions,—in such a manner that the cost of carrying them out need not impose any appreciable extra burden upon the Imperial Exchequer or on local rates, but would be defrayed by the labour of the Habitual Offenders themselves, and by the allocation of savings effected in present expenditure, supplemented by moneys contributed by the general class of offenders for whose benefit our proposals are devised.

The proposal which we have made is that prisoners, who having been thrice C imprisoned within twelve months are charged with a fourth offence, should be tried by a Sheriff, who should be empowered, in addition to sentencing them for the offence with which they are charged, to pronounce them to be habitual offenders, to order them to be registered as such, and warn them that the effect of this addition to their sentence would be that, if they were again within 30 months charged with an offence, they would be again tried by a Sheriff and be liable, in addition to punishment for that offence, to be committed for a period of not less than 12 nor more than 30 months to an adult reformatory (which we propose to call a Labour Settlement), where they would be kept under strict reformatory discipline and compelled to work for their living; or, if incapable of doing so, that they would be compulsorily detained for a period under strict discipline in a poorhouse.

For practical reasons, which we have fully explained, we have made imprisonments and not convictions the basis of our definition of an habitual offender; and partly for that reason, and partly because we consider it unfair that a prisoner repeatedly convicted of an offence should be allowed to escape prison simply because he can afford to pay a fine, we propose to confer upon magistrates in our police courts the power of imposing a short imprisonment (say up to 14 days), without the option of a fine, on repeated conviction for offences which, in the vast majority of cases, constitute the charges against frequent offenders; while in all cases, in order that he might really be 'a terror to evil-doers,' we would empower the Sheriff to inflict, without the option of a fine, the full statutory equivalent in the shape of imprisonment of the money penalty prescribed in respect of an offence tried before him. On the other hand we would give him the widest discretion, when the circumstances seemed to indicate that course, of suspending penalties. We would materially limit the powers of imprisonment at present exercised by citizen magistrates as no longer necessary if habitual offenders were specially dealt with; and in cases where prisoners were committed to prison in default of payment of a fine, instead of detaining them there until they had paid the uttermost farthing as at present, we propose to liberate them at any period of their imprisonment on the payment of a proportion of the fine imposed, corresponding to that of the balance of the term of imprisonment still to be undergone. We have shown that the last-mentioned proposal would not only effect a substantial saving to the State, but would provide a new fund which, if appropriated for the labour settlements, would go far towards establishing them, and, after their establishment, would materially contribute towards their support. The cost of looking after and maintaining these habitual offenders is at present shared between the Prisons Vote, the Poor Rate, and the Police Rate, and we have shown how the expenses requisite under our proposal might be met by contributions from the parties concerned—the Prisons by endowing the new scheme with their savings, and the Parochial Authorities by assuming the charge of weak-minded and infirm paupers of the 'in-and-out' habitual-offender class who at present occasion them so much trouble and expense, and the Police Authorities by guaranteeing the finance of the scheme to the extent of the fines and pledges which they at present receive.

We have, as directed, inquired into the difficult subject of Vagrancy, and made E recommendations which would at once help to assist its suppression and to mitigate, in

A deserving cases, the harshness of the Scottish Poor Law. We have shown how indiscriminate relief, even when administered by the police, and even when of the meagrest character, infallibly attracts troops of vagrants and beggars, and how its withdrawal disperses them. We have shown that, so far as the suppression of vagrancy is concerned, the severest enactments of the general law are futile, and the best results have been achieved by the milder provisions of more recent statutes at present operative in burghs ; and we have given reasons for our belief that if the same provisions, still further mitigated in the case of casual offenders, were extended to the country generally, the effect, in conjunction with our proposals for the treatment of Habitual Offenders, would be to keep the evil well under control. We have made recommendations, which if carried out would, we believe, go a long way to remove existing difficulties in securing the education of gipsy and tinker children. We have endeavoured to meet the case of the working-man tramping in search of employment, by proposals aimed at deterring impostors and assisting the deserving. And finally, in connection with those waves of acute destitution which periodically arise in our large towns, we have made a recommendation which would form the basis of a system to be permanently maintained, so as to be available promptly and methodically, to meet advancing danger before it had swollen to unmanageable size.

B We have carefully gone into the subject of Juvenile Delinquency, comparing the results of reformatory and industrial school training with those of the training undergone by the mass of our population, pointing out the great good that has been achieved, and making proposals to meet the defects which still remain to be remedied. We have endeavoured to show what might most readily be done to meet the hard case of the boy or girl debarred by reason of ill-health from reception into a reformatory, at present doomed to develop into a jail-bird—to prevent the undoing of reformatory work at its conclusion by the resumption by ex-pupils of old and evil associations, and to improve the educational and administrative efficiency of a class of institutions on which much public money is most usefully spent. And, above all, we have recorded our conviction, and the reasons for it, as to the cruel unwisdom of sending youthful offenders to prison, as tending more than any other single cause to divert their path of life into the ways of crime and pauperism.

C And, finally, in respect of Habitual Inebriates of the non-criminal class, we have arrived at conclusions practically identical with those at which a Select Committee of the House of Commons and an English Departmental Committee had arrived,* and have made recommendations to give effect to them under Scottish administration and Scottish law. We have shown that in Scotland existing legislation as to habitual inebriety has remained a dead letter, for the reason that that law can be more ignored than complied with. We have pointed out the amendments necessary to enforce and to facilitate compliance with its provisions. We have recommended extensions of those provisions which, in conjunction with our other recommendations, would suffice to meet every case. We have proposed that the duty of ministerial administration should, in the case of Scotland, be transferred to that department of our Government by which it could be most economically and most efficiently carried on ; and, if we have ventured to make our recommendations on the subject bold and far-reaching, it is because we find ourselves fortified in our conclusions by the outcome of two previous investigations, and because we have received abundant evidence that public opinion, in Scotland at least, is prepared to welcome a thorough legislative treatment of the subject.

D Before concluding, we feel bound to express our thanks to the authorities of the various localities in which we held sittings for the zealous assistance they afforded us ; to the officials of the Prison Commission, the Police, and other public departments for the readiness with which they supplied us with returns involving much labour ; to those in charge of the numerous public and private institutions which we visited, who without exception placed every facility for obtaining information at our disposal ; and to many witnesses, some of whom must have sacrificed very valuable time in order to place before us evidence which they were pre-eminently qualified to give.

E The members of the Committee would like to direct special attention to the eminent services of their Chairman, who attended every meeting and drafted the Report.

* Since the above was written the Report of the Departmental Committee on English Prisons has been issued, and in it the conclusions arrived at by the two Committees quoted have again been endorsed.

We have also to record our special obligations to Dr Sutherland, as secretary to the A Committee, for the difficult and laborious work which he so willingly undertook in collecting and collating information and statistics and in making arrangements for the evidence to be submitted to us.

With this Report we send you a copy of the Evidence and Documents on which it B is founded ; and

AND JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN SCOTLAND.

FIRST DAY.

London, Monday, 9th July 1894

PRESENT:

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, BART., M.D., LL.D., M.P., CHAIRMAN

Lieut.-Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E., Prison Commissioner for Scotland.

Dr. R. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Col. Sir COLIN SCOTT MONCRIEFF, R.E., Under-Secretary for Scotland.

DR. J. F. SUTHERLAND, Deputy Commissioner in Lunacy for Scotland.

Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON, Member of the Edinburgh School Board.

J. F. SUTHERLAND, Secretary.

The Secretary (Dr. Sutherland.) The following are the terms of the reference:—'Whereas representations have from time to time been made to me by influential bodies, to the effect that there is a large and increasing number of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates in Scotland, and that the existing powers of dealing with such persons, especially with a view to a permanent remedy, are inadequate, and whereas I consider that it is desirable, in the public interest, that a full inquiry into this subject should be instituted, I accordingly hereby appoint a Committee consisting of:—Sir Charles Cameron, Bart., M.D., M.P. (Chairman); Lieut.-Col. A. B. M'Hardy, R.E., Prison Commissioner for Scotland; R. Farquharson, Esq., M.D., M.P.; Col. Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff, R.E., K.C.M.G., C.S.I., Under-Secretary for Scotland; John Dove Wilson, Esq., LL.D., Professor of Law, Aberdeen University; J. F. Sutherland, Esq., M.D., Medical Officer, Glasgow Prison; Miss Flora C. Stevenson, Hon. F.E.I.S., Member of the Edinburgh School Board, to inquire whether the number of such persons is increasing, and into the cause of such increase, and further, to suggest such remedies as may, while deterrent, be likely to bring about their reformation and to prevent further additions to their numbers, due regard being had to the cost of any remedies which may be suggested, and to the practicability of their being carried into effect; and also to inquire into the number of male and female Juvenile Offenders sent to prison in Scotland, the offences for which they are committed, and the extent to which such committals could be lessened, and to report generally on the subject; and I appoint Dr. Sutherland to be Secretary to the Committee.—(Signed) GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, HER MAJESTY'S SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND, Scottish Office, Whitehall, 19th June 1894.'

BAILIE SAMUEL CHISHOLM, Glasgow, called in and examined by the CHAIRMAN.

Bailie Samuel
 Chisholm.

13 Nov. 1894.

1. You are a bailie of Glasgow?—I am.
 2. How long have you been in that capacity?—Three years.

3. You were the Convener of the Committee to consider the subject of Habitual Offenders, which was instituted in Glasgow some years ago?—I was the Convener.

4. In that capacity you had to pay particular attention to the subject of our present inquiry?—Yes; I submit a Memorial which was presented to Sir George Trevelyan, the Secretary for Scotland, on the subject.

5. This Memorial, I see, commences by calling attention to the difference in the proportionate number of the population and the arrests for drunkenness and disorderly conduct in Scotland and in England. Have you any opinion on that point?—We were accustomed to consider that the difference of the national beverages accounted to a considerable extent for the extraordinary difference—that the Scotsman's glass of whisky was much more conducive to drunkenness than the Englishman's beer. I will not say that the results of the one are in themselves more detrimental than the other, but, nevertheless, it produces drunkenness more rapidly than the other; and there is this further—although I am not quite sure I can give you data for it—that our police supervision is more strict, and that men and women are apprehended, and, as we say, 'run in,' who would be allowed to remain on the streets or taken to their homes in other places.

6. When a man is 'run in,' does that necessarily lead to his being brought before the magistrates?—Not necessarily; but it is regarded as an apprehension.

7. You have a system of letting men out on pledge?—Yes.

8. Could you explain that? In whose discretion does that lie?—The lieutenant who receives the charge. A policeman brings a drunk person to the bar; he is searched, and whatever articles he has in his pocket—money or other articles—are taken from him. When he becomes sober, in the course of the day or night, if he has had in his possession an amount of, say, 5s. to 7s. 6d., the lieutenant accepts that as what you would call bail, and dismisses him with the intimation that he is to appear for trial to-morrow morning. If he does not appear, then the pledge is forfeited, and that is regarded as an apprehension, although he is never really brought before the magistrate.

9. But are there any means taken to ascertain if the man gives his proper name?—No; any name is accepted.

10. Have you any statistics as to the number of pledges forfeited in Glasgow?—In 1893 there were 16,043 apprehensions for drunkenness, and of these 5832 forfeited their bail—that is, considerably more than one-third were released on bail which was forfeited.

11. Their bail being their deposits?—Yes.

12. Averaging from what?—Averaging from 2s. 6d., which would be the smallest amount, to 5s. and 7s. 6d.—that was when the case was one of mere drunkenness.

13. Do you know the total amount of money forfeited for drunkenness?—No; not for drunkenness alone; but the total amounts forfeited altogether are something like £12,000 to £13,000.

14. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) That is in a year?—A year.

15. (The Chairman's examination continued.) And these are regarded as police funds?—Yes

16. I suppose many of the people who forfeit their pledges in that way are well-known to the police?—There are a number who are well-known parties who give bail or who have money to leave; but there are more of the well-known classes amongst those who come up for judgment and sentence than amongst those who forfeit their pledge. Those who forfeit their pledge, or a very large proportion of them, are men who have been caught in sudden drunkenness—working men going home; and are not to be regarded by any means as habitual drunkards. The great bulk of these 5000 odd pledges are not from regular drunkards but from occasional.

17. I suppose the police lieutenant does not discriminate at all? He will take a pledge in any name—whatever it may be?—I believe he does so, as a rule. But in regard to pledges, I may say that not only are those allowed to go out on bail who have money in their pockets, but if, when a man becomes sober, he gives his address, the lieutenant will send to that address, and if his wife or family choose to bail him out he will be released then. Of those released I believe there are a large proportion who have been bailed out by their friends.

18. Of those who are bailed out by their friends, do they turn up again?—Oh yes.

19. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Who decides the amount of bail? In whose discretion is it?—The lieutenant decides.

20. (By Miss Stevenson.) Does it depend on the amount the man has in his pocket?—No; it really depends on the district of the town, and the character and feeling of the lieutenant. There are certain districts where the pledge is always 7s. 6d., but the lieutenants of certain other districts fix it at 5s. I take it, it is largely on account of the people in a certain district who may be better off and can afford 7s. 6d.; but in any case we notice that we have a long string of pledges in one Court at 5s. and in another Court at 7s. 6d. I may say we have eight Courts in Glasgow altogether.

21. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Suppose a gentleman was caught with two sovereigns in his pocket, would you fine him more heavily on that account?—No.

22. (The Chairman's examination continued.) Can you give us any statistics on the extent to which this pledging system occurs in the case of habitual drunkards and those for petty offenders? You said the total was something like £12,000?—Yes; I am not sure whether Captain Boyd's annual statistics give us that, but I might be able to get it. With regard to assaults, 'breaches of the peace,' as they are called, we estimate that out of 20,622 cases 4709 forfeited their pledge.

23. I presume a large number of those are associated to a certain extent with drunkenness?—They are just drunken cases where the drunk man had struck out, and fought with the police officer. Indeed, there are many cases where a man is apprehended simply for drunkenness, but on his way to the Police Office he kicks out, objects, rebels, and if he kicks the policeman then his charge is changed from drunkenness to assault, so that very many of these cases of breach of the peace and assault are really only cases of drunkenness, but I may say, as assault carries a heavier penalty, it is changed to that.

24. About the other pledges?—I have no statistics.

* Vide Appendix H.

Bailie Samuel
 Chisholm.

13 Nov. 1894.

John Samuel Chisholm. I have taken next, prostitutes, and there is no such thing as taking a pledge from a prostitute.

25. Is that under special instruction?—No; there is no special instruction.

26. The lieutenants simply act upon their own discretion in that matter?—Yes, I think so.

27. Do you take it that the arrests of prostitutes are to a large extent connected with drunkenness?—A very large number of them.

28. Let us take the drunkard who does not escape with the pledge, and is brought before the magistrates. Is there any agreement among the magistrates as to the punishment to give him?—There is no agreement. So far as I am aware, there has been no attempt even; and the result is that the treatment which drunkards receive from the magistrates is very varied; some disposed to mercy, dealing very largely in admonition and dismissal, or in the minimum fine of 2s. 6d. or three days' imprisonment, and others, who believe that drunkenness is a crime, varying the sentence, according to their judgment, from the minimum up to 15s. or 14 days.

29. What do you call the minimum?—Two shillings and sixpence or three days. There are certain magistrates whose record chiefly consists of sentences of 2s. 6d. or three days.

30. Is there any agreement among the magistrates as to an increase in the punishment inflicted upon drunkards in the case of persons who are very frequently brought before them?—I think there is a general consensus of opinion amongst the magistrates that that should be done, but there has been no discussion at the Board in regard to the matter. That is, the magistrates have never decided it.

31. In the English Licensing Act I understand there is a direction increasing the fines in the case of repeated convictions of drunkards,—that is, so much for the first offence, so much for the second, and so much for the third; the highest reaching up to 40s. Have you anything similar here?—We have nothing of that sort in Glasgow.

32. Or in Scottish law?—No.

33. What is the highest punishment for drunkards you have the right to inflict—for simple drunkards?—The highest punishment is usually 14 days.

34. Or what fines?—The fine requires to be above 10s. to carry 14 days. If it is under 10s. then you can only imprison for seven days.

35. And what fines are inflicted in the heavier cases?—Fifteen shillings or 14 days.

36. Is that common?—No; not at all common.

37. What is the highest in your Court?—I may say there is no magistrate has a Court of his own. We perambulate about, but I have reason to believe that, in the case of habitual drunkards, the highest is 14 days.

38. Where do they put in that 14 days?—The men at Barlinnie and the women at Duke Street.

39. Take the case of drunk and disorderlies, and petty assaults—what do your powers extend to in connection with them?—We have no such thing as drunk and disorderlies. Up to 1865, that phrase was used, but one of the judges, I understand, decided that, if a man was capable of being disorderly, he could not be drunk. Drunkenness goes along with incapability, and therefore a man who is drunk and incapable was not classed as disorderly.

40. Well, then, take the case of the breach of the peace and assault—what do your powers extend to in them?—They vary. If it is simple assault, 40s. or 30 days; or, if it is to the effusion of blood, then it runs up to 60 days.

41. As to vagrants: have you much to do with them?—We have to do with them, but not excessively, in Glasgow. The laws of vagrancy are very strictly enforced. The entire number of vagrants during 1893 was 176.

42. What laws are strictly enforced?—A person found begging can be sent to prison for 14 days.

43. Under the Glasgow Police Act, have you any special powers dealing with vagrants?—These are our special powers.

44. That is for beggary?—Vagrants and beggars are the same under our Act. Boilie Samuel Chisholm.

45. There is no provision in Glasgow such as there is in England for the reception in casual wards?—No. There are a considerable number of persons come to the Police Office for protection, and are kept there overnight.

46. As a matter of fact, there are a certain number of casuals received into the Police Office for protection?—There were 5304 persons who, at their own solicitation, received protection in the various Police Offices last year.

47. Is there any provision for giving them food?—Yes, they get a little food.

48. That is at the police expense?—Yes, at the expense of the rates,—that is, the police rates.

49. (By Miss Stevenson.) Are they put into cells?—They are kept in some of the rooms, but if there are any empty cells they are put there, but the cells are really comfortable rooms.

50. (Examination by Chairman resumed.) Are they mostly fresh comers, or do they come habitually?—A number of them come regularly.

51. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Are they tramps?—A number of them are parties who, when they are a little better off, go to the lodging-houses; but when they have no money they go to the Police Office.

52. In connection with the city of Glasgow, is there any provision or accommodation at a very cheap rate, for people who, without such provision, would find themselves absolutely destitute?—There are our model lodging-houses.

53. Will you describe them?—We have in Glasgow, belonging to the Corporation, seven model lodging-houses, able to accommodate each from 300 to 400 men in the case of six of them, and women in the seventh. There are private beds, and a recreation and dining-room, and a common kitchen with a large hot plate, where they can cook their own food; and they get the run of the house for twenty-four hours, including their bed, and including the use of utensils to cook their food, for prices varying from threepence to fourpence-halfpenny per night.

54. And that accommodation is very largely taken advantage of?—There are, I should say, over 300 nights out of 365 in the year, when there is not a vacant bed in one of them.

55. (Examination by Chairman resumed.) Do the class who frequent these houses consist of people without rooms who make these lodging-houses their homes, or are they casuals and a floating lot?—There is a considerable proportion of the floating lot, but it is wonderful the number who really make them their permanent home. One of the superintendents told me the other day that he had a man who had been there for twelve years, having lived there every night. But that, of course, is an exceptional case.

56. Do the authorities in Glasgow consider it as desirable that these model lodging-houses should be kept up for persons who make them their permanent home, or do they discourage them?—We have never done anything in the way of dealing with that question at all. The homes are open, and it is really in the discretion of the superintendent to take or refuse whomsoever he chooses, but we do not wish them to be made a permanent home by any one.

57. In some of the Labour Colonies they have rules as to the length of time in which residence is allowed?—We have no such rules. In general, I believe the superintendent rather likes to have the permanent people, as he gets to know them then.

58. That is, it costs him less trouble?—Well, he knows them, and can get them to do what he could not get a perfect stranger to do, and there comes to be a sort of friendly relation between them.

59. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You do not require any work from them?—No.

60. (Examination by Chairman resumed.) The lodgers pay in advance, don't they?—Yes.

61. Is that arrangement in Glasgow supplemented by many private lodging-houses of a similar character?—There is a large number of private lodging-houses.

62. In your magisterial capacity, have you had any Bailie Samuel Chisholm. occasion to acquaint yourself with facts concerning these houses?—I have.

13 Nov. 1894.

63. Tell us of them?—As a member of the Town Council, I have visited many of these private lodging-houses, in addition to our own, and many of them are conducted on lines, I would not say quite as good, but nearly as good as our own.

64. Every common lodging-house in Glasgow has, I understand, to be registered?—Yes.

65. And inspected?—Yes, open to inspection under the Glasgow Police Act.

66. Are the powers conferred upon the police in connection with the inspection of common lodging-houses in Glasgow special to Glasgow, or do similar powers exist over Scotland?—I believe they are special to Glasgow.

67. Are there any other points that you wish to bring forward in your evidence in chief?—No, I do not think so.

68. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Regarding this bail, of which you have spoken, for drunk men: supposing 2s. 6d. or 7s. 6d. is found upon a drunk man, is he liberated at once or kept till he is sober?—He is kept till he is sober.

69. But the amount of pledge is left to the discretion of the lieutenant on duty?—Yes.

70. Do you think it would be desirable to keep a register of those people apprehended for drunkenness?—I think it would, especially in Glasgow, much more almost than in any other place. So far as I am acquainted with the English towns, and I have visited several of them especially in connection with police matters, they have just, as a rule, one Court, and there is a record kept at this one Court of all the apprehensions,—that is, the names and particulars. But in Glasgow we have eight different Courts, and the jurisdiction of each of these Courts extends over only a given area of the city. Very often a person who is apprehended for being drunk, and brought before say the Central Court to-day, and after being sent to prison for seven days is released, may be taken the next day to the Southern Court, and the same may take place as regards the Northern Court, and so on: there is no common register kept of the apprehensions, and we have really no means of telling how many times they have been apprehended, except at one office.

71. (By the Chairman.) You speak about being apprehended?—By that I mean taken to the Police Office.

72. But the pledge system prevents you knowing anything about that?—There is a record kept of the name which they give, even of those who are dismissed on pledge.

73. (Examination resumed by Dr. Sutherland.) But supposing a register was kept,—that which leads now to confusion with regard to the number of habitual offenders, viz., the lieutenant on duty simply taking whatever name is given him, although he knows it is not the proper name—would be obviated?—To a certain extent, perhaps.

74. And by a comparison of the different Courts you would arrive at an approximate?—Yes.

75. As a magistrate, do you find caution or seek sureties in regard to any person apprehended on a charge of drunkenness?—No.

76. Does not your Police Act enforce it?—No.

77. Do you think there is any use seeking caution or sureties from those who are habitual drunkards?—No.

78. If it were enforced, do you think it would be oppressive to give those people 30 days' imprisonment for the offence of drunkenness, that being the maximum under your Police Acts?—I tell you frankly that I would freely give many of those parties 30 days just to take them off the streets. It might seem to be oppressive, and perhaps in some cases it would, but I think the magistrates would be justified in sentencing these people,—who perambulate the streets and demoralize and lower and deaden the public conscience, to the long period, in order to remove them, unless we had some other method of dealing with them.

79. What method do you suggest?—We leave that to legislators, but I think we should have something which is not simply meant to be punitive, but something that is remedial. Our present system of sending them to prison, where they are kept comparatively comfortable, with nothing of an elevating kind to do, teasing oakum or something of that kind, and just preparing them for going out and returning to a new debauch, instead of doing good, I believe, is doing harm. We should have something that is remedial and reformatory in its character.

80. You cannot tell us how much money has been left in the Police Offices by those who did and did not appear again; you can only say between £12,000 and £13,000?—Yes, I can only give you the gross sum.

81. Under this system of pledges, by which a considerable amount of money finds its way every year into the coffers of the Police Exchequer, is the policeman particularly interested in bringing respectable working men or respectable people to the Police Office on a charge of drunkenness? Is there any inducement?—There is no special inducement, save the inducement to a man to show his superiors that he is watchful and attentive to his duties. There is no special gift or reward, apart from something to merit promotion.

82. I am not doubting for a moment the vigilance of the police, but, as you are aware, the police have power, under the licensing laws, to deal with those who supply people with liquor and send them out to the streets in a state of intoxication. Do the police exercise the same vigilance in that matter as they do regarding people on the streets?—Well, if you judge by the number of cases of that kind, they do not; but I cannot say that without saying that I do not blame the police on that account. The evidence of a single policeman would not be taken, and it is not evidence that a publican supplied a man with the drink when he is seen drunk as he goes out of the shop. He may have gone in, and the publican in nine cases out of ten will swear that he did go in drunk and was refused drink. I have never had a case of that kind, but attempts have been made to punish publicans for supplying parties with drink on the evidence of drunk people coming out of their shops, and these attempts failed, because of the defence that the man went in drunk and was not supplied, but was just turned out again. This defence was accepted, and therefore we require some alteration before we can bring such charges home to the publicans.

83. The number of prostitutes apprehended in Glasgow has been increasing. Do you attribute that to the Further Powers Bill of 1892, by which policemen in plain clothes have now power to arrest them?—There is no doubt that it has had a great effect.

84. Do you think publicans might be more effectively dealt with by plain clothes policemen keeping a lookout for drunk men coming out?—I think they might; but you know magistrates and sheriffs have refused sometimes to convict, on the ground that no man had a right to be a spy. If we are to get publicans convicted we will require to do away with those obscured windows, and with those bars facing the doors, which make it impossible for anybody to see what is done, unless you go inside, for even if two detectives in plain clothes went into a public house, they would be recognised at once as being detectives, and the offence, if about to be committed, would at once be stopped. I do not apprehend the same success would follow in the case of publicans as in the case of prostitutes.

85. Supposing the magistrates had power to certify an habitual drunkard, and to order his name to be advertised, as in the Colonies, and to be notified to every publican and pawnbroker, and they were ordained, under penalty, not to supply such a person with drink, do you think that would be any check?—Perhaps it might; I cannot say. I would rather shut up public houses altogether.

86. But until we can do that, we might look for other safe-guards. You recognise a great number of these people frequent certain houses, while respectable publicans will not admit them?—I do not know exactly that, but I have heard it.

87. No pledges are taken from prostitutes?—No; no pledges.

Bailie Samuel Chisholm.

13 Nov. 1894.

Baillie Samuel Chisholm.
 2 Nov. 1894.
 88. But they may be fined?—I do not remember to have seen a case in which there was a prostitute who had been dismissed on pledge. I do not remember that in all my experience. They are fined, with the alternative of imprisonment, and sometimes they pay the fine.

89. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You have said just now that you would not be sorry to see the drunkards locked up for 30 days?—I am really sorry that they are locked up, even for 14 days, as under our present system, but I would rather lock up a habitual drunkard than allow him to continue his course uninterrupted.

90. And do you think that, by that longer locking-up, a deterrent effect would be produced?—I think we want a change of treatment.

91. You alluded to the opaque glass doors of bars and windows, by which policemen cannot see what is going on. Do you think if, by any legislation, that was forbidden, and clear glass doors were put into drinking bars, that any deterrent would come out of that, or that the police would have better supervision?—Undoubtedly the police would have better supervision.

92. Do you think people would be ashamed to be seen there?—Up to a certain stage, the shame has not wholly left them.

93. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You said that it was the practice of the police, or that the magistrates had given instructions to be more active in dealing with these disorderly people than was the case with other police forces?—We have not, as magistrates, given special instructions.

94. Then is the Glasgow police more active, somehow or other, than other forces are in such apprehensions?—I know a little of the police forces in other parts, and I do think that our police apprehend and bring to prison many who in other places are just quietly passed on, either to their own home or on the road to it.

95. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Is it not better to pass them on to their homes than to lock them up?—Sometimes. If a man is to go home in a state of drink, and turn his wife and children on to the streets, it is not better. I am not blaming the police at all, but you need to know the case before you can say which is better and which is not.

96. (Examination resumed by Col. M'Hardy.) The last statistics show that the number of apprehensions for breaches of the peace, and so forth, in Glasgow, was 60 per 1000, and in places so close to Glasgow as Govan, 28 per 1000, and in a place like Paisley, close also to Glasgow, 21 per 1000. Can you give us any information as to these enormous differences?—Well, the difference in the proportion of our industrial population, iron-workers, and miners—we have a large number of miners who stay in the city—then what I have said about the extra attention of the police, is very marked between Glasgow and Govan. I have heard Commissioners of Govan, who are now, even at this moment, members of the Corporation of Glasgow, remark on the difference between the Govan police and the Glasgow police.

97. Which force did they approve of?—Well, I do not like to repeat that, as it is hearsay evidence, but they spoke well of the Govan system.

98. Recognising the difference of the system?—Recognising the difference of practice. I believe that what I said before, about many of the Glasgow cases of drunkenness being transformed into cases of assault on the way to the police office, exercises an effect in producing the difference.

99. And would the assault offenders be allowed to give pledges?—Yes, but the pledge is higher, inasmuch as the fine would be higher.

100. This habit of the Glasgow police, is it a new one or an old one?—I cannot state as to that. I do not know of any change that has taken place in the system.

101. As to the number committed to prison now: it is very largely increased from what it was for these disorderly cases; is that not so?—I do not think so. I think you will find that the chief constable will tell you that there was some change in the law of some kind which took place prior to 1875, and that it is not fair to compare statistics before that time with the statistics of to-day. The system was altered in some way or other, prior to that, and if you take the statistics from 1875 up till to-day, while there has been a vast increase in population there has latterly been a diminution in the number of apprehensions. In 1875, the total apprehensions for assaults and breaches of peace, with a population of something like 500,000, was 22,298, and in 1893, with a population of 680,000, the apprehensions, instead of being 22,000, were only 20,000, so that we have not been getting worse during these twenty years.

102. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is not the improvement brought out by the Annexation Scheme in 1891?—Yes, that is true in one sense, but that is not the right way to state it. During preceding years, when the respectable people of Glasgow were going over the city border, we were apparently getting worse, when we were in reality not really worse; and we only got into our proper position when these people were brought back within our borders. In 1875, the number was 22,298, and it has varied up and down,—the largest being in 1890, when it was 22,471. Since then it has come down to 20,622. There has practically been no prominent difference, although the population has increased from 500,000 to 680,000.

103. But since 1865 the imprisonments have been multiplying by three—that is since the time of this previous system?—I cannot say, because I learned that, prior to 1875, the law was altered, and no comparison could fairly be made.

104. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You said, in regard to persons arrested for being drunk, that when they became more or less sober the police would send to their friends, so that they might bail them out?—Yes, when they get the address of their family.

105. Would they do that in any case?—Yes, unless in a case where they knew the man was befooling them. If they had reason to believe the man was giving an honest address, they would send a constable to the family. I speak of drunkards. If it were a case of serious assault, and they had no desire to release the offender on bail, they would not do so. In a case of drunkenness, whenever they can send to their friends they do so.

106. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) That is out of kindness?—Purely.

107. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You said that four or five thousand received some sort of housing in the police stations during the year?—Yes.

108. Were they vagrants, or persons known to the police?—There is no record kept, so far as I am aware, or any particulars regarding these parties, but just the numbers.

109. Have you seen them?—I have seen a number of them at night.

110. And were they sober?—Yes, as a rule they were sober.

111. Sometimes possibly not?—I have seen them touched with drink, but not drunk.

112. Are these, in any cases, deserving men, who are tramping for work, or is there any other place where, if a man who was travelling for work wanted accommodation, he would be able to get it?—The police have no other accommodation to give him.

113. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would they send him to the Night Asylum?—They might give him the address of the Night Asylum, but the police, as such, have no other place except the Police Office to shelter any one.

114. (By Col. M'Hardy.) If there was an honest workman travelling in search of work, and if he came to Glasgow penniless, what should he do?—He should try to get work, first of all.

115. We will suppose he arrives in the afternoon or evening: what should he do?—He should try and get work, or put himself in communication with some one whom he might expect to assist him; but we have no provision for men of that kind.

116. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Does not the Charity Organisation Society do something of that sort?—Yes, Baillie Samuel Chisholm.

 13 Nov. 1894.

Bailie Samuel Chisholm. but I am speaking of our city provision. We, as a town council and magistrates, have no provision for parties of that kind.

13. Nov. 1894.

117. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is there an independent benevolent and charity organisation?—There are a great many, but there is a special Society called the Charity Organisation Society, which changes itself with looking after every case of destitution, and to the giving of temporary relief when the case has been examined and the truth of the statements made by the applicant tested.

118. Take the case of a deserving man. If he went to the Police Office would he be directed to this Society, and would they provide for him or not?—They might. It is their duty to do so, if they are satisfied that his is a proper case. But they might know something about him, and would not do anything for him. They would provide for him a night's rest, and make inquiry regarding him, and they would probably give him temporary work, in all likelihood in the morning, for a day, at preparing firewood, or something of that kind. They have a shelter for such men, but cases of the kind you describe are rare.

119. Why do you say such things are rare?—Because I know something about the Charity Organisation Society, and their experience is that there are not many cases of deserving working men who come into the town without any friends to guide them to any method of living or any chance of living. The bulk of them are men who have been brought to their position by their own intemperance and misconduct.

120. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You have got your model lodging-houses—that is a very good provision, is it not?—Yes. But they require to have their threepence or fourpence-halfpenny before they are admitted there.

121. (Examined by Dr. Farquharson.) Do you know whether the police constables in Glasgow have any general instructions given them to guide them in dealing with cases of drunkenness?—The chief constable issues his general instructions. I do not remember what they are.

122. Is it left entirely to the constable's discretion as to what stage of drunkenness warrants apprehension?—Drunk and incapable. A man who is able to walk along the street is not arrested.

123. Is there any legal definition of an habitual drunkard?—Not that I am aware of.

124. (By the Chairman.) There is a definition in the General Act?—Yes. I mean that in regard to the people who come up before us, as such, we have no rule to guide us. We may be told a man has been convicted five or fifty times, and it is left to the magistrate to decide whether he regards a man with five or fifty convictions as an habitual drunkard.

125. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) When a man is brought up before you for being drunk and incapable, what means have you for distinguishing whether it is a first case or whether he is a habitual drunkard?—Just two means—his own statement, that is, the answers he gives to the direct questions put to him, and the evidence of the police.

126. Are the number of previous convictions or apprehensions entered in the chargesheet?—No.

127. Does the expression 'habitual drunkard' occur in the Glasgow Police Act?—No.

128. When you give a man 14 days for being drunk and incapable, does that mean you can give him it without the option of a fine?—No; he must get the option.

129. Do you find any connection between habitual drunkards and petty thefts?—I cannot say that I have seen that in my own experience, whatever my own opinion of it may be. I have no experience to warrant my saying I have.

130. In Glasgow, have you any place where a working man or woman can get a night's shelter and breakfast in exchange for work?—No; I do not think we have. The Charity Organisation Society would provide them with work, and give them money at the close of the day to get their shelter and food, but that Society does not provide either food or shelter.

131. (By Colonel M'Hardy.) There is nothing that you know of of that kind?—No.

132. Does it not occur to you that it would be a benefit to have such a place?—Yes.

133. (By the Chairman.) Supposing the Committee were to come to the conclusion that some recommendation should be made in regard to habitual drunkards, what would you consider should constitute an habitual drunkard, from a quasi criminal point of view? How many convictions, or within what space of time, should justify a man being considered as an habitual drunkard?—I think, and I have often said it at the Court, that for every time a man is convicted of being drunk—and remembering that conviction for being drunk means drinking to the extent of being incapable—for every time he has been convicted of that he has been actually three or four times drunk and has escaped the police and got home. Therefore, when I say that I think six convictions in the course of the year, for being drunk and incapable, warrants a man being regarded as an habitual drunkard, it is because I believe he has really been twenty to twenty-five times drunk during the course of the year.

134. How would you propose to deal with those cases where drunks are converted into assaults by resistance on the part of the drunk man? You would require to classify your assaults in connection with drunkenness?—Clearly.

135. And is there any method of doing so at the present time?—They are charged both with being drunk and with assault.

136. Is that uniformly the case in Glasgow?—I believe it is; we have a great many cases every Monday where the charge is 'drunkenness and assault.'

137. And they are convicted of —?—Either one or the other.

138. That is the point. As to any practical method of dealing with the question of habitual drunkards, you have told us that for six convictions within a year for drunkenness,—that is, dead drunkenness, you would pronounce a man an habitual drunkard, but, of course, it would be absurd to make that hold good and escape conviction for kicking a policeman?—Clearly.

139. You would require to modify your conviction, so as to obtain a record for the drunken part?—Yes.

140. I mean is there any way in which all cases of drunkenness, as apart from assault, could be brought up?—It would not be done under the present system.

141. Then you would require a change in the present system?—Yes.

142. Have you any figures which would show the number of cases in which persons, petty offenders, given the option of fines, went to prison? The point I wish to find out is whether a large number of persons went to prison as an alternative to the 2s. 6d. fine, so as to get some indication of poverty of persons?—We have no statistics of that kind.

143. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think there would be any hardship in entering upon the charge against a petty offender his previous convictions, bearing in mind that under Lord Kingsburgh's Amendment Act previous convictions are excluded from the ken of the jury?—I do not like previous convictions on a charge. I always feel it is very apt to bias one's mind, and to prejudice you in considering the evidence, when you have it before you that this man has been repeatedly convicted. You are very apt to accept evidence which otherwise you might not accept.

144. Then you prefer to have the convictions not in evidence, until the magistrate finds him guilty?—Yes.

145. Do you think a better discrimination might be made between the drunkenness of which working men are sometimes guilty and that class you find amongst the worst offenders in the Police Courts of Glasgow?—Oh yes, it would be greatly advantageous if we could get more discretion.

146. I suppose you are aware that a great number of those people who constantly come before you are really idle, dissolute people who have no employment and no settled home?—A large number are mere loafers. [The witness withdrew.]

Bailie Sam Chisholm.

13 Nov. 1894

Mr. WILLIAM MITCHELL, Glasgow, called in and examined by the CHAIRMAN.

William
Mitchell.

13 Nov. 1894.

147. Will you state what positions you occupy in Glasgow?—I am Vice-Chairman of the Glasgow School Board, and also Vice-Chairman of the Glasgow Juvenile Delinquency Board. I may say I have been requested by both Boards to represent them here to-day.

148. How long have you been connected with the School Board?—I have been connected with the School Board since it began, in 1873.

149. And with the Juvenile Delinquency Board?—Since its origin, about 10 or 12 years ago.

150. And in connection with the School Board you have, I understand, been brought largely into contact with the children of drunken parents, and had occasion to inquire into their cases in connection with their absence from school?—Yes.

151. Would you please give us your experience, in connection with these Boards, on matters bearing on the subject of our inquiry?—I have been Convener of the School Attendance Committee from the beginning, and that has brought me into contact with the parents of the classes of children concerning whom you are chiefly inquiring, namely, inebriates and drunkards. We have 43 officers under the School Board whose whole duty it has been to visit the houses of the parents of children who are not attending school. We have first of all 'ordinary dealings.'

152. Yes, but take the cases of the drunken parents?—There are four special default officers, and after we have exhausted, so to speak, cases of ordinary default, we have a residuum that amounts to about 4000 families every year, with whom the Board require to deal directly. To these four officers, these cases of aggravated default are committed, and it is in connection with these that intemperance and misconduct come in. These officers have made a report to me showing that, out of 4000 to 5000 cases yearly which are committed to their care, two-thirds, or thereby, require to be brought specially before the Board. We are not allowed by the Act to prosecute, I may explain, until the parents have had an opportunity of coming before the Board to state their cases and explain their circumstances.

153. In what proportion of cases do you attribute the failure of the parents to send their children to school to drunkenness?—I have statements by the default officers, which I will read. It gives the opinion of the officers as to the effect of intemperance on School Board work. James Wilson says:—'After nearly 20 years' experience as a School Board officer, I am of opinion that, in respect of the families whose children cannot be got to school by ordinary dealing, and where the parents are summoned before the Board, at least 30 per cent. can be traced directly to intemperance on the part of either the father or mother, or both, while 25 per cent. of the ordinary absentees can be traced to the same cause. This opinion I have formed from personal knowledge and observation gained in visiting houses in connection with School Board work.' Anthony Galbraith says:—'My experience of 20 years in dealing with defaulting parents summoned before the School Board, leads me to the conclusion that about 50 per cent. of the cases are caused directly through intemperance, more perhaps on the part of mothers than fathers.' William Walker says:—'After 20 years' experience as a compulsory officer, I am of the opinion that about 75 per cent. of the children who have passed through my hands, and whose education was partially or wholly neglected, were placed in such circumstances, either directly or indirectly, in consequence of intemperate habits on the part of their parents, more especially as regards mothers.' William Gann says:—'In order to arrive at as fair a judgment as possible on this subject, I have taken 100 names out of my book of families whom it has been necessary to summon before the Board—not selected, but in the order in which tabulated—and I have carefully gone over these and marked off such cases as the father or mother, or both, are known to me to be of intemperate habits, and find that the number so marked is 63 per 'cent. of the whole.' John McDonald, principal officer of the Board, says:—'Since joining the Glasgow School Board, in June last, I have made it a special point to inquire particularly into the worst cases of irregularity reported by head-masters, and to ascertain the cause or causes of the irregularity, and my experience goes to confirm what has been stated by the fore-mentioned officers. There is no doubt whatever that, in the majority of the cases these default officers have to deal with, the cause of the irregularity is due to the intemperate habits of one or other, or both parents.'

154. These deal with the question of intemperate habits, but the only form of intemperate habits that we can deal with is the habitual inebriate?—Apart from the ordinary intemperance of the fathers, a great deal of the irregularity of children has been connected with intemperate mothers, and with the drinking at home as well as in public-houses.

155. Then the result of your experience is that this irregularity of attendance is not connected with the people who turn up at the Police Courts?—I should say it is not, to a large extent. The intemperate mothers get into the habit of bringing the drink into their houses.

156. In any case, your opinion is that the irregularity of attendance is not, in the vast majority of the thousands of cases to which you have referred, to be found in the cases of drunkards who make their appearance before the magistrates?—It is so in the aggravated cases, but it is less so undoubtedly in ordinary cases.

157. I think it might have had more bearing if you could have given us some statement of the cost to the city in the pursuit of education, resulting by habitual drunkenness?—The cost of the whole of the department of which I am Convener is largely due to intemperance. I have shown that 60 or 70 per cent. of the default cases brought under our notice are due to intemperance. If it were not for that we would not require to have such an expensive staff.

158. But as to habitual drunkards?—We find it necessary that the children of habitual drunkards should be dealt with individually. We have found what are called Day Industrial Schools of the greatest service to us in this direction, and of course they are an expense to the community—both to the city and the government.

159. As to the Day Industrial Schools, under what circumstances are children sent to them?—I should say about one-half are children of honest poor parents where the mothers, through the loss of their husbands, have to go out to work, and have no home or place to which the children can go during the day, or of widowers in like circumstances. The other half of the children belong mainly to intemperate parents, who, through the intemperance especially of the mothers, have got into such trust neglected habits that they are found in the streets neglected and vagrant.

160. Are these Day Industrial Schools general, or are they peculiar to Glasgow?—They are established by Act of Parliament; by which is constituted the Juvenile Delinquency Board. The Juvenile Delinquency Board is an institution peculiar to Glasgow. These Day Industrial Schools were peculiar to Glasgow, but I understand Edinburgh has now obtained an Act.

161. It is not general Scottish law?—No.

162. Then what do you say is the main work of these schools as affecting drunken parents?—Miss McFadyen, of the Rose Street Day Industrial School has drawn up a report which I will read:—'Our Day Industrial School work brings us into close contact with the parents of the children we have in charge, and a very short time suffices to show how much the boys and girls are the victims of their home circumstances. More than half of the scholars are the children of dissipated parents, having been brought to us as confirmed truants given to pilfering, sleeping out at night, &c., and yet their confidence is gained, and their interest in school work secured. These 'habits are gradually broken, and a pleasanter class of children could not be wished for. That they, in many instances, go to homes where improper scenes are familiar, cannot be denied, but it is wonderful how little of its effects can be traced in their every-day behaviour, showing, I think, that the all-day intercourse with their teachers is having a beneficial effect.' There are similar reports from the other Day Industrial Schools.

163. You might give us the points bearing specially on the inquiry?—When these children return home at night their influence for good is very marked.

164. How do the children get into the Day Industrial schools?—When we find that the children are neglected, we summon both mother and children, or father and children, as the case may be, before the School Board, and when it is evident that there is no hope for these children except being sent to a Day Industrial School, we recommend that that should be done.

165. You recommend to whom?—The School Board recommends that steps be taken to have these children brought before the Committee of the Day Industrial School. This Committee meets once a month, or oftener if necessary, and the cases are brought under its notice, and both parents and children are brought before them.

166. It is not voluntary then?—No; they are afterwards committed by the Justice of Peace Court.

167. You, in your capacity as a School Board member or official, summon the parents, obtain authority to bring them before the Justice of Peace Court, and the Justices of Peace commit them to these Juvenile Delinquency Schools?—We first have them considered by the Day Industrial School Committee, to see if the cases are suitable and in accordance with the Act.

168. Is that not a matter for the magistrate?—It is a matter for both. These steps are always taken. Cases are very rarely sent directly from the Court; as a rule, they are sent before this Committee, and then to the Justice of Peace Court, which confirms the decision, and the parents are required to pay a certain sum—1s. or 1s. 6d. a week, as the case may be.

169. Then the children in these Day Industrial Schools, I understand, get their meals there?—Yes; they may go as early as six in the morning, when the father requires to go out to work at that time, but the greater number of children go about eight o'clock, and remain till six in the evening.

170. And get their food there?—Yes, and an excellent training and education. The reports from the Home Office are as satisfactory as we could desire.

171. What time can the magistrate commit them?—One year is the shortest time, but they can commit for four years.

172. Can the sheriff also commit them?—Well, our cases of prosecution are not large, in proportion to the defaulters, but it sometimes happens that, in the case of prosecution, the sheriff thinks that in addition to a fine, it is better to send the children to an Industrial School.

173. The Industrial School, in the ordinary acceptance, is different from the Reformatory School?—Yes, the sheriff rarely sends to the Day Industrial School.

174. Have you any form of committal to a Day Industrial School?—The children are committed under a special form.

175. But have you the special form?—I will send you a copy of the form of committal. I may say we are very averse to sever the family tie by sending children away from their homes altogether.

176. You claim that a large number of the children that you deal with would become beggars and vagrants if they were not taken up?—Yes.

177. Have you any petty criminals among your boys. I mean in the Day Industrial Schools do you profess to deal with petty criminals such as pickpockets and that sort. Do you receive them?—When not convicted, they are admitted to Industrial Schools, and not found generally to be worse than other children.

178. I understand there is a practice among the magistrates in Glasgow, in cases of young children brought before them for petty offences, that they do not convict them, but send them to an Industrial School instead of a Reformatory School. Is that practice pursued with respect to the Day Industrial Schools, and not with respect to the regular Reformatory School?—It is pursued with respect to both ordinary and Day Industrial Schools. We have now no Reformatory School in Glasgow, as Duke Street is abandoned, and the boys who used to go there are distributed over the other reformatories in Scotland.

179. So far as vagrants are concerned, and especially the gipsies, on which you are supposed to give evidence, I understand you have not got your notes with you, and that you would prefer to be recalled to-morrow?—I may say that my evidence with regard to the tinkers, as I call them, because they are quite a different class from the gipsies, has reference to Perthshire and north of Perthshire. In Glasgow we have none of the tinker or gipay class. The few who come in show-vans, and so on, we have no particular fault to find with.

180. The case of vagrants would not come under your notice at all in Glasgow?—In a sense; although they may be called vagrants they have always lodgings or houses to which they resort, and in that way they just come under our notice as regular residents.

181. Perhaps, with respect to the Perthshire gipsies, you could prefer to refresh your memory by reference to your notes and documents?—I certainly would, and I would prefer to give my evidence along with those parties who are very conversant with the subject, so that you may have all the evidence in a condensed form. There are several parties in Pitlochry who are full of the subject, and, with myself, would be able to place the state of matters before you.

182. But what connection have you with the question?—I live for six weeks every summer in Perthshire, in very close contact with this class, because they are just round about the house where I live in Pitlochry, and I am impressed with the awfully destitute and degraded condition in which the children are being brought up.

183. That you attribute to drink, or what?—They are all drunkards, both men and women, and the children are of all ages, and are as absolutely neglected as the cattle in the fields around them. No man cares for them, and there are certainly more than a thousand such children in the counties of Perth, Sutherland, and Inverness.

184. Do you know whether any provision is made for their education?—There is no provision whatever, and no one thinks of looking after them. They are just roving about the country. No agency and no individual or society ever thinks of asking them a single question.

185. I suppose you may bring them, to a large extent, under the head of police?—The police have nothing to do with them, except when they commit a crime or offence.

186. But in connection with crimes committed by them, the police will have a pretty good idea of them?—Oh yes. At Pitlochry, Sergeant Small is a most intelligent witness, who can give you information such as I hope you will receive, which will convince you that something more stringent will require to be done in regard to them. The evil is increasing, to my knowledge, and has been for 10 or 12 years.

187. So far as Glasgow is concerned, you say nothing is needed to enable you to deal better with the children of vagrants?—No. The vagrants we deal with under the School Attendance Department generally come under the class of parents whom we deal with who are in poor circumstances, or whose conduct is bad, and who are intemperate, and so on. We do not distinguish between what may be called vagrants and the general defaulting class of the community.

188. Have you any suggestions as to how the children of such classes, such as the gipsies in Perthshire, can be dealt with?—As regards the tinker class in the North I have one or two very important suggestions. The first that I would make is this. I understand that both landlords and tenants have the power just now to give them permission to strike their tents on their land, and if the permission is granted no one can interfere. A tenant, for instance, may give permission to a tinker and his family, or two or three families together, to strike their tent, and if he does so the landlord has no right to interfere. I think, when it is proved to the satisfaction of the Local Authority that it is both an insanitary dwelling and an immoral dwelling, and that the children are living under such conditions from year to year, as I have described, no tenant or landlord should be allowed to give permission to such a class of people to set up their tents and thus encourage them to live in the manner they live there. That is my first remedy.

189. Before you go on to give any further remedy, you might explain your use of the word immoral!—Well, I call it immoral in this sense, that a whole family—from the child of a year old to old age, girls of 15, 16, and 17, lads of the same age, and their parents—all lodge and sleep in an area not much exceeding the size of the table at which the Committee is sitting (about 5 feet by 12 feet).

190. Then indecent would describe this?—Well, then, indecent.

191. I wanted to know if you brought a charge of immorality against the gipsies!—Well, there is a difference of opinion. I cannot say anything about absolute immorality in that sense. But you may call it indecent, if you like.

192. Now will you give us your next remedy?—My next remedy is this, that all such movable dwellings should be registered and brought under the control of the Local Authority for inspection; and where, on inspection, they were found so utterly insanitary and indecent as to be unfit for human habitation, they should be closed; and that, where no other provision existed for their housing, the Local Authority, or the Parish Council, or whoever might be the proper party, should provide, in the nearest villages, Refuges to which they might go. I would not propose to send them to the poorhouse. I think they might very well be told 'There is a shelter for you. You cannot remain here any longer,' and in the comfortable refuge provided I think they might gradually be absorbed with the labouring population, their children looked after and sent to school, and the whole tinker clan thus gradually brought into association with the other labourers with whom they were already, to a certain extent, in touch. They do labour in the fields a certain number of months or weeks in the year, though not very long. The object of the Committee, I think, might be to try to get these tinkers absorbed in the labouring population, and I think that might be done, so to speak, by driving them into the villages, and giving them such Refuges for a year or two.

193. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) But if they would not stop any length of time, would you not require to put compulsion upon them?—I would certainly compel them to leave their present wretched dwellings. It is the tent that ties them to this vagrant life, for they won't go under a roof, even when a woman is being confined.

194. Then would you confiscate their tents?—Oh, their tents are nothing but a few potato sacks or old rags thrown over some upright poles.

195. But what means would you take to force them to live in the houses you provide?—By shutting up the places they live in; I would say, through the Local Authority or an official appointed, that they can no longer live here and that they must go somewhere else.

196. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Suppose they proposed to have caravans the same as the gipsies in the South of Scotland, would you interfere with them?—If they had a respectable caravan; if it were made equal to an ordinary house or dwelling, I do not know that I should interfere.

197. There are no such vans in the North?—No.

198. A good caravan is got up in the style of a Pullman car?—Perhaps in the South.

199. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Upon what grounds do you say these tents are insanitary?—Because they are open to all the winds that blow. They cannot but be insanitary, there is no bedding, there is no furniture; it is almost like living in the open air with an umbrella, little more than that.

200. (By the Chairman.) They might object, of course, to any such exceptional treatment, and you would require to justify it by showing that they are a very great nuisance to the community. Do you think that could be done?—They are so, to some extent, but it is not that I look to. It is the awful condition in which they live and in which the poor children are being brought up. They do nothing the whole year, except for a few weeks among the potatoes, or in the woods, for which the farmers engage them. They are the most drunken lot that can be conceived. They are tipsy two or three days of the week, both men and women.

201. Have you any other suggestions?—Well, at the moment I am not prepared to say more. I thought you would be taking evidence on this subject afterwards, but these are the two principal remedies I thought of. My object is to have them extirpated as a class, and absorbed in the labouring population. That is the purpose I have in view. I think it is absolutely necessary, and should be done.

202. (By Dr. Farguharson.) If these gipsies encamp on common land, have the Local Authorities any power over them?—I made inquiry at Sergeant Small, and he says there is no common ground he knows of in Perthshire where they can encamp without permission of the landlord or tenant.

203. But on the roadside there is often a little bit of heather or patch of ground belonging to nobody?—Well, they might encamp on that, perhaps; but, by having their tent registered, the sanitary officer would call upon them and tell them that such conditions could not exist.

204. Have you any information to show that the insanitary conditions of these tents have a bad effect upon the children?—Well, take an extreme case. The medical officer finds that a woman insists upon remaining there when confined. Such cases cause a great many deaths.

205. Does the exposure appear to interfere with the health of the grown-up men and women, or of the children?—The parents may be healthy-looking, but the children are not, and a great many of them die. Consequently it is only the stronger children that grow up.

206. Don't you think, of the two excesses, too much air is better than too little?—Of course it may be a case of the survival of the fittest. The open tent and the bare ground at all seasons must aggravate the miserable condition of the children.

207. Are the babies born in legitimate wedlock? Does the immorality come in there?—They have, I understand, certain rules and regulations of their own. They are not married by a clergyman, or by any civil form that I know of. They have some rites of their own.

208. Do you think that the children swell the ranks of the criminal population largely?—I could not say that. The return that Dr. Sutherland has been asking for, shows, I understand, that there is a large percentage of crimes among that class,—mostly, however, petty crimes. The men and the women are constantly quarrelling and fighting with each other.

209. Do you think their tendency to drink is the outcome of their insanitary circumstances and surroundings?—I think the one reacts upon the other; and men and women are both alike in that respect.

210. Would you apply the same code of regulations to the shows and caravans?—No, I am very anxious that a distinction should be drawn. This is a class of people per se who must be dealt with by themselves. They are quite a different class from tramps, or the ordinary gipsies, or show-people.

211. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Wherein do they differ from the ordinary gipsies?—They differ in this respect. From reports I have seen, I understand that the gipsies in the south of Scotland live in moderate decency and comfort, and send their children to school. On the other hand, the tinkers I speak of and their children are positively just like cattle. They have no moral training or teaching of any kind whatever. No minister nor any friend goes near them.

William
Mitchell.

212. (By Col. McHardy.) In regard to the classes in Glasgow that we have more particularly to deal with, I understand you to say that the children of the habitual offender or inebriate are sent by you, under some process, to Day Industrial Schools?—Where we find that their absence from school is owing to neglect at home, and that there is no probability of getting over that neglect, we recognise and encourage the children being sent to a Day Industrial School first of all. When that is not available or unsuitable, or where there is no proper home, then we recommend them to be sent to an ordinary Industrial School, where they are both lodged and educated.

213. That comes to be that either the habitual offender sends his child to school in an ordinary way or else you take steps so that his child gets to school one way or another?—That is our aim.

214. The means you take are defective, no doubt?—Defective, I should say to some extent, but not absolutely.

215. Then are we to understand that there are a certain number of children of these habitual offenders roaming about in Glasgow on whom you cannot place your hand?—There always will be a certain number, because they move about to such an extent that we cannot always lay hands on them.

216. What proportion of them, would you say, are the real street arabs in Glasgow?—Not a large proportion.

217. If we gave you a certain number of habitual offenders in Glasgow—say you were told that there were a thousand, how many families would there be roaming about in Glasgow, supposing they were all married?—Well, they vary. We may get hold of them to-day and get the children to school. Next week they may be reported as absent, and as having left their former address. Until they turn up again we cannot deal with them. I do not think the number is large in which the children are absolutely beyond our ken or control. I do not think there are 100 children in Glasgow that have escaped the meshes of the School Board net altogether.

218. What number, would you say, do practically escape it, although they probably nominally attend—how many, in fact, are either badly educated or not educated at all?—I should say there are none not educated at all. I do not think a child could be one year in Glasgow without coming under control of the School Board and being educated in some way. So far as reading, writing, and arithmetic go, it is very rare now to find a child of 10 years who cannot read and partially write and count.

219. You have said that, so far as the nomad class was concerned, your experience was confined entirely, if not almost entirely, to Perthshire, and that you had no special knowledge of them in Glasgow?—I have knowledge of them when they come to Glasgow for the Holiday season or for the Fair, to frequent vacant ground where they are allowed to encamp; but I have no special fault to find with them, because, as a rule, they are fairly well cared for.

220. You have inquired about these tinkers in Perthshire largely—why do they go there?—They have been located there for generations past—for many generations, although I do not know how far back.

221. And you mean to say resident in Perthshire?—Yes, but a migratory class, although they have certain districts round which they go.

222. Your inquiries have not led you to believe that they march, some of them, in the summer time from Glasgow northwards to Perthshire?—No, they do not.

223. So that you don't know of the existence of a nomad, or practically nomad class, in Glasgow in the summer or the winter?—No.

224. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you know if these tinkers of whom you speak spread infectious disease?—There is one kind of infectious disease they are very much afflicted with, and which they spread—that is, vermin. I do not know that they spread such diseases as measles or fever or such like.

225. Supposing these tinkers in Perthshire do not do exactly as you wish, do you propose to punish them by imprisonment?—If they have children for whom they are responsible, I would insist upon their going to a sanitary and fairly comfortable dwelling with these children.

226. But if they play fast and loose with these conditions, do you propose to punish them as a means of bringing them back to civilisation?—Yes, the parents if necessary.

227. You have periodic meetings with parents in respect to neglected children. What is the cause of these parents failing to educate their children?—Well, I read your a communication by the officers, saying—and it is my own experience—that intemperance is one of the chief causes.

228. Yesterday, I think, seven parents were sent to prison for varying periods for failing to educate their children. Is it the case that fathers frequently ascribe their incapacity to send their children to school owing to their having drunken wives?—The drunken wives are a very difficult problem in connection with the School Board. They are very often brought before us. The children have often apparently a decent father, and he declares that he is at his wits' end, and does not know what to do. The very clothes are taken off the children by the mothers, and taken to the pawn in order to get drink. There are no cases that puzzle us more than these.

229. In that case, would it be better to remove that wife from the home, or leave her where she is?—My opinion is, that if there were some kind of Inebriates' Home or Refuge, where they could keep her, at all events, over a probation of six months, or a year if you like, or whatever time may be arranged, and then restore her to her family, and, if reformed, the relations would then be such as could be desired; but if not reformed there should be some easier means to get her separated from her husband and family than there are at present.

230. When you deal with male parents that neglect their children, is it not the case that the real cause is often attributable to the mother, and the father has to suffer?—Such is frequently the case. The husbands are very often decent men with intemperate wives. Where the husband is intemperate the wife is not infrequently led into intemperance.

231. (By Miss Stevenson.) Dr. Sutherland says that he understood that yesterday a certain number of parents were sent to prison for different periods for the neglect of their children's education. I suppose these parents had already been brought before the School Board, and had a chance of having their children cared for under your Delinquency Act, by having the children sent under an attendance order, into school, and if they had done that they would never have been brought before the Court?—There is not a case sent for prosecution before the sheriff in which the dealing has not been manifold. First the ordinary officer calls, then the default officer, then a printed notice is served, then a summons before the Board, then possibly efforts to get the children sent to an Industrial School, and it is only after all these means have failed that prosecution is resorted to.

232. Then it possibly was the fault of the father, as well as the drunkenness of the mother, in these cases which Dr. Sutherland has referred to?—It is quite possible. When a father is sent to prison we feel that it is a very extreme measure that the School Board has resorted to, in separating the man from his wife and children, and taking away their means of support, and we invariably inquire what are the circumstances in which the family are left, and I think I may say, almost without exception, the families usually allege that they are much better off when the man is away ten or twenty days in prison than when he is at home.

William
Mitchell.

233. But the punishment of the father does not rest with the School Board, it rests with the Magistrate?—Yes; but whenever we press for a conviction we invariably get it.

234. But that is after all the other steps you mentioned have taken place previously?—That is so. The sheriff invariably fines or imprisons about ninety per cent. of our cases, and, to show the position of the parents, as a rule nine-tenths of the fines are paid at once. It does not appear to be their poverty that prevents them sending their children to school.

235. Do you not find difficulty sometimes in carrying out the compulsory provisions of the Act, owing to the fact that when you cite a defaulting parent, he moves away to another place. We find that constantly in Edinburgh. There is a certain class who are apparently vagrant in the summer, and who settle in the lodging-houses in the winter, and when they are summoned they move off to another place?—Yes; that is the case, but to a limited extent.

236. Then do you think by some registration of these vagrant families that it would be possible for the educational legislation to get more hold of them, or say, by communication between one School Board and the other?—I do not think there could be any more complete system of registration than we have among our officers.

237. In large towns that may work satisfactorily, but I am referring to country districts, and to cases of children moving about who are not long enough under the jurisdiction of a Board to be taken up for default?—We do not find that there is anything like a class of these who are in town in the winter, and absent in the summer. The labouring classes and the poor are mostly resident, and when they move from one house to another the system our officers have of handing names from one officer to the other is a very complete one.

238. Could not some system of that kind be effective in dealing with these Perthshire tinkers?—I think there would be a good deal of difficulty about it. I do not see at the present moment how it could be accomplished. I may add to what I have already said that in my opinion, after 20 years' experience, moral suasion—i.e., counsel, warning, and advice to the parents—is of more importance, and has more effect, than punitive measures.

239. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you cite mothers of children to come before your Committee?—We summon the fathers, but we take the mothers when they come. We know the difficulties and the loss of pay and so on, that the fathers would have to meet by coming before us, so when the mothers come we accept them.

240. From your observation of these men, are you aware the most miserable specimens of physique who go to prison are those sent by the School Board?—If that is so I am not aware of it.

241. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is it just through carelessness that they don't send their children to school? They do not appear to grudge the money, because they pay the fines?—In most of the cases they pay the fines.

242. Is it because of intemperance that they cannot afford to clothe the children properly?—They do not clothe, and they do not feed them, and they spend the money in drink.

243. Do you think there is less of that since free education came into operation?—Oh no.

244. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) It would not cost the parent anything to send his children to a Board School?—Oh no; but it is the feeding and clothing of them.

245. Do you find parents at all willing to have their children sent to Industrial Schools?—We do not find the parents very anxious to get rid of their children. That is not a feature even of the most wretched of them. They prefer to have their children with them. [The witness withdrew.]

Mr. JAMES R. MOTION called in and examined by the CHAIRMAN.

246. You are the Acting Inspector of Poor to the Barony Parish of Glasgow?—I am.

247. And you have occupied that position since 1885?—Yes.

248. And before that you were collector of Poor Rates from 1878?—Yes.

249. And your work in connection with the Barony Board dates back as far as 1866?—Yes.

250. What is the population of the parish of the Barony?—309,812.

251. It is very thickly populated?—Very thickly, containing 21·04 square miles, of which 10·67 are in the Burgh of Glasgow, and 10·37 in the county.

252. You have some statistics as to the paupers of the parish which you will give to the Committee?—At the last half yearly statistical period at 14th August 1894, there were 2855 applications for parochial relief, and, at the same date, there were upon the out-door roll 4007 persons; in the lunatic asylum 578; lunatics boarded out 201; children boarded out 477; and in the poorhouse 1033; making a total chargeable at 14th August of 6296.

253. Before we pass on from that will you explain what you mean by boarded out lunatics?—They are known in the Lunacy Reports as chronic harmless cases boarded out in private dwellings.

254. And where are they boarded out?—In the country parishes as far east as the county of Fife, and as far west as Ayrshire.

255. Is this system of boarded out and harmless lunatics general throughout Scotland?—Not so general as it ought to be.

256. What other large parishes adopt it?—The City Parish of Glasgow, Govan, Edinburgh, St. Cuthberts, and Dundee.

257. That is practically all the larger Boards of Scotland?—Yes. Aberdeen and Old Machar extensively, but not so much as might be. From the reports I have had, Old Machar Parochial Board had difficulty in getting the sanction of the Medical Superintendants of the asylum to board out suitable cases.

258. You deal with your own lunatics at Woodilee Asylum?—Yes.

259. You might proceed with your statistics?—A comparison of the figures before mentioned for 1884 show that there were 3860 applications; and upon the out-door roll 4389; asylum 495; boarded out lunatics 30; children boarded out 413; in poorhouse 1109; a total of 6436; being a decrease of 146.

260. Explain to the Committee the forms of relief supplied by your board?—The forms of relief are—out-door relief to the ordinary poor, medical relief to those who apply only for such relief, then out-door relief to children boarded with relatives and with guardians in the country, also relief to the sick poor in the Hospital at Barnhill Poorhouse.

261. Explain what you mean by medical relief to those who apply for such?—Men who are out of work, and have wives and children in a bad state of health requiring medical advice and assistance, and the whole circumstances of the case are viewed in as favourable a light as possible in accordance with the instructions of the Board of Supervision, and the Barony Board is extremely open with the relief of such cases. Then there are other cases who apply for medical relief pure and simple, men and women who neither want out-door relief nor want into the poorhouse, but who simply want a doctor.

262. They did not apply directly. They applied to you in these cases?—Yes.

263. Was it with your board that some Seamen's Home or Institution of that kind wished the Parochial Authorities to take charge?—No, we had nothing to do with that.

264. You have a special hospital at Barnhill?—Yes, fully equipped in every respect, trained sick nursing, and everything just as in the Infirmary in the city.

265. What is the accommodation of your poorhouse for the people, who make up its inmates?—The licensed accommodation at this time is 1427, and at the 14th August last there were 1033 persons inmates. These have been classified as under:—704 were there by reason of old age, illness, accident, &c., and in connection with the latter I may mention that we have received more cases of accident within the last few years than hitherto. I take from that, that there is not sufficient accommodation in the existing infirmaries, or that they are just run off to the poorhouse hospital. One hundred and twenty deaf and dumb, blind, weak, and facile-minded; 92 deserted and separated children with parents; and 117 may be classified as depraved, idle, and dissolute.

266. You mention that these 117 people comprise 51 males and 66 females, and you give their ages?—Yes.

267. They are classified by ages?—Yes.

268. It appears that six of the 117 were males between 20 and 29, and that there were nine females of the same age. How did they come within your province? They could not have been able-bodied, or you would not have required to assist them.—They were not. In all probability these females would be with bastard children; the males would be generally venereal cases.

269. But that does not qualify for relief?—They are certified as unfit for work.

270. And you would make the same explanation for all men under 50 or 60?—Not altogether. Last year there were 34 males and 2 females treated in the house with venereal disease.

271. That would hold as making a man not able-bodied, and qualified for relief?—That is so.

272. And that makes up the greater number of the 51 male patients that you classified as dissolute and depraved?—Yes, and commonly certifiable diseases, such as catarrh, debility, and dyspepsia.

273. But that does not come within the scope of dissolute?—Oh yes.

274. Well, one would think it is a man's misfortune if he takes catarrh?—But if you inquire how he gets it, it is by being drunk, and lying in closes at night. I will give other cases illustrative of this.

275. I see you have got your dissolute and depraved of 60 and upwards?—Certainly. I shall give you cases of males first.

276. What is your first case?—John Hunter, aged 40 years, born Calton, single, a slipper maker. First became chargeable to Edinburgh on 22nd February 1876, and has been out and in the poorhouse since; never chargeable for any length of time. He is a well known drinker of 'finish.' I may state I took a gill bottle of 'finish' out of his pocket, and the smell from off him was as if he had been French polishing the whole of the furniture here.

277. Please explain to the Committee what 'finish' is?—'Finish' is a sort of methylated spirit, which goes under the name of 'finish.'

278. Is not 'finish' some preparation of shellac in methylated spirits, used in the polishing of furniture, and called 'finish' because it is employed for giving the finishing touches to furniture?—Yes. Hunter is a loafer, and never seems to do any work, and is always on the look out for drink. He roams over the country, and has been chargeable in Perth, Paisley, Edinburgh, St. Cuthberts, Dundee, &c. parishes. He has been allowed a weekly aliment by the parish, but all to no purpose, he cannot give up drinking—that is, a temporary weekly allowance, to give him a chance to get on his feet. He has been in prison, and is well known to the police. At present he is in prison for drink and disorderliness. He is one of five or six male 'finish' drinkers in Glasgow.

279. Then your next case?—William M'Iroy, aged 48 years, born in Maitland Street, Glasgow, single, and hawker, applied here in July 1874 when 28 years old. At that time he was certified disabled for work, suffering from debility and deformity of hand, and became chargeable in Barnhill Poorhouse, to which he has since then been admitted 124 different times, remaining chargeable for long periods. He generally designates himself a hawker of 'soft goods,' but the truth is his pack is never heavy, consists only of boot-laces, matches, and light trifling articles, and he is well known to be a confirmed beggar and a lazy character, much addicted to drink. Some time ago he formed the acquaintance of a deserted wife named Perry, who has spent the best part of her life in the poorhouse—a bad character, who on 28th March 1891 gave birth to an illegitimate child, of which he is the father, and when not chargeable they generally are co-habiting outside.

280. And your next case?—Widow Terence Cairns (Agnes M'Kinnon), aged 49 years, born Stobcross St., Aunderston. This woman first became chargeable as a pauper on 22nd October 1870, being then aged 25 years, and has been almost continuously out and in the poorhouse since. In 1888 she was married to Terence Cairns, whom she met in Barnhill Poorhouse, and who was another character of the same description. This is a drunken beggar, her field of operations being principally about the city bars, her get up being that of an old frail woman. Should a female bar tender have the hardihood to refuse this old lady's demands, she usually bursts out into a torrent of invectives, and enlightens the company with the sad tale of her son's ruin. She never had one—though a barmaid. Of course her next call ensures a better reception. That is to say she stands at these doors and excites the sympathy of drunk people coming out. She frequently waylays them, and takes them away and robs them, or otherwise. She is very drunken, and has often been in prison.

281. And your next case?—Daniel Paton, single, aged 48 years, born Paisley, a weaver and Protestant. This man originally became chargeable as a pauper on 27th August 1867, when 21 years of age, and has been continuously out and in the poorhouse since. He is lazy, drunken, and has been often in prison for begging. My assistant has seen him in company with two others singing on the streets, and also lecturing at the pitch of his voice of where they had been in search of work, and how long they had been idle. His brother James Paton is another of the same. This man is one of a band of three or four. Ferguson, my chief assistant, saw them in Dumbarton, singing and lecturing, shouting 'who giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.'

282. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Was this man diseased, or how does he get into the poorhouse?—The usual complaint; debility, catarrh, or other diseases from exposure.

283. (By the Chairman.) You speak of debility as a qualification, does it come before your medical officer to the parish?—We have a medical officer whose duty it is to certify these cases.

284. And he would be very much on his guard against imposition?—Oh yes.

285. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) The debility is quite genuine, although the result of bad habits?—Yes.

286. (By the Chairman.) Then your next case?—Jane M'Polland. This I may say is an illustration of hereditary pauperism. Her grandmother and her great grandmother were chargeable to the parish. Jane M'Polland, aged 34 years, born in Piccadilly Street, Glasgow, single, and weaver, made her first appearance here with her mother in 1860, when both became chargeable in the poorhouse, her mother being then deserted by her husband. In February 1878, when about 17 years old, she was admitted to Barnhill, being then disabled from pregnancy. Since then she gave birth to three illegitimate children to three different men, only one of whom is now alive, and is boarded out by this parish. Since 1878, she has almost been continuously chargeable in Barnhill or other poorhouses, and has also been sentenced to several terms of imprisonment, generally for being drunk. She is well known to parochial and police officials and is regarded as an incorrigible person, who never works, and when in the poorhouse neither persuasion nor strictness seems to have any effect upon her, and having a mad craving for drink (and knowing that she cannot be detained in the poorhouse), she frequently discharges herself when sufficiently recovered for another 'booze.' When at liberty she lives on stairs, and in the lowest houses in the city, and subsists through what she makes by begging and prostitution. She has been convicted 63 different times since September 1887, the total number of days in prison being 737, and the prison authorities state that upwards of 40 convictions appear against her previous to that date.

287. What are the sort of things she is convicted of?—Drunkenness, disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, malicious mischief, importuning, and theft. Since this statement was made up she appeared last Wednesday at the office about 4.15 in the afternoon. She had been dismissed from Duke Street Prison that morning, and when she appeared in the afternoon she was almost unable to stand. She did fall in a heap at the applicant clerk's window, and then Mr. Ferguson, before referred to, went to her side, and she was so weak or incapable that he had to put his ear to her lips, but even then could get no answer to his questions, and could make nothing of her. He sent for two constables, and she was taken to the Central Police Office, and again sent to prison. She has now appeared in the poorhouse again, and she will just remain till she gets out again.

288. That gives illustration of the class of case which it is interesting to get particulars of, namely, of persons who oscillate between the prison and the poorhouse?—I have such a list of cases here.

289. We shall take them when you finish the illustrations you are giving us. Meantime will you give us an analysis of the periods of imprisonment in the case of Jane McPolland, stating the offences, and the periods she was imprisoned for each class of offence?—With pleasure; I shall prepare this.

290. What is your next case?—The next is the case of a man, 62 years of age, John Kelly, better known as 'Buck Kelly.' He is a widower, born in Little Street, Calton, and is a tailor to trade. He first became chargeable here in 1881; aged 49 years. Is well known here for years back as a drunken loafer, who does no work, but sponges on all and sundry. He is also well known to the police, and has been often in prison. He has been very frequently in poorhouse, and as often in prison. When out of poorhouse or prison he is always to be found "holding up" Macfarlane's Patent (that is the urinal) at the corner of Orr Street, at Bridgeton Cross. He does not like work, even in the poorhouse. He has been confined to cells for insubordination and assault.

291. (By Col. McHardy.) You can confine them in the poorhouse cells?—Yes.

292. (By the Chairman.) What powers have you in that way?—These powers are defined by the rules of the Board of Supervision, under the authority of the Secretary of State.

293. Then your next case?—James Walter Smith, aged 70 years, born in Dublin, single, and labourer, has been chargeable to barony and city parishes, in the poorhouse seven or eight different times since 1890. Unlike many well known poorhouse pests he has no desire to frequent or become an inmate of that institution, and when he does go, it is usually from the Police Court or Office, whither he often is taken when drunk. For a long time he laboured with butchers, in and around the meat market, but for the past number of years has followed no occupation of any kind, but maintained himself by begging, which he now does in some of the busiest thoroughfares in the city. He is also known to have, in quiet country villages near Glasgow, successfully passed himself off as being deaf and dumb, a pretence to win the sympathy of farmers and others whom he knew, and thought would be disposed to assist such poor people. He is much given to drink, and in this way squanders all his coppers, and although presently residing in Great Hamilton Street Model, he generally lives in the worst hovels about Bridgegate and King Street.

294. (By Col. McHardy.) Has that man been in prison?—Yes.

295. (By the Chairman.) Your next case?—John

Hynds. He is aged 33 years, born in Parkhead. Goes about while out of poorhouse selling matches and begging. He is an epileptic. His appearance and affliction command the sympathy of the public. He is a little soft or silly. Has been chargeable more or less since August 1881, then aged 21 years. Between 1886 and 1888 he was sentenced at Eastern Police Court to 230 days' imprisonment for indecent behaviour, begging, and theft. He has been in Barnhill Poorhouse on at least 50 occasions; and has been made to wear 'Punishment Dress' while there on at least eight occasions. He is a silly creature that should never be at large.

296. His case, if he is an epileptic and silly, would rather point to some proper provision for persons of that class, would it not?—To the extent of giving power to confine that man in a poorhouse, because he is not certifiable as insane.

297. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) But he is a habitual offender really because he is epileptic and silly?—Yes.

298. (By the Chairman.) Then your next case?—James Thomson. This is a single man aged 37 years, born in the Maternity Hospital, Rottenrow. When he does any work puts in coals. He first became chargeable on 16th February 1886, aged 29 years, and since then he has been in Barnhill Poorhouse on at least 53 occasions. He is very much given to drink, and seldom appears at the office unless under its influence. Has had his wrist, ankle, shoulder blade, jaw-bone, &c., &c., either sprained or dislocated by falls, &c., while drunk. Has been often in prison for being drunk and incapable.

299. Now then, give us a few of the cases that oscillate between the poorhouse and the prison.—The first is James Hamilton's wife. This woman was found in Duke Street Prison. She is 44 years of age and a native of Anderston. First chargeability was on 9th November 1881, when her two children were removed to poorhouse from Northern Police Office. Deserted by father and mother; sent 30 days to prison. Since then she has spent the most of her life either in prison or Barnhill. The children were boarded out, and have since gone to service. She is a drunken character, and while out of prison or poorhouse generally lies on stair-heads; or, if in the summer time, about Glasgow Green. Her husband left her in 1881, and in November 1888 he got four months imprisonment for bigamy. He was apprehended for wife desertion, but was allowed to go on promising to pay wife 2s. 6d. weekly, which he once paid her, and has not been heard of since. She has now sunk to the very lowest level; is one of the poorest and most depraved characters on our streets.

300. This case was found by your assistants in going over the prison?—Yes.

301. Then how many cases have you of this sort?—I have 29 on the list.

302. (By the Chairman.) There is one class I would like to ask you about, that is the class of poor in England called casuals, tramps, and vagrants; what provisions are made in Scotland for vagrants?—In Scotland we have no casual wards. The difference is that in England everyone is entitled to relief. In Scotland a line is drawn at able-bodied, and the only case where such a corresponding ward is in Scotland is the test ward of the poorhouse, for so-called loafers, able-bodied dissolute people, who may be certified as suffering from catarrh, debility, dyspepsia, and such like, but who are able to do a certain amount of work.

303. But how does that correspond to the casual wards provided in England?—It does not exactly correspond.

304. In fact, you have nothing to correspond?—Well, that is the proper answer.

305. Do you think the absence of such wards cause much hardship in Scotland?—I think not.

306. In England a great number of the tramps who frequent the casual wards are decent working men going from one place to another in search of employment, do you know how such men would be accommodated in Scotland?—They could not be accommodated under the Poor Law.

307. We were informed by a former witness that something over 5000 people voluntarily took refuge in the Police Offices in Glasgow in one year?—I quite believe so.

308. Do you happen to know anything about these?—These people are what I would call the constitutional loafer, and not the decent working man.

309. These men in the Police Office?—Yes.

310. You have here a number of cases which came to your poorhouse from Barlinnie Prison?—Yes.

311. You have in the course of five years had 47 such cases?—Yes.

312. Does not that appear rather a smaller number than you would have expected?—No: properly speaking I should not expect any.

313. Why?—Because I say that the Prison Authorities, when a man becomes sick and requires hospital treatment, ought to look after him, whereas he is sent from the prison to the nearest poorhouse.

314. Is that the class of cases?—Yes.

315. And that accounts for 5 of the 47 having died within a few weeks of their dismissal from Prison?—Yes.

316. You think in the case of sick prisoners the Prison Authorities should be responsible for them till they are removed?—Well, I used to think so, but it is immaterial who keeps them. It is as broad as it is long.

317. (By Dr. Sutherland.) These are prisoners whose sentences have expired, but are unable owing to ill-health to be set at large?—Some of them.

318. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) One of them seems to have gone back?—That is the case of a man whom we were asked to send for, and he passed through our books; but, when the van went for him, he was found to be dead.

319. (By the Chairman.) What is your experience in administering the Poor Law as to the effects of habitual drunkenness, do you come across very much of that?—A very great deal.

320. And have you any suggestion to make as to how the habitual drunkenness that you complain of might be met, and its effects counteracted?—I think it might be met by utilising the existing poorhouses. There are numerous poorhouses throughout the country, partly vacant, admirably suited for the treatment of these people.

321. But in the first place you have to catch your hare. How would you define your habitual drunkard?—By the frequency of their convictions before the Police Court.

322. Then what is the number you would propose?—That requires some explanation, because my impression is that the magistrates are rather lenient in their sentences at the present moment, and might have a woman six times before the court in as many weeks with short sentences; where in another district, with long sentences of fourteen days and such like, she may not turn up that number of times in six months. It greatly depends upon how the existing acts are put into operation.

323. That is exactly what I am driving at. I want to know if you have thought the matter over, and whether you have any easy method for identifying habitual drunkards, and dealing with them?—Having made that explanation, I should say that if a man or woman has been convicted six times by any magistrate, the sooner they are put under restraint the better.

324. (By Dr. Farquharson.) In a year or in a lifetime?—I should say six times independent of what period.

325. But six times in 20 years would be very little—there would have to be some limit?—If a man or woman turns up for the sixth time in 20 years it shows a relapse at all events.

326. (By the Chairman.) Were you connected with the deputation which went to Germany to visit the Labour Colonies?—Yes.

327. Is there anything in connection with these Labour Colonies that you think could be utilised for the inquiry that we have before us?—The only point I wish to emphasise is this extract from the report of the Deputation:—‘It has to be borne in mind, however, James R. Motion. that the German Criminal Law is more comprehensive than our own, in so far as it confers more extensive powers over the class of persons for whom a Labour Colony is intended.’ That is to say the laws prevailing in Germany take up and deal with these cases.

328. Can you tell us what powers are conferred by the German laws upon the persons who carry on, or manage, or take care of, these Labour Colonies?—The point I wish to emphasise is more as to the imprisonment and punishment. By the 361st section of the German Penal Code, amongst other provisions it is enacted that—‘He is punished with imprisonment (1) Who, after he has been put under Police Supervision, breaks through the restrictions under which he has been placed. (2) Who goes about as a tramp. (3) Who begs, or directs or sends out children to beg, or fails to prevent persons from begging who are under his control and supervision, and belong to his household. (4) Who gives way to play, drink, or idleness, so that he falls into a state in which the help of outsiders has to be claimed, through the intervention of the authorities, for his maintenance, or the maintenance of those for whose support he is responsible. (5) Who, if he receives relief from public poor funds, refuses out of dislike of work to perform a task suitable to his powers, which is assigned to him by the authorities. (6) Who, after loss of the lodging which he has had up to the time, has not, in the interval permitted him by the proper authorities, procured for himself a lodging anywhere else, and cannot show that, notwithstanding the trouble he has taken, he has been unable to do so.’

329. (By the Chairman.) There is a large number of these punishable in this country, and with a good number of them we have nothing to do, so far as our inquiry is concerned, but there is one point in connection with your report. You refer to Compulsory Labour Colonies, Labour Colonies to which men are apparently committed by the magistrates, a sort of quasi criminal institution as distinguished from the voluntary ones you describe; can you give us any information about them?—They are simply referred to in the report; we were not instructed to visit them, but we know they exist, and they are referred to in Parliamentary reports.

330. Could you, from among the people you met there, get any of the rules bearing upon these Compulsory Colonies, so that they might be printed in the appendix?—Certainly.

331. (By Miss Stevenson.) I wish to ask, in connection with the case of the woman you mentioned, who had been so frequently before the Police Court and so frequently in the poorhouse, and of whose three illegitimate children one had been boarded out and had turned out well, had you any power to keep her in the poorhouse, or could she leave as soon as she liked?—We have no power to keep these cases in the poorhouse.

332. Then, how did you relieve her of the responsibility of this child, and board it out?—In consequence of Jane's bad habits, and her systematic going in and out of the poorhouse, we simply told her that we were going to keep the child, and that she was an able-bodied woman and could go about her business. You see this child kept her an object of relief, and we took the child from her.

333. You had no power to make the keeping of the child a condition of her staying in the house?—No.

334. Had you any right to take away this child?—She might have claimed it, but the court would not have given sanction to her claiming. Parliament has recognised that by the statute of 1892.

335. You have the same powers as one has under the Industrial Schools Act to get a child committed or taken away from improper guardianship?—We have no power such as you speak of.

336. What power have you then?—Simply standing in loco parentis to the child. I may supplement that by saying that under that head we have removed 488 children from dissolute parents since 1884.

337. (By Col. M'Hurdy.) Since 1884 the ‘Results of Parents Believed" show that of the 270 parents dealt with, 12 are still chargeable owing to ill-health.

338. Two hundred and twenty-four have ceased to be chargeable, and 34 returning at irregular intervals?—That is so.

339. (By Dr. Sutherland.) With your knowledge of these restless dissolute people, is it desirable that you should have more power to retain them in the house than you have at present?—It is very desirable.

340. Supposing you have power to retain them, have you at present power to compel them to respect your regulations when they are in the poorhouse?—We have.

341. You speak of confining vagrants in the poorhouse, do you propose to have vagrants and inebriates under the same roof and subject to the same discipline?—I would include them under the same roof. Perhaps you would allow me to explain that the reason for that is this. In some parts of the country there would be very few of both of these classes, and it would be a little absurd to separate them, and to have separate accommodations for them.

342. But in places like Edinburgh, and Glasgow, or Dundee, do you think it desirable to have these three quite distinct classes under the same roof and discipline?—I see no reason why they should not be. I am assuming that they are drawn from the same classes.

343. Is it not the case that in the poorhouse at present you have got a number of honest respectable poor?—Yes.

344. Is it desirable that those persons should be herded along with vagrants and dissolute persons?—Undoubtedly not, but they would not be herded together. In a properly managed poorhouse they would be classified.

345. But, suppose you had poorhouses in Scotland which might be set aside entirely for the different types, would there be the same necessity for putting them together?—There might not. But I do not believe too much in sub-division, or in too particular classification.

346. Supposing in or near Glasgow an institution were to be found with accommodation for 500 of the class referred to, would you not prefer to send inebriates there rather than to mix them up with vagrants, beggars, and paupers?—Probably that would be better from the management point of view.

347. The same discipline I suppose is not applicable to all three types?—No.

348. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The numbers in the poorhouse who receive relief are lowest, I believe, about August and September?—Yes.

349. And they are highest about January and February?—Yes.

350. The difference being over Scotland about 3000 or something like that—it varies from something like 22,000 to 95,000, according to last year's report?—That is so.

351. Why are these variations?—There is a class of restless people in the poorhouse who leave it in the spring and summer, and tramp the country, and live in the country; and they return to their homes—namely the poorhouse—in the winter.

352. Then there is a considerable march of poor out of such a town as Glasgow in the summer?—There is.

353. And do these people—I have heard it is so—go in certain circles, some of them in larger circles, some of them in smaller, some of them almost parochial?—That is so.

354. And they form, in fact, I suppose to a certain extent, the tramp class?—That is my opinion.

355. And the children of these people are under your surveillance sometimes or other in the winter time?—They are.

356. What do you do with them?—They are kept in a separate department of the poorhouse, what is called the children's department, still further divided into boys and girls, and they are under the charge of a trained sick nurse. They go to school, the Protestants to the Peterhill Board School, and the Catholics to the Catholic School in Springburn. Originally an officer was sent with them, but they do not require that now.

The boys go out of the poorhouse and go back to it as if they were living in an ordinary home.

357. Then that goes on until the numbers begin to fall, somewhere about April, when the exodus begins?—Yes.

358. Do these children reappear?—They do, but the children of such a class are very few.

359. They die?—No. It is not that. The cases that leave the poorhouse, and go on the tramp, have very few children in comparison with those who remain and live in the poorhouse.

360. You mean, because they have few children or none, that is one of the reasons they march?—Exactly. On an average we won't have any more than 88 children in the poorhouse throughout the year, and probably 50 of these are in the hospital. Our rule is where a parent is likely to be permanently confined in the hospital, is likely to die, is past working or caring for his children, we make arrangements with the parents for the children being boarded out, we bring the children back on a visit to see their parents in the hospital. Also in those cases whom we know by reputation to have a bad name for going on tramp and such like, we take the children from them in the way described to Miss Stevenson, so it is not the case when they leave the poorhouse and go on tramp that they have bands of children with them.

361. As a rule, their children would be kept by you and educated? In fact, so far as the children of those residential winter people are concerned, there are few of them being educated to the same life?—That is so.

362. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I suppose you propose the poorhouse for detention for economical reasons?—On account of economy, and also because they are in good accessible centres.

363. If money were no object would you prefer to build separate institutions?—I do not think so.

364. You think they are as well devised as they can be?—Yes.

365. Supposing this extension of the law were carried out, would there be at once a very large number of inebriates brought under detention?—There probably would be in large centres like Glasgow, but in the provincial towns, if I may so call them, there would not be so many, and these would gradually be removed off their tracks.

366. You mean that the extension of the law would act as a deterrent to evil-doers?—I believe it would.

367. But would not the detention of that large number of people be a serious matter to the community?—I think it would pay itself in the long run.

368. Do you think the product of their labour would largely diminish the cost of their keep?—That is so in Germany, and it is my experience in my own poorhouse.

369. But is there not considerable complaint in regard to unfair and pressing competition with prison and poorhouse labour? Might that not be a difficulty?—It might be, but what can you do.

370. You would give the magistrates unlimited power of detention in these cases?—No, I would limit that.

371. Have you formed any opinion in your own mind what period of detention is necessary to break the drunken habit?—From one to two years. Two years is the maximum.

372. And the minimum?—The minimum would be anything, perhaps from six months up to two years.

373. Is that founded upon theory or upon an experience of foreign countries who have adopted these plans?—It is simply from theory, and dealing with cases in the poorhouse. We have many cases where we use every means possible to keep them in the poorhouse, bribery, and everything else; and if we had the power to keep these cases for a few months longer I am quite certain they would be cured.

374. But do you think it quite fair to brand a man with criminality on account of what many people hold to be a disease?—I do not think it would be branding a man. I think it is far better to keep him off the street than to hurl him through it in a barrow.

375. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you thought

James R.
Motion.

18 Nov. 1904.

James R.
Motion.

13 Nov. 1894.

of the possibility of there being difficulty in practically carrying out the power of detention in the poorhouse?—I have had this before me for years past. In 1888 we applied to the Board of Supervision for increased power in connection with these very cases. The maximum period of notice is 72 hours at present. Formerly an inmate of a poorhouse must give 24 hours notice before he or she could quit, but now the 72 hours notice has to be given. We wanted more than that, we wanted a week, because we were under the impression that, if the inmates had to give a week's notice, by the time that period was up they would be no longer in the mind to go out—the idea would have worn off them.

376. Suppose an inebriate chose to go away from the poorhouse, you would not prevent him from doing that?—Just now?

377. No. Suppose he is sentenced three years to the poorhouse. At first he is in very bad health, but he gets better in a few weeks?—He could not walk off. If the Government gave us powers just as in the Industrial Schools, we could bring him back.

378. Would you propose to send him to prison if he tried to escape?—No, I would simply bring him back to the house. But I would make a proviso of this kind, that, if the medical officer of the house would certify him as fit to go, he might be taken before a magistrate and the sentence reduced.

379. But do you think these powers would be sufficient to enable you to detain inebriates if you had them?—I think so.

380. Do you come in contact at all with the class that commit habitual petty thefts?—Yes.

381. Are these largely inebriates?—No, I would not say so.

382. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to that class who are not inebriates?—Well, I have had two or three cases of that kind certified as insane. But I rather thought that that was carrying it too far, that those people who committed petty thefts should be confined in the same way, and in the same institution.

383. Now, these people that you speak of as oscillating between the poorhouse and the prison, when you first come in contact with them what sort of constitutions do they have?—I can hardly answer you that. Most of those cases before my mind came to the board before I had really personal contact with them, and I could not remember. But from passing them over my mind they had fairly good constitutions, because if they had not they would have been in their graves.

384. They have fairly good mental capacities then, you think?—The women have.

385. (By Miss Stevenson.) With regard to these boarded out children, you state as a rule they are brought up entirely apart from the vagrant class they belong to. If they were left to their parents they would grow up to the same life?—Most assuredly.

386. Have you any power to prevent the parents claiming them when they become 14, or 15, or 16 years of age?—Yes, under the custody of Children Act, 1891.

387. Up to what age can you prevent a parent reclaiming them?—Any age. The parents must apply to the Court, and get the sanction of the Court.

388. You have that power of detention?—Yes.

389. (By Dr. Sutherland.) The inebriate you propose to detain in the poorhouse is an inebriate who has been both in the poorhouse and the prison, and is common to both?—Yes.

390. But the working man who is convicted five or six times a year—you do not propose to put him into the poorhouse?—No.

391. (By the Chairman.) There is one point you have not made very clear, namely, that you think that the Government should make some subsidy towards the expenses of such a scheme as you suggest. You give in the summary with which you have supplied us, a number of different costs of maintenance, management, accommodation, and so on. The average for maintenance in Scotland is 3s. 1d., and you say that if an allowance of one-half thereof only were allowed by the Government, it would ease the local taxation. But the Government makes no allowance in the case of paupers, and you propose that the analogy of lunatics rather should be followed?—Yes, in respect that at present a number of these people are confined in prison, and receive medical relief.

392. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But that subvention is only for medical relief?—That is so. [The witness withdrew.]

John Boyd.

MR. JOHN BOYD, The Chief Constable of Glasgow, called in and examined.

John Boyd

393. (By the Chairman.) You are the Chief Constable of Glasgow?—I am.

394. We have been enquiring as to the mode of treatment of drunkards in Glasgow, and as to whether there is any peculiarity in it, as contrasted with other parts of Scotland. Can you give us your opinion on that point?—Well, I can only say that the sentences are somewhat similar over the whole of Scotland. Some of the magistrates in Glasgow are very lenient—sentences from 2s. 6d. upwards.

395. Have the police any special powers in Glasgow as contrasted with other burghs?—As contrasted with the burghs, no; but as contrasted with the counties they have.

396. In fact the burghs have adopted the powers of the special Act for Glasgow?—Yes.

397. We have been told about the system that prevails here of liberating men arrested on a charge of committing petty thefts, drunkenness especially, on their leaving behind them a pledge?—That exists all over.

398. How is it worked?—The lieutenant on duty, under the Glasgow Police Act, has the power of liberating offenders brought in on such offences. Suppose a person is brought in drunk, when he is sober and able to take care of himself, and leaves a pledge behind him, he is let out. The maximum penalty is 40s., and the lieutenant is generally instructed not to take under 7s. 6d. But in exceptional cases he may take 5s.

399. Then the amount of the pledges do not vary in different parts of the city?—No. We strike an average of the fines imposed by the magistrates throughout the city, and fix the pledge accordingly.

400. And the instructions are given to the lieutenants to adopt the same rules as to the amount all over the city?—That is so.

401. Have you any information as to the amount of money left in the shape of pledges, separating into different classes the different offences—take drunkenness, for instance?—I was not aware that you wanted that. We have a great many of that class of offender pledged out between Saturday and Monday morning. Take the Central Court, for instance. We may have 70 or 80 drunks coming in, and when the Court on Monday morning arrives there are perhaps a fourth of them pledged.

402. I suppose the men who leave pledges do not turn up?—Very seldom.

403. And these pledges include bails paid for their liberation by friends?—When sober we give them the opportunity of communicating with their friends, and if the friends find the pledge we liberate them. If a man has no money, and if he has a watch or any other article equivalent to the pledge, we take it instead, and he can redeem it as soon as he likes, and if he does not redeem it at the expiry of a year it is sold under warrant of the magistrates.

404. You must have a curious assortment?—We have rather a mixed lot.

405. Do you notice any great diversity of sentences pronounced by the different magistrates?—Oh yes. There are great differences of opinion among the magistrates. Some do very little to the offenders at certain seasons of the year. They allow them to go, perhaps at the Fair time or at the New Year time.

John Boyd. They give them a little more latitude at such times. Others take a different view and impose sharp penalties.

13 Nov. 1894.

406. And it depends a great deal upon the magistrate that the man is brought before? Yes. Prior to 1873 it was not the custom to bring 'drunk and incapables' before the Court at all. The lieutenant had the power given him by the magistrates, through the Chief Constable, to liberate them without any trial at all, and if they had 2s. 6d., or a pledge of any kind, it was taken from them, but if they had not they were sent away all the same. In the year 1866, when the present Act then came in force, there were 15,218 males and 8704 females arrested, and of that number there were convicted or forfeited pledges, only 368 males and 218 females. All the others were discharged by the lieutenant in the morning when they got sober. A new state of matters came into force in 1873, when instructions were issued by the magistrates that all offenders were to be brought before the Court, or only liberated on pledge.

407. Are you aware of the suggestion made in various quarters that habitual drunkards should be dealt with in a particular way?—Yes.

408. But the preliminary question arises how are you to identify the habitual drunkard, and it has been suggested that so many convictions for drunkenness, or crimes of which drunkenness forms a large part—such as disorderly drunkenness, assault and drunkenness—within a given time, should render a man an habitual drunkard, and make him liable to be dealt with under the powers proposed to be given to the authorities. Now the preliminary objection arises. You keep no record of these prisoners discharged on pledge?—Yes we do. There is a district register in which the apprehension of every man, and the crime with which he is charged, is entered into, and also the time of his discharge.

409. But, I suppose in almost all these cases, false names may be given?—In many cases false names are given. Sometimes you cannot get names at all, until the people get sober.

410. Then forfeiting a pledge does not imply guilt, and it does not imply innocence?—No. Of course it cannot be charged as an aggravation. In fact, at present we cannot charge any person—a drunk, or incapable, or prostitute—with any aggravation of previous conviction. We are asking for that power just now in a Bill which is being prepared.

411. In that respect drunkenness is treated in a different manner to England, for in England a second conviction renders a man liable to a higher penalty, and a third to a still higher?—I am not so certain of the penalties in England, but there are statutes of that kind dealing with certain offences in Scotland, but not in regard to drunkenness. Forty shillings is the highest penalty for drunkenness under the Police Act, but the magistrate may go further. In addition to that penalty he may impose a further penalty of £10, with the alternative of 30 days imprisonment, to ensure the good behaviour of the offender for 12 months, and in the event of his being unable to find the caution of £10, he has to go to prison for the period named. I have never known, however, of a single instance of that power being exercised.

412. I believe it is enforced in England, but not very generally, so far as I know. But we did not get your answer as to what you would consider an habitual drunkard?—I should say that the judge should be left to judge generally as to what is an habitual drunkard. To narrow it down to a certain number of convictions, say for four or five times, or six times, in the course of a year, would be, in my opinion, rather a dangerous thing to do.

413. Why?—Well, we have instances of a working man who many get tipsy at the end of a fortnight when he gets his pay, and gets convicted. He goes off to his work on Monday morning and works all the fortnight sober, and supports his family, and discharges all his duties; and then again, at the end of the following fortnight when he gets his next pay, he again falls into our hands. I think it would be a very hard thing to deprive the wife and family of that man's support.

414. Then you would not say six times?—I should say rather that the police magistrate should be compelled, if a prisoner comes before him on a charge of drunkenness, or an offence involving drunkenness, and he finds the man is an habitual drunkard—of course you would define that in your Act—that he should have to send that man to the sheriff, to be dealt with as an habitual drunkard. I am of opinion that if you give the power to our magistrates, many of them are so lenient that the power would not be enforced. In our Courts, with 200 or 300 drunks passing before the magistrate—one might have 150 before him in the morning—it would be rather sharp work for the magistrate to send a man off to years of confinement. I think it should be stated to the man that he is going to be dealt with under the Act, and that he should be sent to the sheriff for that purpose. He would get a copy of the libel served upon him, the same as in any ordinary criminal case, and would have the opportunity of collecting evidence to defend himself on the charge of being an habitual drunkard, within the interpretation of the act.

415. Can you give us any specimens of habitual drunkards in Glasgow, with whom the police of Glasgow are concerned?—We have a number, more especially these poor unfortunate women who are in our hands very often, and would come under the provisions of such an act. There were in one year 248 females, and 87 males, who were convicted more than four times of offences involving drunkenness and disorderliness, or importuning.

416. That is rather a small number; can you give us six or eight times?—Well, I have not got it here beside me, but I sent a return to the secretary showing the number committed five times and upwards. As I have already said, we have only district registers for these petty offences, and the number of convictions are not so readily obtainable; but, if these offences were to be charged as aggravations, we would have to do as we do in the criminal cases—keep a central register for the whole city.

417. You would not have the drunks all brought into one particular Police Office?—No. I do not think that would do; but I may say that, taking it all round, drunks as a rule stick pretty closely to the district they stay in. It is different with females for importuning, because, whenever they become known in one part of the city, they go to another.

418. We have been told that there is a large number of persons, some 5000 or so, vagrants destitute of accommodation for the night, who go about and sleep in the Police Offices?—We have a great many people who come and ask protection and shelter for the night. We do not encourage them; but we do not at the same time care about turning them out.

419. What sort of people are they?—Destitute people; tramps perhaps passing through the city, or any person destitute of a home. We give the lieutenants leave, if they have accommodation, to give them shelter; but to discourage it. They are not put beside prisoners. They are kept till the morning, and get a little bread, and are then turned away.

420. Is that simply a benevolent thing?—We have no power to do it. We simply do it at their request.

421. Is it done anywhere else?—I think it is done over the whole country.

422. And it to some extent takes the place of the casual wards?—It does to some extent. In the first instance we direct them to the night asylum, and if they come back to us telling us that the night asylum is full, and they cannot get in, rather than have them on the street we take them in.

423. Have you many children among these?—No, not many. Sometimes it happens that a woman with a child may come in, but this practice is decreasing gradually, because we discourage it.

424. No doubt you know of the great trouble that has been given in England about how to deal with casuals. It is said that the greater number of them are a very bad lot of people. Is that the same sort of class that frequent your office?—No. When they are known to the police to be bad characters, and just coming to take the loan of us for the night, we do not give them protection at all; those we give protection to are mostly people who would create sympathy; people not criminals. As for vagrants we usually take them before the Court if we find them sleeping on stairs, or about kilns, or anywhere at large.

13 Nov. 1894.

John Boyd.
18 Nov. 1894.

425. How does the magistrate deal with them?—They get 14 days for the first offence, or 30 days for the second; but for the first offence the magistrates as a rule never sends them to prison. For the first offence they are usually advised to go to the poorhouse.

426. But there must be a very large class unqualified for the poorhouse?—Able-bodied men found sleeping out at nights, the magistrates invariably send to prison for short periods.

427. Is vagrancy much of a trouble in Glasgow?—No.

428. Have you any experience of other places?—I have had no experience of other places, but I think in Glasgow it has diminished very much, both vagrancy and drunkenness.

429. Drunkenness decreasing?—Will you give us statistics of that?—Take from 1875, as before that our system of classification was different. The number of convictions, including forfeitures in the city for being drunk and incapable in 1875, was 15,835, while the population then was 500,000. In 1893 the number was 16,043, with a population of 680,000, or close upon 700,000, so that the number I have given you for 1893 is almost similar to that of 1875, and the population has increased as stated. Another thing we have to bear in mind is that about Glasgow the railway facilities are great, and it being surrounded by so many towns and villages, has its streets crowded on a Saturday evening, and many cases arise from persons visiting the city.

430. I notice in reading your return you include convictions and forfeitures of pledges?—I am including forfeitures and pledges here.

431. So that you regard the forfeitures of pledges as in all probability guilt of drunkenness?—Yes.

432. Can you give us the comparative numbers in regard to disorderly and other petty offences not cases of drunkenness?—In 1875 there were 25,298, whereas in 1893 there were 20,662, so that that is a considerable decrease when the increase of the population is considered.

433. We see that the number of arrests and convictions for these petty offences in Glasgow is enormously greater than many other large cities in the three countries?—Glasgow has had Police Acts rather in advance of many places throughout the country, and we have been dealing with offences in Glasgow that escape in other towns. You cannot compare England with Scotland, because the procedure is so different. A man is not dealt with there for drunkenness at all. When a man is brought in there for drunkenness he goes off as soon as he is sober. Here we keep him, and get a pledge from him, or bring him before the Court.

434. Do you think that the excess of arrests and convictions in Glasgow and in Scotland generally, compared with England, is an unmitigated good?—It is bound to do good. The statistics look bad, but it is bound to do good if imprisonment has any deterrent effect.

435. Have you any statistics?—Nothing beyond that. I should like very much to see an experiment made by taking these poor characters away from us for some time, to see if they could get any power over their own will.

436. You have told us how you identify them—persons who have been convicted a number of times, and who are considered by the magistrate to be habitual drunkards?—But I would not wait upon convictions. I would go farther. You might get a man who was brought before the Court and only a single conviction against him, and his wife might then reveal that he gave her no support, that he was never sober, and that he was of no use to his family. I would say that that man should be sent to the sheriff John Boyd. for disposal as an habitual drunkard.

437. Well, that opens up another and very difficult subject; that is, of dealing with drunkards at the instance of their friends and relatives?—Well, I have thought of that, but I am dealing with a man who is brought before a Court for assault upon his wife, and who is stated on the evidence there to be an habitual drunkard. I say you should not wait for a number of convictions.

438. About beggary; have you much of that?—We are pretty free from that in Glasgow.

439. Do you look after it sharply?—Yes; we put out men from time to time in plain clothes, when we think it is bad, the same as we do in respect to fallen women.

440. And the number of your convictions for begging is what?—The number is in my annual return.

441. (By Prof. Dove Wilson.) When a person is brought up just now as a 'drunk and incapable,' have you any means to distinguish between an habitual drunkard, and a person who is brought up for the first time?—Unless the constable on the beat knows the man himself personally, we have no means of knowing that, unless we were to make special inquiry.

442. Would it not be much better to have the previous convictions labelled and proved in the ordinary way?—That is what I say. I have in a Bill now proposed for Glasgow got a clause put in that all convictions for contraventions should be charged as aggravations.

443. And do you take care that that aggravation is not to be mentioned to the magistrate?—According to the general law we must first prove our case before we mention the convictions.

444. Then at present it is very much a matter of accident distinguishing between the habitual drunkard and the man in for the first time?—Well, the policeman and the turnkeys come to know them by headmark, and may be able to state their character.

445. Is that done in the court?—Sometimes, although it is not regular. The question is sometimes asked, but the fiscal could take objection to it.

446. Is it not more irregular to deal with a man as a habitual offender without giving him notice of it?—I said I would send him to the sheriff so that he might be dealt with after notice.

447. Have you any provision in Glasgow by which an able-bodied person who is in temporary want can get food and shelter in exchange for work?—We have been in the habit of forwarding any cases of that kind to the Charity Organisation Society, and they have started a home just now—and the police are co-operating with them—where persons may get work such as breaking fire-wood. Last week the society sent us 40,000 circulars, which I caused to be delivered by the police in all the shops and places in the city, so that persons applying could be sent to the Charity Organisation Society.

448. Have you many juveniles committed here to prison?—Not many.

449. Any under the age of 12 committed to prison here?—We have occasionally, but very seldom. I have given the number to the clerk of this Committee of those committed under 14, but they are very few.

450. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Are you familiar with people who take their bouts of drinking and are quite sane between times?—Yes.

451. A man of that kind might be brought under Magisterial Supervision five or six times, and yet at other times might be quite sane and discharging all his responsible duties. Do you think there might be an injustice to confine that individual?—Where a man is able to control himself, say for three, or four, or six months at a time, I do not think it would be right to send him away.

452. Then the habitual soaker who does not come under your notice would be a more legitimate person to be put under supervision than that?—Yes.

453. Do you think a short period of imprisonment has any deterrent effect on the habitual?—Very little; but I would like to see our magistrates more severe with them before they become habituals.

18 Nov. 18

454. You think their power of will is then gone?—Yes; and the only chance for them would be to get them removed altogether.

455. Would you be in favour of some plan for prolonged detention?—Yes; that is the only plan, but even of that I have little hope, for in regard to our convicts very few of them abstain from drink when they come back.

456. In the case of a convict, would that not be because, perhaps, he could not get work when he comes back?—That is not the case. There is more done in my opinion for convicts and prisoners coming out of prison than there is done in many cases for deserving poor. They are taken by the hand by the Prison Society, and a great deal is done for them, and many a one I have got into employment myself.

457. Have you formed any idea, in your own mind what would be the minimum period of detention to reclaim the habitual drunkard?—Well, that is more for a medical man, but I should say not less than 12 months.

458. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Can you give us any more explanation about the numbers per thousand apprehended in Glasgow in comparison with all the rest of the country. It is so extraordinarily, so immensely different? For instance, I read in the return which has been prepared by our Secretary—for disorderly and breach of the peace over the country—Glasgow, 60 persons per 1000; Edinburgh, 24. Now take Dundee, a good specimen of a town where the population at any rate is not all quiescent, 28 as compared with 60 in Glasgow. Then take Leith, 20 per 1000 instead of 60 in Glasgow. Then here is another town which might be very fairly compared; Greenock, 33 per 1000, as compared with 60—a town with a large Irish population; Govan, which is contiguous to Glasgow, in fact with continuous streets, but with a different police force, I believe, 28 per 1000; and—without going out of this country—could you give any explanation of that?—I think that the general explanation I gave in answer to Sir Charles Cameron goes a long way. Govan is really part of Glasgow. On a Saturday night you find the people come in to Glasgow. You are drawing the average on Glasgow's population, and Glasgow all the time is bearing the burden of those other populous places round about. To compare Glasgow with Edinburgh and Dundee is out of the question. The population is altogether different.

459. Would you say that Dundee's population is better, on the average, than Glasgow's?—I cannot say that it is. Here you have a mining population, and you have ironworkers, many of whom are of the lowest class, and these spend their money freely on drink. In Dundee it is different—cotton workers, jute workers, and mill girls, not likely to spend their money so freely. The people round about Dundee have not the same facilities for getting into the city as in the case of Glasgow; and the inclination of the people is to come into the city on festivals and at times of rejoicing. I could also remark about Dundee that the Government Inspector has pointed out that the force of police there is numerically weak.

460. And it depends to a certain extent on the police?—The more police, the fewer cases of drunkenness will be passed. If you have fewer policemen you will have less cases.

461. There is a very interesting thing you mentioned about different treatment beginning in 1873. The number of disorderly cases before that was comparatively small, but it seems to have bounded up suddenly; was that owing to fresh legislation or police arrangements?—Prior to the 1866 Act cases of disorderly conduct were treated as 'drunk and disorderly,' but that was found inoperative, because in many cases they were disorderly and not drunk. Other cases were classed as 'breaches of the peace.' It was found advisable to reclassify the offences, and drunks, assaults, breaches of the peace, and disorderly conduct were all treated separately.

462. The result of it was to increase largely the number of your apprehension and committals to prison?—After 1873. Prior to 1873 the Police Authorities did not encourage the police to bring in drunk and incapable prisoners, because they were not brought before the Court. After the constables received instructions that all prisoners were to be brought before the Court, then they had some inducement to bring in prisoners, because there was something to show for their work.

463. But the action of the police was not forced upon them by some new statute; it was a fresh instruction given as to the ranking of the cases?—I have explained to you that prior to the passing of the Act of 1866 certain cases were classified together. After the 1866 Act was passed, cases of drunkenness were not taken before the Courts, but when in 1873 the instructions were given to bring all 'drunks' before the Court, that increased the vigilance of the police. Previous to 1873 many cases of drunkenness were passed on the streets which would now be taken up by the police.

464. If a constable comes across a drunken man is the only recourse for him the Police Office?—The police cannot touch a man for simply being under the influence of drink.

465. But if he has committed what might be a breach of the peace, has a constable any instructions to see if he can restore the peace, or quiet the disturbance, and perhaps help the man home?—If it is merely a drunken man about his own door trying to get home, or kicking up a noise and disturbance, in many cases the police would endeavour to get him into his house. I cannot say, however, that they are decidedly told not to arrest the man, but the practice is to get the man away quietly. If they cannot get him away, then they must take him into custody.

466. Now, about nomads who come and go, do you see much of them in Glasgow?—We do not see much of them. They go to the like of the Night Asylum. They may come to us for a night's lodging occasionally, and we may give it to them.

467. But their numbers are not so large that your people take any notice of them?—For many years all vagrants and beggars have been sharply dealt with. No doubt some of the Parochial Authorities would like us to go still farther, and deal with old men and women and others sitting in quiet places begging, but I hold that the people are largely to blame for these being there; if they did not get the coppers they would not continue to beg. We have been, however, exceedingly free of vagrancy in Glasgow.

468. You are, I think you said, now asking for longer sentences?—No: I am asking, under this new Act, that contraventions should be stated as aggravations.

469. But not for any difference in the sentences now in vogue?—No.

470. There is just one point of some importance. We were talking about the effect of long sentences and short sentences on habituals; I suppose you agree that a short sentence has no good effect whatever?—That is so. On the question of long sentences, the effect, as you know very well, often appears in the case of penal servitude prisoners. It does not seem to have very much good effect upon them.

471. In fact, they are very often committed again even when on license?—Very frequently.

472. In talking of prolonged seclusion for cases of inebriates or habitual offenders, there would be a considerable difference of treatment to that of a convict in a penal settlement?—I would expect so.

473. In the case of a convict the sentence is carried out without any respect to the man's will: he has no choice or will in what he may do?—He is under control in every respect.

474. And therefore, it can hardly be expected that a man's will will be strengthened when he comes out from a prolonged treatment of that kind?—Well, I don't know that that follows. A man's will may be strengthened. But I would not give the same treatment. In the case of a convict you are punishing the man for a crime, and it is right that he should undergo the punishment. With a habitual drunkard you are going to treat him rather as suffering from a disease, and you would not therefore punish him as a convict. I would suggest that he should be put in a place away from the city where there would be good fresh air and good food, with plenty of hard work, and he might thus be restored to good health.

John Boyd.

13 Nov. 1894.

475. But you would try to build up his will?—Well, not try to build it up; the absence from the drink would allow the will to grow. He would feel the benefit of being without the drink, and if there was any power given to the man over his will he would be able to control it, more especially after experiencing the benefit of the want of the drink.

476. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I understood you to say that it was quite possible that a decent working man, might, on each alternate Saturday when he got his pay, get drunk, and get into the hands of the police, and yet continue to support his wife and family; do you think it possible that a man should go on in that way?—I do not think you will find any working man run in once a fortnight; I was only giving you a possible case as an illustration. A man might get drunk every fortnight and not get into the hands of the police. It depends upon where he gets drunk, and whether he does anything to call for the interference of the police.

477. But every time he gets outrageously drunk he would fall into the hands of the police?—Not every time, but generally.

478. You have stated that you think some magistrates take too lenient a view of these offences, and that you think that, by way of a check on the magistrates, it should be compulsory to send an offender, after a certain number of convictions, to the sheriff?—I said so; and if the sheriff found that the man was not a proper person to be dealt with as an habitual, the prisoner should then be tried on the charge on which he was originally arrested.

479. As regards children, you say there are not very many sent to prison under 14 years of age. What is the youngest age at which a child can be sent to prison?—Nine years.

480. Do you think that a child so young as that should be sent to prison?—A child is never sent under that age.

481. Or at that age?—I do not approve of it.

482. At what age do you think it would be reasonable to send a child to prison?—Well, you will get children at 12, precocious children, who are in a way much older than others at 14. In that matter I think a good deal might be left to the discretion of the magistrate to judge from the circumstances. Personally I do not think young children should be sent to prison at all.

483. And what would you do with them?—What we do just now in the cruelty cases for instance. If it is an offence for which we can deal with the parents, such as begging, we do deal with them; but if it is not such an offence we send for the parents and threaten them, and if the parents are of that sort that will not look after their children then we have to ask the magistrate to send the children to an industrial school.

484. But in many cases the child could not get into an industrial school straight away from the Court?—Oh yes, they can.

485. What do you do with a child after he is sentenced?—He is sent on at once.

486. But take a place where there is no industrial school; what would you do then?—Whenever a child is sentenced, he is fed, and is despatched at once. Under a new arrangement we pay the expense at the time, and render the account to the Government. Formerly a child had to be sent to prison before going to a Reformatory.

487. Is it not the case that the institution might be full, and that there might be a question of getting an opening?—We have to send far away often—to Monro, to Wigtownshire, and even to Bristol.

488. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) But where do you put them between the time of their sentence, and discovering where there is a vacancy?—They are put John Boyd. into a side-room at the Police Office.

489. (By Col. M'Hardy.) If it is going to a reformatory?—In that case we might send the child to prison for a day or two, while we are making arrangements for his reception. 13 Nov. 18

490. Is it not the case that 220 children were sent to prison in Scotland during last year?—I do not approve of it.

491. What would you do for it?—I would send the child straight off to the reformatory.

492. But cases might arise that would require correspondence with the reformatory; what would you do with the child in the meantime?—For a day or two they might send the child to prison, but often the child is kept by the police. But, when a child is going to a reformatory it might as well, I think, go into the prison. It is mere sentiment the objection to sending the children to the prison for a day or two. No doubt it gives the Prison Commissioners a little trouble, but I do not see why they should be relieved of that. The way to avoid the children being sent to prison is to insist upon more local institutions, so that the children may be taken direct to them without delay.

493. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Assuming that there is a stigma in sending a child of tender years to prison for one or fourteen days, would it not be better to send a child to a children's refuge, pending arrangements being made with the reformatory authorities?—I would prefer that.

494. In saying that no child of nine years has entered a prison within the last year you refer only to your own jurisdiction?—That is so.

495. In your experience have you found that convicts come up before the magistrates very frequently for being drunk?—Yes; the returns we send to the Prison Commissioners will show that. They are often before the magistrates, and are reported by us to the Prison Commissioners. I do not mean to say that the same person is often up. We report them when they are on license if convicted, and also after the expiry of their license.

496. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You send up a first report, and then a second report and then the license is dealt with?—I am sorry to say that the Prison Commissioners, or whoever have the advising of the officials, do not always, even on a second report of conviction for drunkenness, revoke the license, and I am sometimes almost ashamed to warn a man, knowing that it will go for nothing.

497. But on a third report the license is always withdrawn?—I would not go the length of saying that. I think I could turn up cases in which, even after a third report, the license was not dealt with.

498. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In the return you sent me, 335 people you say have been convicted five times and upwards; but will you explain to the Committee that these numbers might be considerably augmented if a register of these offenders were kept—in fact that the numbers are considerably understated?—I think the prison authorities should be able to give a more accurate record of these cases, because they are all centralised in the prison.

499. As a matter of fact, in regard to the sentences imposed upon drunks, is not the magistrate guided to some extent by what you yourself, or your lieutenants acting for you or a court official say as to the previous character of the accused?—That is not the case. It would be very improper of any fiscal to suggest anything of the kind to the magistrates.

500. Then a magistrate, without knowledge, may give an offender who is convicted for the fortieth time a sentence of 3 days imprisonment, while that same offender may have been sentenced to 14 days for his first offence?—Yes: that is possible.

501. Is nothing said about the offender's previous character?—I have explained that the magistrate sometimes puts a question to the police officer whether he knows anything about the prisoner, but only under these circumstances the magistrate gets the information.

John Boyd.
 502. Is it not the case that in recent years there has been a growing practice to pass longer sentences on such offenders as 'drunks' and prostitutes—a tendency to go in for the full sentence of 14 days for being drunk and incapable, and 30 days for prostitution?—Well, to some extent, but there may be reasons for that.

503. Is it not a fact that in the month of September 1894, there were 60 prostitutes in prison undergoing the full penalty of 30 days imprisonment, whilst the succeeding month there are 130 undergoing the full penalty?—That may be so.

504. Do you think that 14 days of punitive treatment is an adequate punishment for being drunk?—I think where there are repeated convictions, and the magistrate knows of them, that he should exercise the power that he at present possesses, and that would enable him to give the offender other 30 days if he was unable to find caution for his good behaviour for the next 12 months.

505. But would these miserable habitual offenders be able to find caution?—No; and therefore they would get the other 30 days in prison.

506. Having regard to the sentences passed for indictable offences by sheriffs, do you not think it would be too much to give 30 days for the offence of drunkenness?—No; not in the case of a repeated offender.

507. You do not think that, that for the mere offence of drunkenness after one or two, or even three convictions, 30 days is excessive, and would entail hardships?—No; but I would point out that there are great discrepancies in the sentences passed by judges, and my opinion is that if the full sentence were more frequently imposed that would have some effect.

508. That would simply clear your streets; you don't suggest that it reforms the individual?—Well, it has this effect, that if a person had any power over his will at all it is bound to act as a deterrent.

509. Do you think it would act as a deterrent on the habituals?—No; I don't know that I would say that, but it would certainly have an effect for the working man who is brought in now and again for drunkenness.

510. Are you aware that in the discussion in Parliament in 1892 on the Scottish Burgh Police Bill, it was attempted to insert a clause making the full term of imprisonment for drunkenness 30 or 60 days, but that an amendment that the maximum period in prison should only be 14 days was carried?—I was not aware of that.

511. You suggest that a special inquiry should be conducted into the cases of these habituals before a sheriff: why not before two of your magistrates?—It would not do, as we have not two magistrates sitting.

512. But you might have that under new legislation?—It would not work. We have difficulty at present in getting even one magistrate to attend in the Courts, and that is one of the reasons why so many of them are anxious to have a stipendiary magistrate again.

513. But suppose I were to suggest two Justices of the Peace—there are lots of them now—as provided for in Sir Charles Cameron's Inebriates' Act of 1879?—But consider the practical working of the thing. A man is brought before two Justices of the Peace who happen to be sitting on the Bench on that particular day. In order to get the whole history of the man, a postponement to the following day, or even longer, is necessary, in order that inquiries may be made about him. These Justices would very probably not be sitting on the following day, or when the prisoner was next dealt with. The same holds good in the case of the magistrates. By sending them to the sheriff you would have one set of Judges dealing with this kind of offence.

514. You are specially anxious, I observe in your suggestions, to protect working men who may get occasionally the worse of liquor from being classed among habitually drunken and dissolute people?—Yes; and that would be done by serving the offender with a copy of the charge against him, and giving him an John Boyd. opportunity of getting up evidence for his defence.

515. In regard to the question put by Col. M'Hardy 13 Nov. 1894. comparing Glasgow with Dundee, I find that while Glasgow has got double the number of apprehensions per thousand of population, it does not appear that this marked difference continues in regard to those, presumably the worst offenders, who are committed to prison, the ratio there being almost equal. How would you account for that?—Well, it depends upon the fines. Some people pay fines very readily, and in many cases the magistrates are very lenient, and give the offenders facilities for getting their fines paid by their friends.

516. You also account for it, to some extent, because of the influx of people from surrounding towns and villages into the city?—Yes.

517. But would that not cut both ways? Don't large crowds leave the city on Saturdays and Sundays in vehicles and trains?—Not to the same extent.

518. You have found, I believe, in regard to prostitutes, that policemen in plain clothes have been able to rid the streets of these women?—Yes.

519. Could anything be done in that way to see whether the publican is carrying out the provisions of the Public-houses (Scotland) Act, 1862, in so far as he is forbidden under penalties from supplying intoxicated persons with drink, and in like manner punishing him for supplying persons with drink who hereafter may be certified as habitual drunkards?—At present the police are instructed as far as possible to see that intoxicated persons are not supplied with drink. Constables receive instructions to watch people who are intoxicated going into public-houses, and to see that they are not supplied, and their printed instructions refer to such cases.

520. Suppose that in future legislation it were thought proper that the habitual drunkard should be certified in open Court, and advertised as such, do you think any good would be done by forbidding the publican to supply such with drink?—I do not think it would do any good. The publicans would not know these persons when they came into their shops.

521. Is not the pawnbroker carrying on his business under somewhat similar arrangements as those I suggest?—To some extent.

522. And would not the publican in the same way?—Not in the same way.

523. In our colonies when a person is classed as an habitual drunkard a certificate to that effect is sent to the publican, and he is forbidden to supply liquor to that individual; and in event of his being found guilty of a third contravention of such an order his license is forfeited; would legislation of that kind have any effect for good in this city?—It might; but I can see a difficulty arising in a large city like Glasgow from the frequent changes that take place among publican's assistants. Of course, if guilty knowledge could be brought home to the publican, the matter would be different.

524. Is it not the case that these wretched women who come before you for the thirtieth or fortieth time in one year, and hundreds of times in a life-time, usually frequent certain localities, and are well known to the publicans? Could the publicans not refuse to supply them?—There are plenty of public-houses, particularly in the West-End, where such women would not be served under any conditions, but in the centre of the city it is different. In certain localities, I fancy the publicans would know these women by head-mark. I can see a difficulty, however, in being called to punish a publican for supplying drink to such persons. The defence would probably be that it was a new shopman, or something of that kind.

525. Are you prepared to admit that the slight diminution in the total apprehensions in Glasgow during the past year is due to the fact that the sentences pointing to the infliction of the maximum have been more frequent during that period, and this would further explain that last year the highest number of convictions for these offences for which any female habitual was convicted was 21 in 1893, against 35 in 1891?—That

John Boyd.
13 Nov. 1894. may have some effect on the smaller number of convictions, but the prison authorities have a better opportunity of judging of that than I have.

526. The longer you keep these habituals out of the way, is it not bound to diminish the opportunity of committing an offence, and consequently the apprehensions?—No doubt.

527. (By Miss Stevenson.) In your proposal for dealing with habitual drunkards you spoke of getting evidence from the man's family; is it not the case that very often women, after having got their husbands apprehended for cruelty, are very unwilling to give the evidence necessary for the conviction?—Yes.

528. Would it not be necessary to have some further evidence?—That is just why I wanted these cases remitted to the sheriff, so that fuller information might be got from the man's relatives or neighbours. [The witness withdrew.]

THIRD DAY.

Glasgow, 14th November 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman).
Lieut.-Col. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. R. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Col. Sir COLIN SCOTT MONCRIEFF, B.E.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss F. C. STEVENSON.

The Rev. ALEXANDER R. MACEWEN, D.D., of Claremont U.P. Church, the Rev. ROBERT CAMPBELL of Calton U.P. Church, and the Rev. ALEXANDER BROWN of Pollokshields U.P. Church, as representing the United Presbytery of Glasgow, were called in and examined.

Rev. Dr. A. R. MacEwen.

14 Nov. 1894.

THE REV. A. R. MACEWEN, D.D., examined by the CHAIRMAN

Rev. Dr. A. R. MacEwen.

14 Nov. 1894.

529. You are minister of Claremont U.P. Church?—Yes.

530. And you come before the Committee as the representative of the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Glasgow?—The Rev. Mr. Campbell, the Rev. Mr. Brown, and myself, were appointed to ascertain and express the general mind of our Presbytery; and, although we have no verbal instructions, the Presbytery have been made aware of the lines of evidence which we propose to submit to the Committee.

531. On what point do you wish to give evidence?—It was suggested to us by the secretary of the Committee that there might be special value in our evidence with regard to the treatment of habitual drunkards, and it is on that point we propose to speak.

532. Will you please give us your suggestions on that point?—We are strongly of opinion that compulsory legislation is desirable; indeed, that it is essential as a preventive, not only of misery and poverty, but of crime. According to the existing law the consent of the habitual drunkard is required. We consider it almost impossible to get such consent in the majority of cases where confinement or restraint is essential.

533. What evidence do you desire before proceeding?—We think that evidence of cruelty and otherwise offensive and dangerous behaviour should be sufficient to justify what would practically be incarceration. No doubt it would be difficult to get evidence; yet in extreme cases sufficient evidence would be forthcoming, and of course such legislation should apply only to extreme cases. That is the first point on which we, as representing the Presbytery, are unanimous.

534. Then, as to the second point?—That is as regards the period of detention. We regard that as a medical question, to be determined by individual needs. Our experience, however, is that as a rule, when isolation is enforced as a cure for intemperance, the period of isolation is too short; but that, we think, should be decided by medical men, according to the individual case.

535. Then, as to the question of provision for treatment?—As to the provision of Retreats, we hold that it should not be left to individual enterprise, but that provision should be made for having adequate accommodation within reach of a city—say, like this—and that they should not have the precarious character, which is inevitable when a Retreat is licensed only where an individual thinks it may be for his pecuniary advantage to set one going. Purely permissive legislation, although combined with Government control, is, we think, inadequate.

536. What are your views regarding the upkeep of such Retreats?—It has been suggested to us that this is a matter with which churches or philanthropic agencies might possibly deal. We regard that as quite impracticable and undesirable for several reasons.

537. What are these reasons?—Habitual drunkards as a rule remove themselves out of all relation with the church, and are anxious to avoid contact with the clergy and with church officials of any sort, especially when they are of the well-to-do classes. That is our experience in 99 cases out of 100. When there is an habitual drunkard in a family, for a time the fact is kept out of our notice, and when it does come under our notice there is a likelihood that the whole family may loosen or break entirely connection with the church.

538. That is your first reason—you have other reasons?—Our second reason for saying the churches should not support or contribute largely to such Retreats is that we have no funds for such purposes. No church, whether Established or otherwise, has any such funds; and special contributions could not with propriety be raised. We further think it would be inconsistent and unreasonable to carry out a national and compulsory scheme by voluntary, and therefore precarious contributions.

539. How do you think such institutions should be supported then?—Our idea is that such asylums should be supported by proportionate payment, according to the interests involved. From the relatives or the actual resources of habitual drunkards there should be payment so far as that is possible. If it were manageable, the expenses should be entirely defrayed by them; but the great difficulty is, that there rarely are available resources. I might illustrate how it occurs to us clergy-men. I can think of a case where there is an habitual drunkard—a man not drunk every day of the week, but occasionally and dangerously so. His earnings, when

Dr. A. E. he is sober, are the only resources of the household, and obviously, if he were incarcerated, any payments from his relatives would be absolutely impossible.

Rev. 1894.

540. Do you think that any help would come from outside agencies?—We think that help might be, and occasionally would be, given by churches and other philanthropic agencies, but the cost, in its further incidence, should be defrayed partly by local assessment, the locality having definite interest in the matter, and partly by Imperial funds.

541. Would you please go a little more minutely into the matter of the different classes of habitual drunkards? There are three classes with whom it has been proposed to deal. The first are those who voluntarily are willing to place themselves under restraint, and whose case is partially provided for by legislation at the present time. There is a skeleton of legislation which could be elaborated. The second class are those whom it has been proposed to commit at the instance of their relatives, and who won't submit to compulsion, but whom it has been proposed to bring before Judicial Authorities, and allow them at the instance of their relatives to pronounce them habitual drunkards and confine them at the relatives' own cost. And the third class are the quasi criminal drunkards, who are constantly brought before the police, who are a nuisance and a great cost to society, and whom it has been proposed to deal with on behalf of the State. I presume that your recommendations are chiefly in regard to the third class?—Not wholly.

542. Well, we need not take the first class, but let us take the second, whom it has been proposed to pronounce habitual drunkards at the instance of their friends, and against their own wish. Do you think that public opinion in your Presbytery would sanction and justify such a proceeding?—Yes.

543. Do you think from your experience of Scottish society that it is ripe for such a thing?—Yes.

544. As to the third class—the quasi criminal class—have you any definite idea as to how you would define a quasi criminal habitual drunkard—would you base the definition upon a certain number of convictions within a certain time; and if so, what would be your idea?—This I should say has not been before our Presbytery, but we have talked over the matter. We are not of opinion that actual convictions for crime should be prerequisites to compulsory treatment.

545. For drunkenness?—I have no suggestion to make.

546. Have you in the course of your ministerial occupation met with great numbers of cases in which habitual drunkenness was a great evil?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) Oh, a great evil!

547. Do you think that in such cases the families would be able to take the initiative to lock up their bread-winner?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) In some cases they would. (The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Might I say it is very difficult to persuade, say a wife, to give evidence of any sort in such a case. The case requires to be extreme, but we think that only extreme cases ought to be dealt with. (The Rev. Mr. Brown.) It might be possible to have a movement originated by some way outside the family, so that the case might be taken up.

548. Whom would you entrust with such a delicate function?—(The Rev. Mr. Brown.) Something was said about bringing him before a Judicial Authority on the relatives' suggested action. Could the same complaint not be made by others, not relatives?

549. That was a recommendation by Dr. Dakymple's Committee, and was a suggestion contained in the first Habitual Drunkards Bill?—(The Rev. Mr. Brown.) My reason for referring to it is that, while in extreme cases you will get the wife or a member of the family to complain, yet there are a good number of cases when every member of the family, and all those related to the person, try to conceal and yet the community or the immediate district not only know the fact, but are annoyed and injured. That is why it would be advisable to have a power of initiation outside the relationship, to bring up such a case.

550. Yes; but to whom would you entrust such a matter as the initiation of proceedings, which in such a case would require to be entirely civil, and not even quasi criminal?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Would it not be a police offence?

Rev. Dr. A. R. MacEwen.
14 Nov. 1894.

551. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) We are just now contemplating cases where the drunkard has not been brought up as a quasi criminal, but where he is a nuisance and disgrace to his family?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) And a trouble to the neighbourhood.

552. In that case would he come under the cognizance of the police?—(The Rev. Mr. Brown.) I would like to believe the police are always faithful to their duty, but I have an impression that in the better circles of society the police are not particularly anxious to make quasi criminals of those who are occasionally or even frequently drunk.

553. (By the Chairman.) Then you think the vigilance of the police might be increased?—(The Rev. Mr. Brown.) I think they might have the power of initiation where the better classes are concerned. You get police action more amongst the lower classes. Drunkenness can be better concealed by the better off families, so as not to be so visible in the community.

554. But do you think that it is among the better or wealthier classes that the greatest need is felt for powers of commitment of habitual drunkards, whose maintenance they would have to pay for, even against his will?—(The Rev. Mr. Brown.) It is for that sphere more than any other that I want to see legislation. (The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) We feel that the distinction which you draw, while it may be necessary for your inquiry, is a little apt to complicate the matter—this distinction between classes. There are labouring people who are neither well-to-do nor criminals, but who ought to be reached. Your classification seems hardly to recognise that between what we call the well-to-do class and the criminal class, there is another large class. (The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) Who are habitually drunk every Saturday and Sunday, and able to go to their work on Monday.

555. I do not wish to make any offensive distinction between classes, so I will put it classes able to pay for maintenance of habitual drunkards and the class unable to pay.—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Well, what we felt was that that did not touch the working or artisan class. They are outside the criminal class, and equally outside the class of those who could pay; and it is very important that they should be dealt with.

556. Then how do you propose to deal with them?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) It is a police matter.

557. And would you therefore make it quasi criminal matter?—Yes; quite so.

558. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Do you think there is a large class among the poorer classes who are doing honest work five or six days of the week, and getting drunk on the seventh?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) Yes; they work on a number of days of the week, not on the others.

559. But does the tremendous degradation of the habit not very soon pass them out into the semi-criminal class? We have an enormous number of cases of men, and still more unfortunately of women, who are brought up at the Police Court for being drunk and incapable and riotous. Is there besides that a class large enough to be legislated for, who keep within the bounds of the law, and yet are a curse to those connected with them?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) A very large class.

560. And whom the police, so to speak, have no professional knowledge of?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) All they know is that such and such a man usually goes home the worse of liquor on Saturday night or Sunday morning, and the police may help him along sometimes. (The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) And this is a class which legislation should most carefully regard.

561. On the principle of prevention being better than cure?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Yes.

562. An additional reason for having an outside power to take the initiative would be, I suppose, the recommendation that it is in no way desirable to en-

Rev. Dr. A. R. MacEwen.
14 Nov. 1894. courage relatives—it is a very humiliating thing for a wife or child to report on the bread-winner. I suppose you would rather have an outside influence?—Yes; I think so.

563. And have you any experience yourself, I do not say as to the theory of the length of detention, but as to practice? We have heard of one or two years and so on of detention. Have you any knowledge of cases which encouraged the hope that detention of one or two years in some well devised reformatory would reclaim the drunkard?—Where it goes beyond a year; but as I said before, we hesitate about speaking about that collectively, as it is rather a medical question. I personally may say I have known cases in which reclamation has been successful through isolation for a period of over a year, and cases where it has been entirely unsuccessful because the period has been shorter.

564. And you have reason to hope that, say within two years, the drunkard might be reclaimed, and have a strong enough will to resist drink?—Yes.

565. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Would you take up a case in which the bread-winner is quietly drunk at home, and does not ostentatiously display his drunkenness?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) I am not very sure that I would incarcerate a man who was quietly drunk at home.

566. But although quietly drunk himself he might be ruining his family. Would you consider that that is a fit subject for detention?—I am not prepared to say.

567. If you take away the bread-winner on whose earnings the family depend, would you support the wife and family by the State?—They would fall under the same heading exactly as widows and orphans.

568. Have you considered the question of expense generally? Don't you think it would be very large?—I should not like to speak of that.

569. You spoke as to the money being raised whether locally or by the State. Do you think a division between the two advisable; or could you suggest in what way it should take place?—No; I could not suggest a definite proportion.

570. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The class of drunkards to whom you are drawing our attention this morning is not that class that appears in the Police Court?—No.

571. It is a class where the police constable does not appear, but still there is suffering on the part of the family?—Yes.

572. Is the suffering to which you refer a monetary or a physical suffering?—It is both notably. It consists in the utmost difficulty on the part of the wife, for instance, to get from the husband enough to keep the house going; and, in the second place, it consists in a perpetual state of panic of bodily violence, which experience proves often to have a thoroughly good foundation.

573. You don't mean to take action against a workman who, when he gets his wages, drinks to some extent and goes home in some state of intoxication, more or less partial, whose action is thus negative?—No.

574. It is where a man, when he goes home, commits an assault on his wife or children, that you wish to step in?—Yes; and does evil to the other members of the community.

575. Apart from the domestic circle?—Yes. He may be a nuisance to those living on the same stair.

576. But that would be dealt with by the police?—Our general judgment, without criticising such an important body, is that those cases might be more adequately dealt with by the police.

577. But I mean if any assault takes place while the man is in a state of intoxication, a neighbour can appeal to the police?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) Although there is no assault, the neighbours often are greatly troubled by drunken men on the stair. A great number of families living on one stair are greatly troubled with men coming home in a state of intoxication, mostly late on the Saturday night or early on Sunday morning.

578. But in the domestic circle the wife and the children suffer by being beaten, in fact there are cases continually cropping up?—Yes.

579. There is a society in some towns for the protection of women and children?—(The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Yes. There are societies in various shapes.

580. Is there such a society in Glasgow?—We have a society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, but it is a voluntary agency, and our opinion is that voluntary agencies are inadequate to deal with the case.

581. But is not this particular agency that you allude to, one for the purpose of producing evidence of the suffering of a family by the fault of members of it?—That is the main purpose of the existence of such societies; but, without any idea of criticising these societies, which serve admirable purposes, according to their resources and organisation, we think that they cannot carry them out sufficiently; their powers are inadequate.

582. But would not these societies, with the knowledge they at present possess—which I know in some towns is very considerable—would not they, if the law was sufficient, be quite able to act as prosecutors in the defence of wives and children in such cases?—They might be so organised as to be sufficient; but, as they at present stand, these societies, dependent entirely on the number of people who join them, and the amount of the subscriptions they get, are not strong enough.

583. (By Miss Stevenson.) In reference to the large class that has been referred to—those working men who are supposed to be able to work during four or five days a week, and yet may be called habitual drunkards as regards their conduct at the end of the week, is your information based on any inquiry generally?—Our information is based upon the fact that our work takes us habitually among people who are of that class, and also upon conversation which we, as members of the same profession, are habitually having one with another on the subject.

584. Then it appears from what you said that the police are active in apprehending very poor people who are drunk, but that they are inclined to deal more leniently with men who may be said to be of a more respectable class, are they not?—No; we did not mean to imply that. (The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) The police are exceedingly long-suffering, I may say, to the poor. (The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) Yes; I agree with Mr. Campbell. I think the police are as tolerant with the poor as with the middle class.

585. You find a great many of the cases that come under your notice are due to the drunken habits of the parents, which result is cruelty to their wives and children?—Yes.

586. In that society to which you refer, I understand the only thing they can do is to remove the children from the care of the parents? I know they do that in Edinburgh, and so relieve the parents of all responsibility for their children?—That is so.

587. And do you think it would strengthen their work if they had more means of taking procedure against the drunken parents?—Yes; but one must remember that it is often the mother and not the father who is the drunken parent.

588. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have been rather severe upon the male sex, have you not? The whole of your replies have been chiefly in regard to drunken men. Now, is the apprehension of drunken men in the cases you speak of, more frequent than that of women?—Our reason for this is that we were asked to consider the question of expense and outlay, and that the men are generally the bread-winners.

589. Is it not the fact that among that class drunken women are more common?—(The Rev. Mr. Campbell.) Exceedingly common.

590. Supposing the wife had a drunken husband, such as you describe, don't you think that such a family would be better without him?—Often.

591. If the woman is the drunkard, and you seclude her, the husband might suffer to a certain extent, but how would you propose to deal with the children?—

Rev. Dr. A. MacEwen.
14 Nov. 1894.

Dr. A. R. MacEwen. (The Rev. Dr. MacEwen.) The father would have to deal with them as if his wife had died.

592. In taking the initiative, you said that it did not matter who took it, and that in many cases the relatives would have a hesitancy about doing so, but would not that difficulty be met by enacting that the relatives, or the police, or neighbours might take the initiative, and the sheriff might cite all of them to the inquiry?—Yes; I think it might take that form.

593. So that no injustice would be done in that case to men or women?—Yes. [The witnesses then withdrew.]

Rev. Dr. A. R. MacEwen.
14 Nov. 1894.

Robert Sutherland.

MR. ROBERT SUTHERLAND, Removing Officer to the Barony Parochial Board, Glasgow, called in and examined. Robert Sutherland

594. (By the Chairman.) I understand that Mr Motion of the Barony Parochial Board, who gave evidence yesterday, has sent you here with a woman named Jane M'Polland, who has again got drunk, and whom he has sent along as a material piece of evidence as to the accuracy of the testimony he gave us?—That is so.

595. The Committee think it undesirable to see the woman, but by calling you, the fact will be noticed in the minutes?—Very well.

596. Have you anything to say?—Nothing further than that she is just one of the very worst pests.

597. How is she drunk now?—I expect she has just gone and got drunk after coming out of prison this morning.

598. Drunk already! I suppose you will take her to the poorhouse?—Yes, if she does not make herself so noisy that the police take her up.

599. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) What age is she?—About 36 years.

600. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is she married?—No.

601. What is her condition now?—She is lying in a state of stupor, but in endeavouring to get her to rise she may get up and drive at me.

602. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Where did she get the drink?—I have no idea.

603. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Does she take food, do you know, at all regularly?—I think she eats very little.

604. How long has she been in prison?—About 10 days.

605. How did you get her to bring her here?—She came to our office this morning. When she comes we try to persuade her to remain till the doctor comes. On many an occasion I have taken a cab and gone with her to the poorhouse so as to keep her till the doctor gave the necessary certificate.

606. Where does she get money to get drunk?—I don't know. [The witness then withdrew.]

George Ogilvie.

MR. GEORGE OGILVIE, of City Parochial Board, Glasgow, called in and examined.

607. (By the Chairman.) Will you explain your position in connection with the City Parochial Board?—I have been a member of the City Parochial Board for 15 years, for 4 years chairman of House Committee, and for 2 years chairman of the Board. I am and have been a member of the Glasgow Juvenile Delinquency Board, and chairman of the Rottenrow Day Industrial School for 12 years. Holding these offices, and from frequent and lengthened visits to the City Poorhouse, during which I held converse with its inmates, I am decidedly of opinion that Parochial Boards and Parish Councils should have powers to detain for lengthened periods men and women of advanced years who are regular frequenters both of prisons and poorhouses. In the City Poorhouse we have accommodation for 1543, but I have seen much larger numbers during some winters. Whilst I am of opinion that a majority of the inmates are deserving of every care and protection, and grateful for the comforts they enjoy, yet unfortunately there is a large number of very disreputable characters, who are constantly running in and out of the poorhouse, and on whose account, I think, Parochial Boards ought to have powers given them to apply to the sheriff or Justice of the Peace for a warrant to detain them for a lengthened period; at present they have only to intimate on their admission—'Governor, I want my 'liberty after three days residence,' and there is no power to detain them longer. It is amongst this class that the Poor Law Act is thoroughly understood; they are as familiar with its details as any inspector or governor.

608. You think that power ought to be given to the Parochial Boards and Parish Councils to detain paupers for lengthened periods?—I do.

609. You speak about the question of detention. Have you that power?—We are testing it. I hold that a woman who will not remain has no right to be admitted, especially when the doctor fills up the application form, a form such as this—'Is the pauper in good health?—Yes. Is the 'pauper able to do any work?—Yes.' If we do not admit them we give them a line of refusal, stating reasons; then they can go to the sheriff, and he can give an order to the Parochial Board to admit them. The sheriff usually gives intimation that if we wish to reclaim this order we are to appear within 14 days before him, and if we do so we have to appear by an agent, and the board has to pay their own agent and also the pauper's agent; and it is thus rarely that a Parochial Board ever goes before the sheriff, owing to the cost, which comes to about £3 or £9 for every case that is appealed to the sheriff. I find this woman I have referred to was refused admission on the 1st July, got admission on the 2nd, on the sheriff's order, and before 14 days had expired she was twice in and twice out, so that it appears absurd to go before the sheriff under such circumstances. From October of 1885 until 16th July of 1887 this woman was 31 times admitted. She is still alive, and regular in her admissions. I understand she has somewhere about 80 or 90 admissions, up to the present time. When we do not admit her she makes a great scene, cursing and swearing and that sort of thing. I hand in a table of her admissions:—

H. D. and Child. Admissions—24.10.85, 5 days; 30.10.85, 4 days; 6.11.85, 4 days; 13.11.85, 4 days; 4.12.85, 4 days; 23.7.86, 4 days; 21.10.86, 4 days; 29.10.86, 4 days; 4.11.86, 5 days; 13.11.86, 5 days; 26.11.86, 5 days; 4.12.86, 5 days; 16.12.86, 6 days; 31.12.86, 6 days; 28.1.87, 6 days; 10.2.87, 5 days; 19.2.87, 5 days; 4.3.87, 5 days; 15.3.87, 8 days; 31.3.87, 8 days; 9.4.87, 5 days; 17.4.87, 8 days; 29.4.87, 5 days; 7.5.87, 9 days; 20.5.87, 10 days; 4.6.87, 4 days; 11.6.87, 4 days; 18.6.87, 9 days; 30.6.87, on 1st July refused admittance; on 2nd July admitted on Sheriff's Order, went out on the 6th, returned again on the 9th, and left on the 13th; being twice in and twice out within the 14 days.

610. With regard to inmates who curse and swear, and display other unamiable propensities, what power have you to deal with them?—There is little power. We have power certainly to put them in a dark cell for so many hours, but only for hours.

611. Has she been often there?—I do not think so. That rule is not very often applied. My own feeling is that it does not conduce much to the comfort of the house. I have been present and seen an effort made to take a party out of the ward and put them in a dark cell, and I can assure you it is a sight I would not like to see again, owing to the rebellion of the whole crew, in order to protect the woman who is being taken away. They abuse the officials to such an extent that they hardly ever resort to it even for destroying property. They rather hand them over to the police.

612. Supposing you had got leave to keep that woman in for so many weeks, she would surely not be a very desirable inmate?—If we had powers of that sort we would require to set aside special wards for special purposes. We have female and male test wards, I may explain, although they are not very much test wards.

613. What is a test ward?—It is a ward which is set apart for such a case as I have referred to, or for bad characters. They are put into the ward, and are kept separate from the ordinary inmates, although there may be six, eight, or ten in the same ward. In the ward for men we make them saw wood and do various other kinds of work. If any of them are very bad they are isolated from the other inmates of the poorhouse, even to the extent that their food is carried in to them. They are not allowed outside, and there is no mixing with the other inmates. The ordinary inmates of the poorhouse may receive a friend, a parcel, a newspaper, or a bit of tobacco; but these people, so long as they remain in the test ward, receive nothing but the common daily fare, and no extras.

614. Have the women any work to do?—They get knitting, but nothing else, and some are not able to do that or won't do it. But with men, when they are able to kick up disturbances we consider them able to work, and they are either set to break stones, or cut up firewood, according to instructions.

615. You want power to detain these characters in the poorhouse. Is your contention that, by detaining a woman such as you have referred to in the poorhouse after having an excess of drink, she would be the better for it?—No doubt of it. If she were to remain in the house she would find it to her own advantage to behave herself. We have different grades in the house. We have our decent old women. They have special comforts, which the ordinary inmates do not have. I have no doubt if they were compelled to remain for a given time with us, the women would become acclimatised more to the circumstances, and would find it to their advantage to be better behaved.

616. How long has that woman been in the house at a time?—At the very longest ten days; but four or five is the average.

617. She has a child. Had she it with her?—Yes, she always had the child with her.

618. Was the child confined also?—The child, I believe, was latterly taken from her by the Board and boarded out. She was then a little girl of about four or five years.

619. Would you explain under what powers you can take the child from her?—Well, up to the present we have not thought that we had powers to force a child from a mother. We have done so in some instances where the woman was either a profligate or sent to prison; and the children not being looked after, we have had to take them for a time, and we have taken the law into our own hands and refused to give the children up.

620. If your powers are doubtful would you not like powers that could not be disputed?—We have thought so all along.

621. Then how would you suggest that that power should be obtained. By applying to the sheriff and getting an order?—The Board of Supervision have sent us a letter within the past three months intimating that they have given us power.

622. But can they do so?—They have done so.

623. The Board of Supervision may point out to you that some provision of the law enables you to do so. Sir Colin Moncrieff tells me that he is not aware of any power which they have to give you in this direction?—Neither have we; and the singularity of the thing is that the information has only come within the last few months.

624. Would you be good enough to send us any letter or circular from the Board of Supervision giving you that power?—Yes, I will be very glad to do so. The reason why we have got this information is that at this season of the year our house becomes overcrowded, and we have a large building occupied by children, and children alone. We sent a deputation to the Board to see if we could get the order that the house is only to contain 1543 inmates relaxed. We asked if they would allow us to exercise a little license, and they said 'No, but we think you ought to board out your children.' But we said 'We have no power to do so,' and they said, 'Oh yes, you have the power.' They could not lay their hands exactly upon the point, but they gave us a copy of a letter sent to an inspector of poor ten years ago on the subject, and said that we ought to have had that power all along.

625. Yes, you have the power to board out children?—We have always exercised that.

626. But take the case of a mother sent to prison. You have boarded out her child, but when she came out and came to you, or cited you before the sheriff, she could make you produce the child?—She could. We have always held she had the right, and we only boarded out the children for the children's own sake. But this order that we have got within the last three months says that if a woman with two or three children comes to make an application for admission to the house, if she and the children go into the house, we have the right to take her children and send them out to board; and if the mother objects to their being boarded out, we say, 'you must leave the house then, and take the children with you.' It is only within the past few months, of course, that we have known we could do that.

627. You do that, and the woman goes before the sheriff, and gets an order to have the children?—We have not had the sheriff's opinion on that point yet.

628. But if there is any doubt about it, you would like to have the power you are exercising?—Yes.

629. Do you not think that such a power should be controlled by some judicial authority?—Do you see any hardship in going before the sheriff and stating such and such a case, and asking for power?—If they would give us the privilege of going before the sheriff, and pleading the merits before him ourselves, we would do so, but if we have to employ an agent for the pauper and another for ourselves, and undergo expenses amounting to about £8 or £9, we would rather not go before him.

630. What you would like would be some summary process by which your inspector could bring cases before the sheriff and get an order which might be subject perhaps to some revision?—Yes.

631. (Examined by Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Do I understand from you, as Chairman of the Parochial Board, that the sheriff won't allow you to appear before him, or one of your officials, when a pauper raises a case regarding admission?—The sheriff won't listen to us. He tells us to appear by our agent, and forces us to employ an agent also for the pauper. I understand there is not one case defended before the sheriff in the course of two or three years by any of the three Parochial Boards in Glasgow.

632. But if one of the local authorities goes to the sheriff and says, 'here is the case you are forcing upon us,' will he not listen to you?—I may be wrong, but I have never known of such a case.

633. (By the Chairman.) Supposing he refuses assistance, there is an appeal to the Board of Supervision?—Yes. The pauper would have the right, and I know that several of the paupers frequently travel on to Edinburgh and see the members of the Board of Supervision.

634. At whose expense?—At their own expense.

635. The pauper pays his own expenses?—It is not uncommon for a certain class of these men, and women also, to travel to Edinburgh and see the members of the Board of Supervision. They seem to have a very easy access to them. I know some who have travelled there and come back to us, who have been a dozen times at Edinburgh; I can assure you I often wish some of our officers were as well posted up as they are. Many a time I have had in the wards of our poorhouse a certain individual who is very much better posted up in the poor laws than any official in the poorhouse. Such people can do a great deal of harm in the management of the institution.

instruction that you got from the Board of Supervision authorising you to board out children, was it authorising you to do that with the alternative of the woman leaving the poorhouse?—It gives us the alternative that, if she declines or refuses to allow us to board out her children, then we would have the right to say to her that she must go out.

637. It gave you no authority to keep children boarded out while the mother was on the loose throughout the town?—Well, I presume that if we were to look for lodgings, say at Campbelltown, and send the children there, we ought to have more power than allow the children to be brought back whenever the mother wanted them. From our present instructions we would decline to give her any knowledge of where the children are.

638. Is there any other point?—Yes. If I may be allowed, I might mention a case which the Committee may be interested in, of what women will do when they take to drink. Not more than 100 yards from where we are sitting I know of a case where the husband earns from 40s. to 45s. weekly, and during the last six months he has furnished his house six times. His wife, for drink, starts in the beginning of the week and sells everything in the house to brokers. I have tried to interfere with her, and have asked the Police to do so, but no person seems to have any power to interfere with this man's wife carrying out the furniture and selling it. She has even sold the kitchen grate and the bedding of the house. One Saturday afternoon, while her husband was asleep—I may say he is a cripple—she carried off his walking stick and sold it, and he had to hie down to me to get another. A lady connected with St. Paul's, and a St Paul's church nurse, and a trained nurse attended to her for a long time, and Sister Vernon fully thought she had got a convert. When she got out again this woman came down to me and thanked me, and said how grateful she was, and within three hours afterwards she was seen as dead drunk as could be. The question is, how far should a broker be allowed to take in a man's furniture from a man's wife with the knowledge that this woman is carrying it away week after week, and selling it to get drink. I have done everything I can by speaking to the Police, but it makes no difference.

639. (By the Chairman.) But that is a private case?—Yes. I mention it as being connected with drink and the broker system.

640. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You might explain to us again what is the meaning of the word 'test ward'?—We call it a test ward because they do not get mixing with the other inmates of the house beyond two or three at a time, and sometimes only one, and in it they are put to certain kinds of work.

641. You said that you were anxious that this woman should remain in the house—what interest has the Parochial Board that she should remain in it?—I need not say that it would be in the first place for the woman's own good; but I think you will say that where a woman like this comes so often, for four or five days in and out, that it is a very great hardship on all our officers. The woman has first to go to make application; after this she has to be interrogated, and the result of these inquiries have to be written down on a schedule; she has then to attend the medical officer in the district and be examined by him; then she attends a meeting along with the inspector and one of the members—that is what we call our Relief Committee; then she has to go and be admitted through the gate of the poorhouse; and when she is admitted she must undergo the changing of her own for the George Poorhouse clothes, undergo a bath, and go through all the necessary cleaning preparations; and we have the trouble of fumigating the woman's clothes and storing them away. We think we should not be put to that trouble for three or four days' residence. George Ogilvie.

642. Can you say how many cases of this kind come up in connection with your Board?—I have not the exact number, but there are not less than 30 of them running out and in.

643. What population have you under your Board?—Upwards of 177,000 in the parish.

644. (By Miss Stevenson.) I want to be quite clear about the power of a parent to claim the custody of his or her child, although it has been boarded out by the parish. I understand that any pauper parent can force the Parochial Board to give up the custody of the child if he demands it, and that he has the right of appealing to the sheriff to claim the child, without repaying the Board to the extent that they have incurred expense?—We always understand that that was the law, although when we came across very dissipated persons we did not give up the children.

645. But if those dissipated persons had chosen to appeal to the sheriff for the custody of the child he would have been within his legal right in doing so?—Up to the last two or three months we understood that that was so, so that we only retained the children for a given time.

646. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Supposing you possessed the power which you seem doubtful of, that of removing a child from its parents, would there be any objection if the conduct of the mother continued good, say for a couple of years, to restore the child?—Certainly not.

647. But you would like to have the power of retaining it?—Yes. I am perfectly sure there is not a member of the Parochial Board who would not be very glad to give up a child within 24 hours notice, if the woman or man had been reclaimed from dissipated habits.

648. Can you give the Committee an idea of the number of respectable honest poor in the poorhouse from old age and infirmity?—Out of 1543, I believe, one half are decent respectable people. That means old and young.

649. Then you would not think of herding these honest people with the refractory, dissolute, and worthless, whom you now wish to have the power to detain volens volens?—No.

650. Have you sufficient power now to deal punitively with these refractory people?—We have power, but we have not extent of premises. My own opinion is that, as far as they are able to work, they should be made to work. I was a little surprised within the past 48 hours, to see a strike amongst the hewers of wood in the Barony parish, because they were refused tobacco.

651. What has been the result of that strike?—I do not know the result.

652. But about the refractory people?—They would be sent into the test ward.

653. Have you any opinion regarding the number of times a man or woman should appear in the Police Office before being regarded as a drunkard?—I have seen a great deal about that subject; but in the case of the woman I mentioned, and in other cases, you find people who are far worse, as confirmed drunkards, than many who are known to the police. [The witness then withdrew.]

PROFESSOR W. T. GAIRDNER, M.D., LL.D. called in and examined.

Professor W. T. Gairdner.

654. (By the Chairman.) You are Professor of Medicine in the University of Glasgow?—I am.

655. And you are a Physician-in-ordinary to the Queen?—I am.

656. And you have taken an interest in the question of the treatment of habitual drunkards for a very long time?—I have.

657. You have read several papers on the subject?—Yes.

658. And you have formulated a series of suggestions on this matter?—Yes.

659. Would you sketch them briefly to the Committee?—I may say that I hold in my hand a pamphlet which has grown gradually out of others. My first attempt at the subject, was when I was asked to contribute a paper to the now extinct Social Science Association, when it met in Bristol in 1869. The subject of that paper, which was prescribed by the Council of the Association, was 'What legislative measures might be proposed to deal with cases of uncontrollable drunkenness.' I had not at that time considered it strictly from the legislative point of view, and I do not consider that now I am entitled to give an opinion as a lawyer or legislator would be; but I threw out some views on the subject. I was not there myself, and the paper was hardly discussed at all, and it attracted little attention; but still the pressure of the subject on my mind led me to think of it, and in Birmingham in 1889 I contributed another address upon the matter to a medical assembly, to which there were a number of clergymen and others invited. That meeting also seemed to be so much of one mind that there was really very little discussion of a controversial kind about it, so that I have never had the benefit of hearing my own views discussed and pulled to pieces. But I think the most important point I should wish to bring before you now is the point that the law requires to be strengthened in the direction which Sir Charles Cameron would have strengthened it by the Act that he proposed in 1879. If he had got the original view he imported into that Act passed into law—I do not know that I considered that Act in very great detail—but I was thoroughly convinced of the soundness of it in principle; in fact, being founded upon the Dalrymple Commission of 1872, which I think was an admirably conducted Commission, and came to admirably sound conclusions, it could hardly be otherwise than a good contribution to legislation. But, as you all know, the House of Commons rose up in rebellion against it. The liberty of the subject was touched. And when that cry was raised it was fighting in vain, and Sir Charles Cameron was obliged to withdraw the compulsory element. Now, in medical experience I have never heard a single exception to this point that you cannot deal with an habitual drunkard without the compulsory element. It is in vain to try. To expect the habitual drunkard to say that he is a slave to his passion, and say that therefore he requires detention, is a thing not to be expected of human nature.

660. Before we come to details, might I ask you to give us your opinion of the medical aspect of drunkenness—how far it is a disease, and how far a vice?—To prevent misconception, I may say I do not share the views of those amongst us who, by looking upon inebriety or habitual drunkenness entirely as a disease, would practically annihilate or minimise the sense of responsibility in the drunkard. It has always appeared to me a mere waste of time to discuss how far drunkenness is a disease and how far it is a vice. In the great majority of cases of habitual drunkenness it is both the one and the other—a vice, because it consists essentially of yielding to a temptation which ought to be resisted, and of which the drunkard, of all men, best knows that it ought to be resisted; a disease, because the alterations, both of function and of structure, that follow the constant use of the stronger alcoholic stimulants to excess, amount in many cases to well-marked organic changes in almost every part of the body, and probably in all cases, sooner or later, to a merely physical decay, affecting both body and mind. I am, therefore, not at all disposed to recoil from the application of Coke's principle, that the drunkard, speaking generally, is 'voluntarius dæmon,' and therefore punishable. But just because the stern necessity of maintaining the law as 'an avenger to execute wrath,' compels us to give effect to the 'voluntary' element in a drunken frenzy, and to consider it, with Sir Matthew Hale, as a dementia affectata; we may reasonably hold that in proportion as this voluntary element is manifestly subverted, and in the end gradually withdrawn under the influence of long-continued indulgence, the protection of the law ought to be thrown around the victims of this frightful tyranny. It is not at all necessary that in advocating a preventive treatment of the habitual drunkard, we should close our eyes to the fact that he is in all, or in most cases, responsible in some degree for his own wretchedness and degradation. What we maintain is that the failure of our existing system demonstrates, and the experience of every medical man confirms the truth, that the habitual drunkard is in only too many cases absolutely a slave to his vice; and therefore he requires to be protected against it.

661. You very properly discriminate between the vice and the physical consequences of the vice. Now the theory of the seclusion of habitual drunkards is based to a large extent on this, that by preventing access to alcohol you can allow the physical consequences to be eliminated, and the man to be put into sound health again?—I think that is very probable; but we have really had very little experience of that, simply because we have not had legislation that gives us sufficient power and a sufficient control. It requires a great deal more time than we have ever had given to it in this country; you must have the drunkard under control, and for a sufficient time.

662. That is a point on which we are particularly anxious to get medical opinion, the length of time that would be required to put the drunkard physically in the best possible condition for future resistance to temptation?—I think it is almost impossible to give a direct limit, because it can only be worked out by experience of the kind we have not got.

663. They have had experience in America?—Yes, they may have it there.

664. You are aware that at present a year is the limit of voluntary restraint. Do you think that sufficient?—It simply lies beyond the scope of medical experience in this country to say what time would be required to reform a habitual drunkard, because we have never had the opportunity of trying; the position now is that when you are called in to these cases, in a sense you feel paralysed, you can do nothing. I was called sometime ago to attend a gentleman in a hotel in Glasgow, the hotel-keeper was most anxious to do what he could; but he could do little or nothing. He could not absolutely withhold drink from the man; the man had gone from his family, and stationed himself in that hotel with the deliberate object of drinking himself as nearly as possible to death. He meant to drink and drink, and drink as hard as he possibly could, and he would not be denied, and I was only sent for when the landlord of the hotel was positively alarmed that the man would die in his premises. I at the time managed to do something, but he had then got beyond the desire of drink; I tried to do everything I could for him, I spoke to him, argued with him, and sent a clergyman to him. He was a man with a wife and family, and a man with a good social position in society, having every social reason for reform, but the callousness of that man, the utter impossibility of reaching him by any kind of moral consideration, struck me very strongly indeed; and what I felt was, that unless I had the power, or unless somebody would take the power, of interfering with that man's liberty, you could not do anything at all with him. He took spells of it, and when he went in for a spell of it nothing would prevent him from drinking to excess. His will was so strong that if he did not get it in one place he would get it in another. I have very great delicacy in speaking about this case, but I corresponded with his wife regarding the matter, although I saw no more of him, and I learned that he had several more bouts, and died suddenly some years later under very distressing circumstances.

665. As to the period of time which it might be made competent to detain a person, you said that medical experience was not sufficient to enable you to give an opinion. Do you think a year would be sufficient?—It would be useless to have less than a year.

666. I quite appreciate your caution in not pronouncing any opinion, but do you think the difficulty might be got over by proposing that after a certain lapse of time the case might be medically examined, and a fresh application made for further detention?—I think so. We would be always learning. If we let one case out too soon we would learn how to deal with the next case.

Professor W.
T. Gairdner.

14 Nov. 1894.

Professor W.
Gairdner.
Nov. 1894.

667. Possibly you could give us an idea of your scheme?—My believe is that the law stands in an utterly illogical position just now. You see a man getting enslaved before your eyes. Your police courts show the state of matters. It is indomitable and incurable, but they will not give you power to make it otherwise; and yet if the habitual drunkard goes and gets into any mess or commits a crime, then the theory of the law is that he is wholly and entirely responsible. The law will not accept the idea that the man is innocent. I am not asking that they should accept it. They will not do so except after a long disputation and proof of insanity. The law recoils from the idea that the mere drunkard is innocent, because the law wants to punish him; but that they should let the man go on month after month, year after year, precipitating himself into this vortex, and that you should take no measures to restrain him, and then, when in a fury of drink he goes and murders somebody, and you should detain him and say you are fully responsible as if you were a sober man, that I think is illogical to the last degree, and I do not think the public should tolerate it.

668. Now as to the position of the case of a patient suffering from delirium tremens. Any act committed under delirium tremens would be regarded as the act of a madman?—Yes, because any number of medical men would tell you the man was mad.

669. And the moment a man gets delirium tremens you get the same power as for a maniac?—Yes.

670. And can he be committed to a lunatic asylum for delirium tremens?—I cannot give you my own experience, but I can tell you one of an accoucheur in Edinburgh of very good standing, an old friend of mine for many years, although an older man, who went out one morning at half-past-five. He saw a man thundering at the gate of a bank and insisting upon getting in, as he thought he had some business to transact. The man was making such a row that the only choice was between sending him to prison and sending him to an asylum; and this gentleman, seeing that the man was clearly off his head, thought it his duty to take the latter course and send him to Morningside Asylum, which he did. But in a few days the effect of the drink, whether delirium tremens or some other form, had worked off, and the man was sane. They could not detain him, and he was let out, and some months later, being a Highland proprietor, he instituted an action against the doctor who had given the certificate, and although the doctor won the case—the jury upholding him—he told me the action cost him £1000.

671. There are many other forms of insanity of which drunkenness is an exciting cause?—Yes.

672. So that in many cases the division line between insanity and habitual drunkenness is very difficult to hit upon?—Yes.

673. Now you say there is a difficulty in drawing any hard and fast line between habitual drunkenness and insanity?—I go considerably further than the difficulty; I say it is quite impossible to draw the line between habitual drunkenness and insanity so that it will meet all the cases. In the first place, an insane predisposition, or mental instability, which constitutes a large part of the predisposition to insanity, may be also a predisposition to drunkenness, and without being technically insane, a man may, through heredity or other circumstances, have inherited a bad constitution of mind, which readily yields to temptation. Then again, when you come to the habitual and incorrigible class, there is no doubt that they are diseased. The body is diseased, and the mind is diseased, and the whole man is so abnormal, and he becomes such a callous creature, and so inaccessible to ordinary motives, that you cannot but call him insane in the circumstances, although he may not be technically so.

674. There is a power in Scotland, is there not, to accept voluntary cases, on presenting themselves as patients in lunatic asylums; can you tell me whether that power is often taken advantage of by medical practitioners having to deal with persons who through drunkenness or other causes are likely to become insane?—Well, in one or two instances I have managed to get a fellow to go and put himself in confinement, but I never had any confidence that he could be detained a sufficient time to make a cure. I have no data to give you on that matter.

675. I suppose you refer to cases of inebriates?—Yes; I have got them to go and report themselves, and put themselves under care, but I cannot say that I have got any good results from it: I did not follow the cases up.

676. The power of detention is very short; in fact they cannot be detained after they wish to get out?—That is so; they cannot be detained a sufficient amount of time. The present condition of things practically gives a bad character to the whole of these establishments, because the managers or proprietors, knowing that they have not a hold on the patients, they are obliged to relax the regulations. The pecuniary consideration also comes in, and the whole of these voluntary establishments for the reclamation of drunkards are under a cloud from the feeling that drunkards get drunk in them.

677. (Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) But they can lock them up for six months?—But what good is it locking them up? You put them in the hands of attendants whom they either persuade or bribe to get drink for them.

678. (By the Chairman.) You have appended at the end of your pamphlet a scheme headed, 'What legislative measures might be proposed to deal with cases of uncontrollable drunkenness,' would you give us a résumé of it?—Well, I only give it with this statement before-hand, that it is the production of a man very inexperienced in all matters connected with legislation, and I never could get even a policeman to look at it. He found so many difficulties that he would not look at it. On page 23 I say that to meet these different cases, and cases of different degrees and kinds of those who yield to the snare of strong drink, a variety of methods is required, but the following three principles would, I think, be fitted in the interests of society to deal with most of them, so as to give as much discouragement to deliberate evil-doing, and as much aid to human infirmity in the battle with temptation, as it is possible to afford by any system of law. It is the principle not the details that I am dealing with. First—The casual offence might either be passed over altogether—if of the venial kind—or it might be met by a fine or by a very brief imprisonment at the discretion of the magistrate. Then I say the effects of such slight punishment would often be quite inadequate, but they would serve to mark and register the offence. The Commission of 1872 endeavoured to work it on that principle; namely, that a certain number of convictions should involve the idea that a man was an habitual drunkard, and should subject him to further restraint. Second—The habitual offence might be met by the sequestration, for a limited time, of the weekly wages or other emoluments or profits of business, applying these under trust to the support of the family, and to the maintenance of the drunkard himself, and so leaving him pro tempore free to earn but not free to spend. I based that upon the information that there is a number of even habitual drunkards who are not altogether demoralised, and I think nothing could touch or reach them better, short of imprisonment, than the feeling of being deprived of his position at the head of his family and being put under trustees and given only a certain amount of money to live upon. Thirdly—The inveterate offence might be dealt with in two ways not inconsistent with each other but offering also an alternative, to be employed with due regard to the circumstances of the case; (a) the property and earnings of the drunkard, if any, might be wholly placed for a lengthened period under the charge of a tutor, as in cases of insanity, and a formal allowance might be made to him on the condition of his living out of the way of temptation, or otherwise the income might be used for the benefit of the family, as in the preceding class of cases; (b) the person of the drunkard might be placed under restraint in properly regulated establishments, like the inebriate asylums of America, under state inspection and control. In either case the proceedings should be assimilated to those in cases of insanity, but the only facts necessary to be proved should be the inveterate and uncontrollable tendency to consume strong liquors to excess, resulting either in the reckless squandering of income required for proper maintenance, or in disordered health, bodily or mental, and obviously impending ruin to the drunkard's estate and the prospects of his family. It occurred to me that these two ways could be adopted in a law, and I wish to say that that part of my paper was written before the Commission of 1872; but I was glad to find that that Commission practically adopted almost all these principles or went on similar lines.

679. You have not considered specially the case of the quasi criminal drunkard who is constantly coming up before the police magistrates?—I have not had very much to do with that class; I have not been in the way of seeing much of them. The cases I have mostly had to do with are cases of men committing murder or serious crimes where the question was raised of how far they were responsible.

680. Have you seen many instances of very serious crimes?—I have had a good deal of interest in such cases, and I have been consulted in a good many of them; but, as I told you, the same thing rules there in how far it is a disease. I think it is not worth while discussing how far it is a disease and how far it is a vice. It is both, and so I do not think that the question of insanity is practical. It is impossible to make the distinction. I am inclined to think that all drunkards are a little mad, but in the sense that they are responsible, and I would like to say in regard to them, that any legislation will not be long tolerated which goes on the principle of coddling the habitual drunkard. I am for making him work; take it out of him, and make him feel his degradation.

681. But in the case of voluntary Retreats—in the case of Retreats supported by the patient out of his means or by his friends, of course you would be entitled to stipulate for what you like?—Of course I would give him every comfort or even luxury he is entitled to. I would not make him a criminal, but I would not make him feel that because of his bad habits he is to be coddled and well off.

682. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You cannot give a period of length of time for which a man ought to be set aside and kept in compulsory confinement in order that he might recover his strength of will?—No.

683. Have you known of any cases where drunkards have been reclaimed by a certain period of seclusion?—I know a few, but very few, and these few have been exceptional cases where a man has been happy enough to be married to an amiable, sensible, strong-minded woman, who has helped to pull him through.

684. If this Committee come to the conclusion that there should be confinement we shall have to mention something about time. The want of time so far has been the failure, for three months or six months are not sufficient. Might one reasonably say that two years or eighteen months might do?—I was going to say nothing less than a year.

685. Do you think that would be long enough?—I don't know that it would; it would be the very minimum.

686. Now, about the miserable case of which you told us, of the man who went deliberately to get drunk, who was a perfect maniac for liquor, he would never get into the hands of the police. Would you, on the principle that prevention is better than cure, would you empower certain people to lock him up and treat him almost like a lunatic? The man so far has not done anything outrageous, beyond, perhaps, his own family circle, but on the principle that he may some day commit a murder, or some serious crime, would you place him under restraint?—I would apply the same principle there.

687. To whom would you give the initiative in a case like that?—There you are taking me beyond my beat. Don't give it to the doctor; that is all I would say. Perhaps there might be a conseil de famille as they have in France.

688. (By the Chairman.) Do you think that anything could be done by provision of a curator bonis in a case of inveterate drunkenness?—That is included in my three principles. You might let a man out after a period of probation, but let him out on the arrangement that he is to be on an allowance, and is not to have the control of his whole means.

689. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Do you think there are many cases of habitual drunkenness in the better classes; do they often come before you in your official practice?—Oh yes.

690. Among both sexes?—Yes.

691. Have you any way of dealing with such cases?—If the drunkard sets up his back, and says he won't do anything, you can do nothing as the matter stands at present. They are a pitiable class of cases.

692. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you say that for the purposes of this inquiry or legislation you do not think it necessary to go into any subtle question, whether drunkenness is a disease or insanity, but would you make a distinction as to whether it is a crime or a vice?—I said not worth while making a distinction. It is a vice rather than a crime. I wish it were a crime to some extent. Drunkenness, apart from the persons being boisterous or unmanageable, ought to be taken notice of. If a man is drunk on the street, I think the fact should be noticed, and the accumulation of the fact should make him an habitual drunkard.

693. You put aside definitions and merely deal with the condition of things?—That is so; I do not think they are of the least use.

694. Would you not require open and ostentatious proof of drunkenness of such violence as would make convictions possible?—I think it would be necessary to have a certain amount of clear, tangible proof, but I think it would be quite possible to give the police and magistrates power to get that.

695. Suppose a case such as you spoke of, where a man goes to a hotel and gets drunk; you could have no proof that he was drinking himself to death?—If a man chooses to go into a chamber, and drink himself drunk, no power on earth can get hold of him.

696. But he may be a most dangerous man from the point of view that he may do harm to himself or his family?—If he has shown his danger to his family it is for them to lay the charge.

697. Do you think that the present condition of the law in giving a short period of confinement for the drunkard is in any degree a deterrent?—Very little indeed.

698. You think a long period of isolation is required?—Yes; but I am not prepared to say that in incipient cases shorter periods might not do, or no periods at all. The chief benefit I would expect appears in what we said when we were before Mr. Asquith last year. We tried to put the matter before him. We saw that he was frightened by the magnitude of the concern. Yes, I said, but it is for you to make it a smaller thing, and the mere effect of the law automatically laying hold of the drunkards, the mere fact of his knowing that he cannot escape the law, that he cannot be allowed to go on, whatever the consequences, is bound to have an enormous effect in restraining drunkenness, more than all your temperance societies and Gothenburg systems. If a man, who was in the course of becoming a slave to drink, knew positively that he could not be allowed to do it—at present he knows he can do it—if he knew that it would invariably bring him under restraint, that knowledge would be the strongest possible deterrent.

699. But it is only when the habit has been formed that you can pick him up?—No, I would not put it so; drunkenness, I would say, per se ought to bring a man under the notice of the police. The police ought to report all cases of drunkenness that might come under their notice, and the reporting of that sufficiently often in the books of the police should make that man liable to detention.

700. Is your special difficulty as to a period of detention, that as human nature varies, different people would require different periods?—It is precisely.

701. Then I presume that an earlier stage would require a shorter period than a more confirmed stage?—I think so.

702. But you would put the maximum period of detention to be set at the discretion of the medical authority?—Well, that is a very difficult subject, what the maximum period should be. There are some people who would need to be detained all their lives.

703. Do you think the benefit to be derived by detention is purely physical, by getting the drink out of the man's tissues?—And breaking the habit, and thereby abolishing the craving, and bringing his whole physique into a better condition.

704. Have you examined the American evidence at all about that?—Chiefly through the Commission of 1872; I think there was a good deal of evidence given there.

705. You would not be prepared to state a maximum period of detention?—No.

706. I quite see your difficulty about putting a hard and fast line, but could you not put a maximum?—I could not venture upon that.

707. Is it not a difficulty about the voluntary position that after a man has been in confinement a short time, and feels himself getting well, that he wants to go off?—Yes; but you must not take the man's impression about how he feels. You must be completely exempted from all possibility of being biassed by what the man wants himself. You must keep him as long as it is requisite in the public interest.

708. You would give to the medical authority of the Retreat full discretion as to the time of dismissal?—In the same sense as you give it over insane people. Of course, you would have a power of inquiry into it. There would be a Commission sitting on the matter similar to the Commission on Lunatics.

709. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) But you would require to sentence a man to some minimum or he would always be going to the doctor trying to get out?—Of course.

710. But would it not be a very invidious position to put the doctor into?—That is the reason I said I did not think anything less than a year should be adopted.

711. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Then if it is to be a sentence of a year the doctor might have power to increase it?—There might be a magisterial inquisition upon it to see whether it should be increased or not. Give it as much solemnity as you can, so as to carry as much impression with it as possible. I don't want the responsibility to rest on the doctor.

712. In addition to the compulsory system you would have a voluntary system?—I would make it all compulsion, but I would not deny a man the right to go and put himself voluntarily under restraint. Sir Charles Cameron's Bill in its present form does that. I approve of all that is in Sir Charles Cameron's Bill, but I want a good deal more.

713. (By Col. M'Harly.) With regard to the point at which you would interfere with the drunkard, could you indicate that in any way, both in the case of the man who brought himself under the notice of the police, and the man who did not?—In that case again my individual experience fails me, because we have no machinery to put into operation. But here is what I note: as being the result of the Commission of 1892:—'That after three convictions within twelve months 'the magistrates should be empowered to require the 'offender to find a surety or sureties for sobriety and 'good conduct for a fixed period, and in default of 'the same, or in case the surety is forfeited by a fresh 'offence, then to sentence the offender to a considerable 'period of detention in an industrial reformatory for 'inebriates as hereafter recommended.' That, I think, is about as wise as anything I could put forward.

714. That hardly refers to the class of cases about which we have heard a good deal this morning, where the husband, or it may be the wife, makes a domestic establishment very unhappy through drink, or violence through drink, and where, for the sake of peace or for other reasons, no complaint is made to the police, but still the family life is wrecked?—If no complaint is made, and if it is effectually hushed up, I do not see how you can get at it in any case. But practically, I think you would get at it if you had all these different ways of dealing with it open to you, because if a man was squandering the resources of his family it would be in the interests of the whole family to stop him doing that. At present it is no uncommon thing that a man in receipt of good wages goes and spends three-fourths of them on drink, and gives the remaining fourth to his wife for the support of the family. That ought not to be tolerated for a single moment. The glorious liberty of getting drunk ought to be abridged in that case, and one way I would abridge it would be to put the man's funds in trust and give the wife the three-fourths, and him the remaining fourth.

715. Then in regard to the treatment; from what you just read I see you would not advise that the treatment in every case should be identical?—Certainly not.

716. Might it be possible, in the earlier stages of drunkenness, to make arrangements for handing the person over to the care of some relation, giving them a certain amount of power over them, some sort of control; would that be sufficient?—I have very great doubts about that. It might do in some instances, but when you consider how very difficult it is in a family to displace the natural relations, and give one power over another, and how apt it is to jealousies and the imputation of interested motives, it is very doubtful. To put the drunkard in the power of whom—his wife?

717. If she will take the responsibility. His son? His uncle?—It is a very dangerous position that, I think. The way I propose would, I think, be better; namely to hand over his funds to a trustee not connected with the family at all.

718. But before any sort of guardianship was appointed there would be a magistrate's order?—Certainly.

719. So that that would relieve the odium of any control?—Yes; but the odium consists of after effects in the family itself. There would never be the same relation between two men—suppose it was two men—if you deprived the one of his liberty by placing him under a relative.

720. I suppose you are aware that that sort of guardianship is in use in the case of lunatics?—Yes; but then lunacy is not considered in the same sense a disgrace.

721. In the alternative way to the family, namely, that the father, or whoever he was, should be confined in some institution, don't you think that that would be an inducement to them to undertake some sort of care or guardianship of him willingly or readily?—Well, I have never considered that question up to this moment. I will give a hurried opinion on it. It might be. The only thing I am prepared to say, that I see my way to, is that I think it would be of immense importance where the drunkard is squandering money which practically is the money of his family; to put a stop to that, and say you are not fit to be the head of the family any longer, and we will make your wife the head, or we will make a trustee the head, with power to give the funds to the wife.

722. You would be prepared, at any rate, to put in the hands of the magistrates a graded power as regards the restraint that he might impose?—Certainly; I do not know that the liberty of the drunkard is worth anything at all.

723. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think these inebriate homes, if there were such, should be private?—There we have again the precedent of insanity grown up with a mixture, some of them private, some of them State. I think it would be better that they should not be private. I think they should be all under control.

724. You wish inebriety to be kept quite distinct from lunacy?—I certainly do. I find that Medical Superintendents of Lunatic Asylums are all of that opinion.

725. Do you think that the same civil and legal dis advantages attach to inebriates as attach to lunatics?—It depends upon what they can do. A man in an asylum can make a will, I understand, provided that at the moment he has a lucid interval, and capable of understanding what he is doing. I do not think it is at all necessary that an inebriate should not be able to make a will. I think he might do any legal act that his mental condition admits of his doing, and as the mental condition of a drunkard may be perfectly good when deprived of drink, he might, in many cases, do anything that an ordinary man can do in these circumstances.

726. As a medical jurist, you have had to do with some of the most critical cases tried at the Circuit Court in Glasgow, those of men who have committed fatal assaults in a state of intoxication, and where it was found that these men had been notorious drunkards, although they never came into the hands of the police. Have you any suggestion as to how men of that kind can be dealt with before they get into that state in which they commit serious crime. The case I have particularly before my mind is one which you will readily remember?—Well, the case you allude to was one that was a little difficult to disentangle, or to say how far you could anticipate. When his case was first presented to me, it was presented as quite a sudden act.

727. Would not your proposal to deal with drunkenness per se have some check on men getting into that state at which they are liable at any moment to commit crime?—I think no man should be allowed to drift into that state in which he might any day commit a crime of the first magnitude, not knowing that he was doing it.

728. (By the Chairman.) Was not A. B.'s case one in which he shot a constable, and insanity was pleaded, and he was sentenced to be kept in confinement during Her Majesty's pleasure, and he was confined for two years?—Yes.

729. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In your brochure you speak of punishing the vendor of liquor as well as the victim; how do you propose to do that?—It is not so much punishing him, but I think the public-house, without taking too strong a view of it, is an institution so dangerous to the public that, when it is ill-conducted or noxious, it is the public interest to come down upon it in every possible way, and the way that I would come down upon it would be to shut it. I am dissatisfied with the present system, where it is a question of suppressing it because of the part which canvassing of the Justices of the Peace and personal influence play in the matter. I think there ought to be some sort of automatic principle—that the police should watch over the public-houses; that they should give notice of public-houses which are constantly turning out drunks on the streets; that that fact should be recorded somehow, and the fact that it has been proved with regard to certain public-houses, these houses should be shut up.

730. (By the Chairman.) That is pretty nearly the theory of the law at present?—It may be the theory but it is not the practice.

731. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you aware that Section 14 of the Public-house, Scotland Acts, Amendment Act, 1862, has a provision which states that the Chief Constable shall, on the first lawful day of every week, furnish the names of license holders from whose premises intoxicated persons have frequently emerged?—I was not aware of that. That would very much meet the case. My suggestion was written before that.

732. (By the Chairman.) Could you give us any information respecting the influence of heredity on drunkenness?—Oh, I have no doubt it is very considerable.

733. Have any cases happened to present themselves to you of dipsomaniacs, the children of drunken parents?—I am not prepared to adduce individual instances, but the ground on which that lies in my opinion is this, that habitual drunkenness is undoubtedly like insanity, often a manifestation of a weak and an unstable nervous system, and that it is transmitted hereditarily. I should expect that the people who are liable to insanity in respect of heredity would be liable to drunkenness in the same way.

734. Have you met any instances of dipsomania, or a craving for drink amounting nearly to that, coming on suddenly after some disease or during certain conditions; such, for instance, as pregnancy?—Well, I almost think I have, but I cannot give you a particular instance just now.

735. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Does it not come on frequently about the climacteric period in women?—I believe that is a fact. [The witness withdrew.]

James Taylor.

MR. JAMES TAYLOR, Governor, Barlinnie Prison, called in and examined.

James Tayl

736. (By the Chairman.) You are at present Governor of Barlinnie Prison?—Yes.

737. How long have you been that?—Six years.

738. You understand the object of our inquiry?—Yes.

739. Have you had many cases passed through your hands whose sentences you attribute to drunkenness?—Well, the great majority of them are for drunkenness.

740. Even short sentences are sent to you?—From a day up to two years.

741. Since when?—The longer sentences used to go to Perth. The short sentences were always confined in the local prisons.

742. You have been 36 years in the prison service?—Yes.

743. You have seen some changes?—Yes.

744. The greatest change, I think, that has occurred, is the very large increase in the number of commitments?—When I entered the prison service 36 years ago, the commitments of males were 11,001, whereas last year they were 32,087.

745. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Nearly three times as many?—Yes.

746. (By the Chairman.) The females have also increased?—They were then 6921, and last year they were 18,660, which gives a total in 1858, the year in which I joined the service, of 17,922 commitments, and last year of 50,747.

747. Then you have worked out these daily averages?—The daily average has not increased in anything like the same proportion. In fact, females have decreased instead of increasing. In 1858 the daily average of males was 1119, and last year it was 1615. The females were 995 in 1858, and 671 last year.

748. What is it that has increased the number of commitments so enormously more than the daily average?—The shorter sentences. Very much shorter sentences are now given for all classes of offences, serious as well as trivial.

749. But the longer sentences formerly would not be served out in Barlinnie?—No; all these numbers apply to all the prisons in Scotland—not to Barlinnie alone, which did not exist at all a few years ago.

750. Do you wish to express some opinion in regard to the sentences passed upon cases of drunkenness?—Well, I think the number of commitments might be very largely diminished if the magistrates, instead of sending a man to prison for 24 hours, or even three days, let him off for the first offence, within perhaps 12 months, with a warning that if he came up again, a heavy sentence would be imposed.

751. I suppose you have not the means of ascertaining the proportion of men who are unable to pay the fine, and go to prison for a very short time, such as a day or two days?—I think that about half of those sentenced go to prison.

752. Is it that they have no money to pay, or do they prefer to keep the money and go to prison?—They have not got it. I was inquiring the other day about the average amount of money brought in by each prisoner, and it was about eightpence.

James Taylor.
Nov. 1894.

753. Is that for drunkenness?—Oh no, all commitments, but of course they are nearly all drunks.

754. Now as to the proportion of drunks among those that come to you; how many are there?—The commitments at Barlinnie Prison for offences that may be attributable to drunkenness were, for last year, 7876 males. There are no females in Barlinnie.

755. That is in respect to breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, begging, vagrancy, and other petty offences?—Yes.

756. You say that you have usually about 700 prisoners in custody?—Yes.

757. Can you give us an analysis of the sentences?—Yes; we have usually about 700 prisoners, and of these 380 have sentences of 60 days and upwards.

758. Give us an analysis of the prisoners first, and their offences?—Of the 700 in custody, 350 were for theft, 170 for assault, 90 disorderly conduct, 50 drunk and incapable, 5 for begging, and 35 for other crimes, including bigamy, poaching, shebeening, and military offences.

759. And their length of sentences?—380 had sentences of 60 days and upwards; 110 had sentences of 30 and under 60 days; 210 were under 30 days.

760. I suppose a very large proportion of the 210 would be drunks?—Yes; or drunk and disorderly.

761. Then what proportion of the whole 700 do you think would be for offences attributable to drink?—I should think that fully one-half. A considerable number of the thefts would be attributable to drink; almost all the assaults and disorderly conduct; begging too, either directly or indirectly; so that fully more than one-half may quite safely be attributed to drink.

762. You mentioned that the sentences for simple drunkenness vary from a day to seven days?—Yes.

763. Have you many prisoners in for that?—The usual sentence is three days for being drunk, occasionally five days; but it depends upon the magistrate.

764. Have you a very large number of cases under a week?—A very large number.

765. Who bears the cost of taking them out to Barlinnie, and sending them back again?—Government.

766. Have you any idea what the expense of that would be?—I could not say off-hand, but it is a good many hundreds. It will amount, I think, to over £1000 a year.

767. I suppose the greater amount of that sum is owing to the frequent journeys of these people with short sentences?—Yes; undoubtedly.

768. What is your experience in regard to the working out of short sentences on these drunks? Do you find it has any deterrent effect; or do you get the same men again and again?—Well, a very large number of those committed for the first time do not come back again.

769. Do you think then that the first committal very often has a salutary effect?—Yes.

770. And even if it is very short?—Yes, I think so.

771. Then how many recommitals have you?—The total committals at Barlinnie Prison were 13,726 for last year, which comprises 10,740 individuals, and 8096 of these 10,000 were committed for the first time.

772. For riotous and disorderly conduct the sentences are longer?—A little longer; but they don't differ very much from those for being drunk and incapable.

773. For begging?—The sentences are still longer; 7 days, 14 days, and up to 30 days are the usual.

774. I suppose you do not know whether you get most of the people sentenced for begging?—Oh, I think they mostly go to prison.

775. Could you tell me the number of persons re-committed, or the number of reconvictions in connection with drunkenness and these crimes?—1245 were re-committed.

776. How often was the worst of these cases re-committed?—A dozen times at any rate.

777. In the course of a year?—Yes.

778. Have you many of these constantly recurring cases?—There were 85 who were in prison on an average five times each during the year, and some of them had been more than a dozen times, almost all for James Taylor very short sentences.

779. Do you think that these fellows who have been in for more than five times would have had more sentences passed on them—that is, would have got off with fines on other occasions?—Yes, some of them tell me they occasionally pay a fine; but a habitual, I think, very seldom pays a fine.

780. He drinks it all?—Yes, and his friends get tired paying for him.

781. But a man may have 2s. 6d. occasionally and be willing to pay it to save a week's imprisonment?—Well, that is not a corresponding amount to the usual sentence, which is 6s. or three days, or up to 10s. or a week.

782. Are many prisoners let out by you on payment of fines by their friends?—Habituals very seldom get out after they come to us; but the first conviction men do. We had for instance no fewer than 13 friends of those up yesterday to get men out. But we very seldom liberate so many by payment of fines, although we have some every day. It is usually a family friend, a wife or a sister, who comes, and I might mention that it is not an uncommon thing for them to bring drink with them, or to be themselves the worse of drink or smelling of drink. I have seen them offer drink to a prisoner the moment he got out at the gate, and it was, of course, swallowed greedily.

783. That shows that they don't take a very serious view of the matter?—No. Those who come to us regularly have seldom their fines paid.

784. You have got some suggestions to make as to the diminution of commitments?—I think, in addition to dealing with those who have been convicted four times and upwards within a year, something might be done to diminish the commitments to prison. (1st.) By dismissing with an admonition, prisoners convicted for the first time in, say 12 months, for being drunk and incapable, or for other trivial offence for which the punishment at present is from one to three days imprisonment failing the payment of a small fine. The night in the Police Office, and the record of the conviction would be quite as effectual a punishment as a day or two in prison. (2nd.) By increasing the sentences on prisoners recommitted within, say 12 months. I would be inclined to propose that a second conviction within 12 months, for being drunk and incapable, or for other trivial offence caused by drink, should be followed by a sentence of at least ten days imprisonment (unless the convicting magistrate again thought fit to dismiss the prisoner with an admonition), and a third conviction within the same period by a sentence of at least 30 days. These longer sentences would give a man time to get thoroughly sober, and would afford him a better chance of breaking with his bad habit.

785. Do you think it would take 30 days to allow some of your friends to get thoroughly sober?—Well, it takes a considerable time. We sent out two this morning who were threatened with delirium tremens. One of these had been in for seven days, and the other for five.

786. Were they suffering from delirium tremens when they came to you?—No; it usually comes afterwards.

787. In that case they simply go to the Infirmary?—To the poorhouse hospital.

788. But in your hands?—We have a padded cell to which we usually confine men suffering from delirium tremens, under treatment, and under constant observation.

789. It is rather a lucky thing for a man to get into delirium tremens after coming into your hands?—A lucky thing for his friends. We had nine cases of delirium tremens last year, I think.

790. None of which had started when the conviction was passed?—No. Some of them don't show any symptoms until they have been in for some days—that is until the supply of drink is stopped. Forty-five men came in in such a shaky condition that we thought they were likely to have delirium tremens, and we put them under observation.

14 Nov. 1894.

James Taylor. 791. And were these fellows fresh comers, or had they been before?—The one who went out this morning with delirium tremens had never been in prison before, the other had been frequently in prison; I asked the latter how he had been absent so long, and he told me he had been a teetotaler after he went out from his last sentence nine months ago, for six months. His shop-mates had told him that it was not good for him, that he was breaking off the habit too suddenly, and that he ought to try a drop. He was at last induced to taste, and the result was that he was just back where he was. He had saved some money, but some roughs assaulted him and took it from him, and he was in the Infirmary for six weeks in consequence of the assault. He was no sooner out of the Infirmary than he was back drinking again, and then he came to us.

792. When these cases go out there is a Prison Gate Mission looks after them, isn't there?—The Discharged Prisoners Aid Society.

793. Does it do anything for such cases?—Oh yes. They find employment for a large number.

794. Men who are only in for a few days for drunkenness will probably have no difficulty?—They are mostly labourers, and they don't need to care; their imprisonment will not usually prevent them from getting work.

795. Besides, a few days would only give the appearance of richness?—Many of them apply to the agent of the Society, although they have not been in for more than a day or two. The agent gives them breakfast and a word of advice, at any rate.

796. They have no temperance agencies?—No, but they are very glad to get them to sign as teetotalers; but they don't make that a branch of the Mission.

797. Do you find as a matter of fact that many of them repeat the story of this man of whom you were speaking, when they have signed the pledge and broken it?—Oh yes; a great many.

798. You have given us a suggestion about altering the terms of imprisonment. As a matter of fact, there is no graduation of imprisonment?—Well, many men who have been convicted frequently and are in for three days may have been in the week before or the month before; but it does not make any difference in their sentences. I do not think the magistrate knows; there are so many cases coming before the magistrates in the Police Courts that it is impossible for them to inquire into every case.

799. Supposing it were considered desirable to register a man's convictions, so as to make them operate against him as proposed, how would you suggest that it should be done—in the prison you can tell how many times a man has been in your hands, but you cannot tell how many times he has been arrested or convicted?—The police should be able to keep such a record.

800. But the police say that they have a number of different Police Offices, and a man's record at each office can be traced, and there is no central register?—That is a difficulty; but these habituales, I think, are pretty well known all over the city, and if they were brought into any particular office inquiries could be made at the other offices.

801. They say that to some extent the habitual drunkard generally sticks about one place?—That would make it easier.

802. Yes, but I am asking with reference to my proposal. We can easily get the number of times a man has been in prison, but it has been suggested that we cannot get a record even of his convictions, let alone the number of times he may have been arrested and forfeited a pledge—cannot get his record even for the City of Glasgow. That would prevent your proposal from working fairly, would it not?—Well, it would only work out so far as they knew the character of the man. If he was not known, in the particular Court where he was being tried, to have been convicted within 12 months, they would just have to try him as a first offender.

803. You have not spoken about fines. What would you do there?—I think I would continue to impose a fine corresponding to the length of imprisonment.

804. What is the fine corresponding to 30 days?—James Taylor. Different magistrates take different views—perhaps £1 or 20 days, or £2 or 30 days. It is very seldom we get a 30 days with a fine; £2 is the common thing for 30 days. 14 Nov. 1894

805. What I wanted to know was whether you would go in for the option of the fine or, after a considerable record, 30 days without the option of a fine?—I think there might be an alternative of a fine in all convictions for drunkenness.

806. A large number of your prisoners that are not in jail are in the poorhouse?—I put it to all the 700 in Barlinnie Prison at one time how many of them had been in the poorhouse, and 45 acknowledged they had been there. I expected there would have been more.

807. In the course of their lives?—Yes. Most of them said it was when they were ill, or when they had an injury and were unable to work. Of the 700, 87 acknowledged having been in an Industrial School or Training Ship, and 35 in a Reformatory School; whilst 45 were old convicts.

808. Are these last men in for drunkenness or breach of certificate?—350 of the 700 were in for theft, and the others for crimes that might be attributable to drunkenness.

809. But if a ticket-of-leave man is pulled up for a breach of his licence, he does not come to you, does he?—Oh yes.

810. You have an analysis here as to the condition of the men, whether married or single, and the number of their children. Do you find that has any bearing on the subject of the inquiry?—Well, the majority of them are not married—473, or 68 per cent. are not married.

811. And the number who have children?—201 are married, and have among them 455 children.

812. Besides 26 widowers?—Yes, with 51 children. That gives an average of 2.2 children to each prisoner who has been married.

813. Then you have an analysis here as to their declarations on the subject of drink?—The number of the 700 prisoners who say they don't drink at all is 142. Two or three said they were teetotalers.

814. Do you believe that?—I was quite surprised to hear that so many of them did not drink; I think their statement would be pretty near the truth, but I was surprised at it.

815. Does that mean that they absolutely refrain from drink, or is it that they are not drunken?—They meant that they did not take it at all at any time.

816. Go on with your analysis?—The number who take a little occasionally, 138; the number who take a spree at intervals, 148; the number who get drunk every pay, 74; and the number who say they are drunkards, who get drunk whenever they can, 198.

817. That gives you 270 or so who get drunk at least every pay?—Yes.

818. Do you find any bashfulness or reluctance on their part to give you information?—Oh no. Many of them, on the contrary, volunteered information.

819. You mentioned that the number of prisoners committed to Barlinnie last year was 13,726, of whom about 3000 were transferred from Glasgow Prison?—Yes.

820. How was that; owing to the prison being closed?—No. Male prisoners, when untried, are confined in Glasgow Prison. When convicted, they are transferred to Barlinnie, as are also convicted prisoners from the country received for convenience at Glasgow Prison instead of being sent direct to Barlinnie.

821. What is the highest number of recommitals that you have?—Ten is the highest number. There are several tens.

822. You have not had any very young prisoners in your charge, have you?—We always have a few juveniles under 16 years of age. I had only two at the time I took the statistics that you have, but we have had a good many more since that time.

823. How young have you had them passing through your hands?—Ten and eleven years of age.

824. When had you the last of that age?—A considerable time ago. They don't send so many young boys to prison now as they used to do.

825. Is that owing to new legislation, or simply is it in accordance with change of magisterial opinion?—I think it is more on account of change of opinion.

826. Because, I suppose, they now send direct to the Industrial Schools?—Juveniles have not, I think, at any time passed through the prison to the Industrial School. There has been a very large diminution in the number of juvenile prisoners. In 1882, the number of juvenile prisoners committed to Scottish prisons was 1081, and that had been about the number for a good many years, but in 1893 the number had fallen to 741, being a gradual diminution since 1882.

827. What do you call juvenile offenders?—Under 16 years.

828. Have you many under 15 years for instance?—Not many.

829. Under 14 years?—Not many; still less. The lower you go down the fewer we have.

830. I thought there would be a greater diminution owing to this power of sending these juvenile offenders direct to Industrial Schools?—Yes.

831. Have you experienced any marked change recently?—I think the figures I have given show a very perceptible change.

832. I see you have several other analyses here. What sort of sentences do these boys undergo?—Usually a few days for theft or disorderly conduct—playing pitch-and-toss one of them told me he got in for. One little fellow got sent to prison for making a hole in a show, another for breaking a cock's leg, and so on—very trivial offences, for which a whipping would be very much better punishment.

833. Where is whipping punishment given?—In the Police Office; it used to be in the prison.

834. Any of these boys undergoing long sentences?—None of them.

835. Up to what?—Up to 20 days or 30 days we may have them, or even 60 days; but it is very seldom we get any offenders for the longer periods.

836. Have you many juvenile drunkards?—A few.

837. What age?—One I came across the other day was 16, who was in for being drunk, and who told me he had been several times drunk.

838. Not several times in?—No; it was his first time in prison.

839. Is that about the youngest drunk?—Yes, that I have come across.

840. How are these juvenile prisoners treated by you? Do you keep them apart?—Oh yes. The great bulk of the prisoners are kept in separation; but the juveniles are separated even from each other.

841. So that you don't think they can get any harm from being with you?—I think not.

842. Do you approve of the imprisonment of very young people?—I do not.

843. At what age would you have such responsibility attached as you think would justify it?—I think 16 years is quite young enough.

844. How would you deal with those younger?—By whipping them or sending them to a Reformatory or Industrial School.

845. They used to whip young prisoners?—Yes.

846. Do you know anything about the curative or preventive effect of that?—Well, I am afraid it did not always have the effect of preventing them coming back.

847. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Not many came back?—Yes, a good many.

848. (By the Chairman.) Came back for another whipping?—Yes, I have seen them twice whipped.

849. And do they come back again?—Yes; but with a good many of course it was effective.

850. The fact of their having been in jail is a stigma upon them?—Some people think so; but I don't know that the jail is a worse stigma than the correction. There are so many various offences for which people get into prison. Some even glory in it.

851. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Such as first class misdemeanants?—Yes.

852. (By the Chairman.) You have very few James Taylors commitments for begging?—Very few.

853. Vagrancy does not appear to fill your jail?—14 Nov. 1894. No; whatever it may be in country prisons.

854. You have been a very long time in the prison service; where else have you been?—In Glasgow Prison for 5 years; Ayr Prison for 15 years.

855. Well, what about vagrancy in Ayr?—Well, there were more in proportion there, I think, than in Glasgow.

856. Were you much troubled with them?—No; they were not troublesome, nor were they very numerous even there. Like Glasgow there were a few always coming and going.

857. The drunks?—Well, there were comparatively few of them. It was a small prison; there were not more than 150 prisoners altogether. I don't know that they were fewer in proportion than in Glasgow.

858. You have got a suggestion for persons convicted of begging who are old, frail, and weak-minded?—Yes; I would suggest that persons convicted of begging, and who are old, frail, and weak-minded, or who are disabled through loss of limbs or sight, or who in any other way are rendered unfit to earn a living, should be committed to the poorhouse instead of the prison. Five out of six beggars in custody here recently were over 60 years, and of the half-dozen or so who are frequently in Barlinnie for begging, not more than one or two are fit subjects for prison.

859. You make a suggestion that these people should be committed to the poorhouse? You are aware that the poorhouse authorities have no right to detain them, and that they won't be detained?—No; but there is some power in England for that.

860. I am not aware that there is?—I have seen in the newspapers reports of a magistrate ordering a prisoner to be detained in the poorhouse.

861. The authorities have power to detain persons who take advantage of the casual wards until they do a certain amount of work; but I am not aware of any other class?—That was one reason why I made my suggestion—because I thought they had the power in England.

862. You propose therefore something for which legislation would be necessary?—Yes; but there are so few of them, so far as Barlinnie is concerned, that it would be hardly worth while legislating for them.

863. The Barony Parish people complain very much about you sending them a lot of sick discharged prisoners?—Yes; any sick who are unfit for discharge, if they have no friends, we send to the Barony Parish to take charge of them.

864. Do you pay rates?—The Government pays a slump sum I understand; but we are not rated.

865. Supposing it was considered wise by the Committee to make some recommendations for dealing with habitual drunkards, confining them or otherwise, could you give us any idea of what you would think a good line on which to define the habitual drunkard?—Well, I should say a man who spends all his earnings upon drink and gets drunk whenever he can.

866. But what I mean is some practical test for the quasi criminal drunkard—you propose to have cumulative punitive penalties?—If a man has been three or four times in prison within a year for being drunk, I think he might be considered an habitual.

867. Three or four times in prison?—Yes.

868. Have you many that would fall under that category?—There are 85.

869. In all Scotland how many are there?—1083; but many who never go to prison are quite as deserving of being considered drunkards as those who go to prison.

870. For the matter of that, those who are able to pay fines—you don't know anything about them?—No; not in the prison.

871. What is your experience as to the effect of seclusion from drink in curing drunkards? How long sentences are undergone in your prison?—Two years we detain them; but not many of them get two years. Twelve and eighteen months are common sentences.

James Taylor.
14 Nov. 1894.

872. Do you find them go out much improved and with a desire for sobriety?—Many of them, at least, go out determined that they won't drink again; but they very soon relapse in many cases.

873. One thing that will account for that is, that they fall into the hands of comrades, who celebrate their release by giving them drink?—Yes, they treat them in the first public-house they come across. There are some who have a little more determination, but the great majority of them ultimately fall back again.

874. You have got some control over earnings, have you not, only giving the prisoner a part?—He gets it in instalments if his credit is 5s. or upwards. It is paid through the Discharged Prisoners Aid Society, and then given to him in instalments, as the agent of the Society sees he requires it.

875. Have you many of these prisoners discharged after putting in a considerable period of imprisonment, returning to you shortly as drunks?—No, not very many. They may get drunk, but they manage to keep out of the hands of the police.

876. You propose, in connection with the seclusion of habitual drunkards, that every individual who gets drunk four times within a year—not gets drunk I suppose—gets convicted of drunkenness within a year, should be shut up for a year or two?—I do not know that I made that proposal. I shall read you what I have said on this subject. There are a considerable number of cases where men and women, especially the latter, are so much addicted to drink that they are a nuisance to themselves and to all connected with them. A good many of those convicted of drunkenness four times and upwards during the year are probably of this class, but if it is proposed to shut up any one for a year or two, with a view to his being cured of the drink habit, a very careful inquiry will have to be made into the man's habits and surroundings before an order is issued for his detention for so long a period. It might not in all cases be advisable to shut a man up for a year or two, although he had been four times convicted during the year. These convictions, notwithstanding the man might be, except when he took say four spees, a sober well-conducted man who takes the bulk of his wages home to his wife on pay-day and keeps a respectable home. Many a man who has never been convicted of drunkenness might be a more suitable subject for detention for the cure of his drink habit.

877. How would you propose that the case should be sifted?—I think if they are supposed in the Police Court to be habitual, they should be remitted to the sheriff to be dealt with.

878. A very similar suggestion was made to us by another witness, that the magistrate should remit them to the sheriff to deal with?—They could not be dealt with in the Police Courts where they have so many petty offenders to deal with.

879. Do you think it would be an easy job for the sheriff to deal with them?—It would take some careful investigation to discover whether the man's case was one of the kind to be detained—for a year or two.

880. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You suggest that an inquiry in regard to habitual drunks should take place before the sheriff. Do you think the presiding judge should necessarily be the sheriff, or would not some kind of inquiry be held in regard to quasi criminal drunkards as suggested in the Inebriate Act of 1879, where two Justices of the Peace are provided for?—That might quite well be done, so that the Court has time to go into all the case.

881. To a certain extent you suggest the adoption of cumulative sentences; you propose to go up from 10 to 30 days? Don't you think that is too great a jump from 10 to 30?—Well, it might be 15 days and then 30. I think the magistrates have already power to pass sentence of 30 days in the event of them failing to find caution.

882. Have you seen a discussion on the Scottish Burgh Police Act, in which it was proposed in the House of Commons in 1892 to give 30 days sentences for being drunk?—I have not seen it.

883. Having regard to the sentences now being passed for many indictable offences, don't you think that 30 days for a second or third act of drunkenness would, as a punishment and nothing more, be an excessive sentence, and would it not, in many instances, impose hardships upon a man himself, who might lose his work, and upon his wife and family?—It might, and therefore each case should be fully investigated and such sentence passed as in the opinion of the magistrate would be good for all concerned. Many drunkards are without family ties, and of the rest many contribute little or nothing to the upkeep of a home.

884. And from your experience of Glasgow prison, where you have been governor for five years, is it not the case that women are more frequently convicted of drunkenness than men?—Yes.

885. What would you say was the proportion of habituals—assuming the number of convictions for such to be four—how many more women than men would come under that category?—I should think there would be double, anyhow.

886. Our return gives five times as many?—Indeed.

887. Our prison returns show 537 women have been convicted four times and upwards, and there were 85 men in Barlinnie, and 23 in Glasgow prison, showing that there are five times more women than men in this category. Does that correspond with your experience?—It is higher than I thought it would be. I knew quite well that women were much more frequently convicted than men.

888. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I see by the return there are 23 in Glasgow?—Indeed.

889. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it not the case, in regard to the time and money penalty, that under the Summary Jurisdiction Act you can only inflict, as an alternative, a money penalty or fine bearing a relation to the time penalty?—I do not know that it is exactly fixed.

890. Is it not in regard to some petty offences regulated under the summary jurisdiction?—I do not know that it is. Up to a certain extent it is pretty much in the hands of the magistrate, I think.

891. (By Col. McHardy.) Do you know the state in which these habitual drunkards come into the prison? What state is a man in at his reception?—A good many of them are very shaky.

892. And practically unfit for prison discipline for some time?—For a day or two, but they soon come round.

893. But, at any rate, on reception, a very considerable number of them are unfit for prison discipline at all?—I would not say a large number of them.

894. How many would you say?—Perhaps out of 100 commitments there might be a dozen of them.

895. I mean commitments for drunkenness?—Yes. There might be a dozen out of the 100 who are hardly fit for their food or their work for a few days.

896. What is the effect, so far as you have observed it, of the prison treatment on the habitual offender—the man who gets 14 days or something like that—what is the effect, so far as you have observed it, in the way of reformation on the man?—If he is an habitual offender it has none. It is only likely to do good to a man who has been in repeatedly.

897. You have seen innumerable instances of imprisonment inflicted upon people without the slightest good?—That is so.

898. As to the character of those people; are there not a certain number of them who are more or less mentally weak?—That is so.

899. Upon a man of that kind you would not expect to find much impression by the prison treatment?—I would not. Many of this kind settle down in prison as if it was their home.

900. There is another class of prisoners who are in for theft, but are there not a considerable number of cases of petty thefts which are very closely mixed up with drunkenness?—A good many. They commit theft with the view of getting drink, or commit theft while they are in a slightly intoxicated state.

901. That is more largely the case with women than men?—I believe it will be.

James Taylor.
14 Nov. 1894.

James Taylor. 902. And therefore you find in the present statistics that the actual returns of drunkenness would not be a perfectly correct statement, without taking into consideration a certain proportion of petty thefts?—That is so.

903. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You spoke of an inquiry into the mode of life of the alleged drunkard, would that be an open inquiry, or with closed doors?—Well, it might quite well be an open inquiry, I think.

904. Would it not be a little hard to publish the full details of a man's life, supposing the inquiry failed?—If a man is a drunkard that is a thing that won't hide. It will be well enough known.

905. And what kind of evidence would you take? Of his domestics, or of his wife, or of his neighbours round about?—Do you mean in regard to a man who has been in prison, or is it a case outside?

906. You very properly, I think, lay considerable stress on the fact that many drunkards do not come before the public, and where the police do not interfere, and these are often the worst and most dangerous to their own families. These are the persons into whose case inquiry would probably be made. Would you have evidence taken against him by the insiders, seeing there are no outsiders?—It would be necessary to have some members of the family examined in regard to the matter.

907. What is the longest period of imprisonment you have at Barlinnie?—Two years.

908. At the end of two years are you able to trace the prisoners afterwards?—We very seldom know anything about them till they come back again.

909. You see it would be a very interesting thing to find out whether a man—a drunkard having committed some crime—is cured at the end of the two years, through being deprived of the drink?—Some men who have been in penal servitude have told me that it had not cured them. They might abstain for a little while when they got out, but they very soon went back.

The reason perhaps was that they came back to their James Taylor. old haunts and old companions.

910. Then do you think that the present short sentence plan is not a success, either as a deterrent or as a cure?—Well, I did not say that it is not a deterrent. A very large number of those who come in for the first time do not come back, and therefore I think it is a deterrent.

911. But in the case of the habitual inebriate?—It has no effect whatever on them.

912. Do you think a longer period is necessary?—I think so.

913. I think you decline to give any opinion as to what period is necessary to cure a man from drink by detention?—I cannot give any. Many prisoners who have been in prison for long periods for theft, assault, &c., tell me that the imprisonment did not cure them of their love for drink. I only know one outside case in point, that of a woman who was confined in a home for inebriates for twelve months, besides several shorter confinements, and who had a good husband and a nice family, and she was not cured by her seclusion, indeed, her last state was worse than her first.

914. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find convicts are habitual drunkards?—Some of them. Many of them, however, are given to drinking bouts.

915. But do they take so many bouts as to constitute them, by your own definition, habitual drunkards?—Some of them do. They drink when they have money; when they get a haul.

916. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Where do they get the money when they come out of prison? We had a case brought here to look at, who had just come out of prison this morning and was drunk already?—She may have brought a few pence in with her, and, of course, she would get that, or she might have got it by begging like that old man I spoke of, who went out of the poorhouse to beg for a bit of tobacco, and then he begged for money and got drunk, and came back to prison. [The witness then withdrew.]

BAILIE JOHN URE PRIMROSE, Glasgow, called in and examined.

John Ure Primrose.

917. (By the Chairman.) You are the senior magistrate of Glasgow?—I am.

918. In that capacity your attention has been called to the question with which this Committee has to deal?—From time to time more or less.

919. The first point of the subject is drunkenness, have you any suggestion to make?—On which aspect?

920. Well, in the first place, I may ask you as to the nature of the law. In England, there are prescribed, according to Act of Parliament, increasing penalties for recurring convictions: in Scotland I understand there is nothing of that sort?—There is nothing beyond the discretionary power the magistrate exercises himself.

921. As a matter of fact, one magistrate does not know what the other has done?—That is so.

922. Then do you think it is desirable that any change should be made in that so as to assimilate it to theory of the English law?—Yes: my own observation and my own desire would lead me in the direction.

923. Then there are a great number of people who, in spite of repeated convictions and imprisonment, appear to be quite incapable of giving up their drunken habits, and it has been proposed to deal with these people specially?—Yes.

924. The first practical question that arises is how would you define the habitual drunkard—the quasi criminal drunkard with whom it has been suggested we should deal—how would you discriminate between him and the ordinary casual drunkard?—I would speak of a man as being an habitual drunkard who, in addition to appearing before the Court a good many times in the year, may have, if the evidence led showed it, pawned articles of household furniture, or clothing of his family; that, in fact, the craving in him was so strong that he would stick at nothing in order to gratify his passion. I would discriminate between him and a man who might appear as often just because he got drunk on pay-day.

925. You would consider something more than the number of convictions?—That in my opinion would be no proper guide.

926. In addition you would take this other evidence of uncontrollable drink craving; but how many convictions in one year would you take?—If you are going to tabulate it exactly I might be satisfied in regard to some men after three convictions and other corroborative evidence, but to put a figure upon it I would say something like five. But let me carefully explain myself. Five convictions would not at all satisfy me as to a man being a habitual drunkard if it were merely excess on pay-days or the like, unless I had these other corroborative circumstances to which I have alluded.

927. Do you find, as a magistrate, that there are many men who are arrested for drunkenness on pay-days oftener than five times in the year?—Oh no; but I would like to make provision for such cases.

928. But, as I understand, you suggest that a certain number of convictions for drunkenness afford prima facie cause for inquiry, and that the police authorities, instead of dealing summarily with such cases, may remit them to the sheriff to be dealt with as habitual drunkards?—I should like that the magistrate should have a measure of discretionary power in that direction.

929. But the magistrate who disposes of the cases of ordinary drunkenness has often to do so in a rather summary fashion, and it has been objected that he would not have time to look into the cases of habitual drunkards, and that the proper way of dealing with them would be to remit them to the sheriff?—The can be no objections to such a course whatever, if desirable.

930. Do you see any advantage in that?—The advantage I see is that it would give an opportunity to the accused of producing fully, and before perhaps a more deliberative tribunal, all evidence that he ought not to be classified as an habitual drunkard. There would be a protection and safe-guard in that course.

931. Another suggestion has been made that the tribunal should be, not a sheriff, but two Justices of the Peace, as in the Inebriates Act; that I suppose would carry out the same principle?—It would.

932. Do you find that the sentences imposed by different police magistrates in Glasgow in cases of drunkenness vary very much?—They do; I might explain that a little more fully. A good many of them attempt to discriminate, and they may let a man off without any penalty who has only got tipsy from an accidental circumstance, such as pay-day, or meeting a friend. Others adhere rigidly to the 5s. or three days sentence for the same type of offence.

933. Have you much trouble in Glasgow with vagrants?—Speaking from my own experience, a good amount. I could not describe it as a class, but cases come up very frequently. I do not know what the statistics may show.

934. (By Dr. Sutherland.) There were 636 apprehended in the course of the year?—It is quite possible.

935. (By the Chairman.) These are chiefly for begging, I suppose?—Yes.

936. A suggestion has been made to us that of the beggars sent to prison, many are too old, and weakly, or imbecile, to be good subjects for imprisonment, and that it would be much better that they should be sent to the poorhouse?—I should say that exactly half of those that come before me are in that category.

937. There are certain powers, I understand, that the magistrates have in dealing with 'drunks'—which they do not appear to exercise—by which they may order them to find sureties for their good behaviour, or alternatively undergo a heavy sentence of imprisonment?—I believe such powers exist, but I have never exercised them or known of them being exercised.

938. There is no consultation among the magistrates, I suppose, as to any common lines of action; each man acts on his own discretion?—Entirely.

939. Is there any other point in connection with our inquiry you would like to speak upon? It has been proposed, as you are no doubt aware, that we should deal with habitual drunkards by recommending their reclamation to separate institutions; have you any ideas you would like to lay before us as to the incidence of the cost of such institutions?—I have not bent my mind to that, but I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind of the value of such a proposed course of treatment. We are accumulating evidence in institutions around us, and in our midst, where confinement, voluntary for the most part, I think, has been productive of immeasurable good, and really leading to reclamation and better lives.

940. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Of drunkards?—Worse than drunkards—prostitutes and drunkards.

941. (By the Chairman.) Are you connected with any of these reformatory institutions?—I am not, except that I go round as an entertainer, and, becoming interested in their work, hear of the result from those connected with it.

942. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) As regards locking up drunkards for any lengthened period, how would you convict them? Who would take the initiative? Would you expect the wife, or the children, or the family to do it?—As a rule I would not.

943. To whom then would you give the initiative? The police?—I think the police would require to be an important factor in it. I know of no other existing machinery that would fit in.

944. We had information given us this morning of a class of workmen who, while continuing to discharge all their responsibilities as bread-winners for their families, get abominably drunk every fortnight when they receive their pay, and make themselves a terror to their wives and children, and a nuisance to the neighbours in the stair, but who never come into the hands of the police?—There are many such cases I doubt not.

945. Do you think such cases could go on for any length of time without the men going down the hill farther and farther?—In my own experience I have known men who got drunk once a fortnight regularly, and in the employment of our firm we have one man who has done that for 20 years, and so far as his family are concerned he discharges all his duties, and is quite moral in regard to them. He is a good, steady workman, but as sure as he gets his pay he has a bout.

946. Would you lock up that man or send him to a Retreat?—I would not.

947. Although he may be a danger, and may some day commit a crime? It is possible that might occur.—In the particular case I have before my mind's eye just now, I don't think he would commit a crime. He fulfils all the other conditions you have indicated, but he never goes the length of actually bringing himself into trouble. I am not sure if he was once taken up.

948. Now as to those satisfactory cases you told us about, of the poor creatures who had been really reclaimed, have you any idea how long it took?—I know of some who have been years in the institutions. I have one particular instance I can cite where it was five years—a woman—and she was traced for five years after. From those directly at the head of that institution I have had letters placed in my hands from those they have reclaimed.

949. Then you believe in the possibility of reclaiming them?—I do undoubtedly.

950. What would be to your mind the minimum of detention that one should propose for cases like these?—You take me into ground where I could hardly speak with any degree of conviction or authority. Those most skilled in the treatment of such cases would be more qualified to express an opinion.

951. What is your feeling about children going to prison?—I avoid it in my practice as a magistrate. I would rather strain a point than send them there.

952. What is the youngest age you think that a juvenile should be allowed to go to prison?—From my own experience I would not like to send any child under 14 years of age to prison.

953. Last year there were 220 children sent to prison under that age; what would you do as an alternative?—I would send them to Industrial Homes wherever I could. In all cases coming before us, if the parents are living we get them to come, and if we think the case is a desirable one for such an institution, we try to persuade them of the expediency of its being done.

954. Or to Reformatories?—To Reformatories or Industrial Schools.

955. Do you think it would be a judicious thing in any new legislation to introduce a rule that no child under 14 should be sent to prison?—I would support that as an individual, my reason being that the prison brand being once put on seems to blight the whole life.

956. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Appropos of what you have said about the prison brand, one looking at the statistics on this subject must be very much struck by the immense predominance in Glasgow of the number of apprehensions per thousand of population for disorderly conduct, above that of any other part of Scotland?—It is a subject that has often exercised my mind, and I have tried to account for it in many ways, many of them satisfactory to myself.

957. What do you think is the explanation of it?—First, I would lay it to the greater activity of the police in Glasgow, and the running in for smaller offences. For instance, I have repeatedly seen men quarrelling on the streets in English towns, a policeman would come up to them, and, touching one on the back, would tell them to move on. In Glasgow two policemen would come up, and the one would seize the one man, and the other the other man, and march them off to the police office. In London I was so much struck with the way the police let them off that I remarked upon it to a policeman. 'Oh,' he replied, 'they ain't harming anyone, 'they are only harming themselves.' I cite that as a concrete instance of a state of things that exists. In Birmingham I have seen equally marked toleration as compared with our police here. There is another question. Very much smaller disturbance of the peace involves running in here as compared with all the large towns of England I have been in. To that extent I explain the difference between ourselves and a great many English towns. I have another theory, that is the beer drinking habits of England do not cause such fierce drunkenness.

958. But without going to England, take the Scottish towns where whisky is drunk, and, without going far, take Govan, which is a part of Glasgow to all intents and purposes, you get the apprehensions in Glasgow proper, 60 per thousand of population, and in Govan 28, not half?—Well, I happen to live in the near neighbourhood of Govan, and there the police have made themselves very much more a part of the community than our police have done, and I am bound to say, from observation, that they do more for tipsy men in the way of sending them to their own homes and getting them safely lodged, while in Glasgow such cases are invariably run in.

959. Then, as a magistrate, does it come within your knowledge that this system which you have explained, of greater activity on the part of the police, tends to the benefit of the community in any way?—I think it probably keeps the streets freer and pleasanter for the sober dweller.

960. Is the disorder discernible when you cross the border into Govan?—No, I could not say that it is so apparent that you could mark the transition. Govan is a very well governed town.

961. Paisley is not very far from this; is it a remarkably disorderly place?—No; I would not speak of it as such.

962. It seems to get along with one-third of the apprehensions in Glasgow?—Yes.

963. You do not observe in the streets more disorder?—I do not. I have been in all these towns at all hours of the day and evening.

964. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Are most of these small offences noted in the table on page 2 (f), Set III., the result of drink?—In most cases drink is associated with them, and the offences in most cases are the outcome of drink.

965. Do you think the increased activity of the police is good for the offender as warning him off dangerous ground, and acting as a deterrent for a first offender or one beginning?—For that class I think it is beneficial. Many of those who come before the Courts appear to think little of it, but, on the other hand, there are many on whom the first appearance before a magistrate makes a life long impression, and they never return.

966. Although the police activity may be efficient it has a good side?—Yes; but my opinion with regard to the slightly muddled with drink is that, if it were possible, they should be taken to their homes instead of to the Police Office. Many of the men brought to the Police Office are only in a drunken stupor, and they are not dangerous. As it is, they are only brought into the Police Office at the public expense, and boarded till they come before the magistrate.

967. The workman of whom you spoke as getting regularly drunk may not be disorderly so as to bring him under the supervision of the police?—From hilarious to outrageous, but not in the sense of using violence.

968. But in the case of the chronic domestic drunkards, in whose case you would not like to use family evidence, how would you get police evidence brought to bear upon them, and are they not often a most dangerous class to their families, and break up the family comfort?—In regard to them I would say police evidence was most necessary.

969. But if the police did not hear of them? I am speaking of the class that are not detected by officials—the class referred to by Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff—the workman who drinks regularly, but who does not outwardly show any symptom of disorderliness, but who may be all the while ruining himself and his family?—I did not contemplate police evidence covering such a case as that. He could only be reached by the testimony of reliable parties, either belonging to his family, or his neighbours.

970. You would not contemplate the police being put in motion by members of the family?—I did not contemplate that.

971. That appears a difficult though a necessary class of cases to deal with?—Yes.

972. (By Dr. Sutherland.) If a man became a nuisance to his neighbours, might not they initiate proceedings?—Yes.

973. And in any inquiry, do you not think full justice would be done to a drunken person, even though he or she did not come before the police, by the evidence of his family and neighbours, if such inquiry were conducted before two Justices?—Yes.

974. Are there not plenty of Justices of the Peace to conduct such inquiries?—Plenty; men of intelligence and ability for such duty.

975. You gave some reasons to account for the increase of the Glasgow statistics; is that increase in any way due to the special legislation of the Further Powers Bill?—Most undoubtedly.

976. It is a very stringent Act?—Yes.

977. Do you mean to say that Glasgow is governed by more stringent laws than any other towns in Scotland?—So far as I know, it is.

978. Is it the case that in Glasgow more sentences of 14 to 30 days have been inflicted for the last year or so than formerly?—I believe so.

979. Have the magistrates had any consultation in regard to the exercise of more uniformity?—Not that I am aware of.

980. You said you would not like to go beyond 14 days for a drunk; that is, you would not ask them to find caution or go to prison for 30 days; why do you decline to go to the full penalty of 30 days?—Because in most cases that would warrant anything more, there are other attendant incidents of drunkenness that give us power to inflict the necessary heavy punishment. For pure drunkenness the limit there affords you all the punishment required.

981. Do you think the country would support legislation giving any more than 14 days?—I do not. I think we have had repeated evidence that the country would not. I think it was attempted, but it met with no support whatever so far as I can recollect.

982. Where was that?—I cannot charge my memory with where it was.

983. Do you mean the Scottish Burgh Police Act?—Yes.

984. In regard to the workman who takes bouts of drinking frequently, it has been suggested that his money should be taken from him, and placed in the hands of his employer or a curator for the benefit of his wife and family, but he is not to be deprived of his liberty, would that meet the case of the workman you mentioned?—My firm have done it without legal authority.

985. (By the Chairman.) With what result?—Beneficial, no doubt. The family got the money which, otherwise, they would never have seen.

986. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think that a register of all 'drunks' should be kept in a city like Glasgow?—Yes; I think it would be highly desirable.

987. Now, in seeking to protect the victim of drinking habits, and preventing others becoming drunkards, could you suggest anything that could be done in regard to the publican and the pawbroker in this matter?—Of course, the provisions already on the Statute Book in the Public-houses Acts against the publican supplying any drunk man knowingly are very stringent, but I could wish that they were more effectually enforced. Whether there is a necessity for more stringent law on that matter I don't know. I think the existing powers are pretty ample as regards the publican.

988. Is it not within your knowledge that certain publicans, not of a high standing in the city, help to manufacture these drunkards?—Well, it is within my knowledge and observation that some give them faci-ties for getting drink in the way of giving them credit, and running up a score against them, and practically attaching them to the house. I know many houses who have a certain clientele attached to them through the facilities given them, and through the personal power the proprietor exercises over them.

989. Do you think any good would result from the names of men and women proclaimed hereafter as habitual drunkards being advertised and sent to publicans and pawnbrokers, and these persons forbidden in the one case to supply them with drink, and in the other to take their body clothing or bedding?—Most undoubtedly good would be done. ROBERT W. SINCLAIR, Secretary of the Glasgow Magdalene Institution, called in and examined.

Robert W.
Sinclair.

15 Nov. 1894.

990. (By the Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Glasgow Magdalene Institution?—Yes; and the Lochburn Home is one of our Homes.

991. What are your other Homes?—Our other Home is the Probationary Home at 17 Stirling Road.

992. Would you explain how you work your system?—The cases are received at the Probationary Home, as a rule upon their own application, and they receive instruction and probation there for some four or five weeks to test their character, and if their character is satisfactory during that time they are transferred to the permanent Home at Lochburn.

993. In the first place, tell us exactly what class of women you take in there?—Fallen women from the city and neighbourhood under 30 years of age.

994. Do many of them come to you?—They come to us as a rule of their own accord. Sometimes the magistrates send cases to us from the Police Courts coming before them for being found drunk or importing. We don't find these latter very satisfactory.

995. The magistrates send them to you as an alternative, telling them they may go to you or be sentenced?—If they are willing to reform they are sent to us.

996. These cases are kept five or six weeks to undergo probation and instruction—instruction in what?—In sewing, laundry work, and household duties.

997. And what does the probation consist in?—It is to test their character and their desire for well-doing.

998. How many women have you in this Probationary Home?—At present 54.

999. How many do you receive on an average?—In the year just closed at 31st October we received 219; the previous year the number was 214.

1000. That is to say you pass in about four a week?—Well, the months don't always tally.

1001. But it is the average?—Yes.

1002. If the months don't tally what season increases?—Usually about this season. The admissions begin to increase about the month of November, and continue till the month of May. Our admissions are not so large in the summer months.

1003. Can you tell us how many are sent to you by the magistrates?—I cannot give you the correct number, but I should say not more than 10 or 15 per cent.

1004. That would give you 20 or 30?—About that in the course of the year.

1005. Now, the other women that come to you; why do they come; what is generally the cause of their coming—ill health?—No, we do not take them in if they are ill. They require to be in good bodily health if we receive them. They come to us on account of want of work, and generally on account of their ill-doing, and their wish to reform.

1006. But you mentioned that there was a seasonal increase in the number that came to you?—I fancy the stress of weather and the want of work during the bad weather is the cause chiefly.

1007. You speak of the want of work, but I understand that most of these women are prostitutes: do they work?—Oh yes, many of them do.

1008. They are simply women who eke out their callings by prostitution?—Yes. Then I should mention that we have every year a number of rescued unfallen women.

1009. These are exclusive of the 200?—No; they are all included.

1010. Can you give us the numbers?—Yes; rescued from imminent danger, 32.

1011. These are girls who have come to town to no friends, and whom you take in?—Most of them.

1012. Do you keep them separate from the other women?—No.

1013. You let them all mix together?—They all work together.

1014. Now, we have got them through the Probationary Home, bring them to Lochburn, and tell us what you can about that institution. How many have you there?—We have 117 just now. They are kept there, and the time from their admission to the Probationary Home till they are ready to leave, is two years. We think we cannot do them much good in a shorter period than two years. The two principal departments of work there are laundry work and sewing. Fully three-fourths of the girls prefer laundry work.

1015. But you have got a much smaller number at Lochburn than in the Probationary Home?—No; the number at the Probationary Home was 54, and 117 at Lochburn.

1016. But you detain them at Lochburn for a longer period?—About two years.

1017. Then you take in all the women that pass through the Probationary Home into Lochburn?—They don't all go. We carry on laundry work at the Probationary Home. There are about 20 to 25 retained permanently there during the two years, till they are sent out to situations, or restored to their friends.

1018. Well, take the rescued cases: what do you do with them?—They are dealt with in the same way as the rest.

1019. But you don't think it necessary to keep them in for any length of time?—We do, because in nearly every instance we have got to learn them everything. It is usually six or nine months before they can do any work.

1020. Then do you consider it a desirable thing that virtuous girls who come to you for assistance should be kept for two years mingling with fallen women?—Our directors have had that matter before them once and again, and after very full inquiry we could not lay our hands on a single case that received injury by being in our Homes.

1021. You pass them into your Lochburn establishment and you keep them there for two years; do many of them leave you during that period?—A goodly number do. The number is given in our annual report. Last year the number either dismissed or leaving of their own accord was some 20 per cent. of the whole, and the year just closed is 15 per cent.

1022. I find in the report that for 1893 there were dismissed, absconded, and left, from the Stirling Road Home 25 per cent., and Lochburn Home, 24 per cent. What power have you for detaining them?—We have no power—entirely voluntary.

1023. Do you ever find the inmates recalcitrant?—No.

1024. What means have you for enforcing obedience?—Moral suasion. Then we have a system of premiums. After deducting a certain amount from the earnings for current expenses we give the girls 20 per cent. on the remainder, and our girls as a rule, have sums varying from £7 to £10 at their credit at the end of the two years.

1025. Do you clothe them?—Yes, and feed them. Then when they leave us their outfit is the first charge upon their premium. The cost of that ranges from £4, 10s. to £5, and of the remainder of the premium which may be £3, £4, or £5, we give them half at the end of 6 months if they continue in well-doing, and the remainder at the end of 12 months if they still continue in well-doing.

1026. If you have a girl of the class of domestic servant in your home, and at the end of the time she can have been clothed, fed, and find herself with £10 in her pocket, she is really better off than the average domestic servant?—She does not get the £10. A good outfit is first taken off, and then the remainder, which may be as high as £5, is divided into two parts, and she gets one half at the end of 6 months, and the other at the end of 12 months if she continues in well-doing.

1027. You spoke of the premium being about £10 at the end of the year?—No; at the end of two years.

1028. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Premium on the amount of work she has done?—Yes.

1029. (By the Chairman.) Have you any system of measuring that?—The general good conduct and industrious habits of the inmates. The superintendent and matrons allocate the premiums monthly, according to the industry and conduct of each girl.

1030. Could you give us any detail of the exact amount of money received by the inmates in your establishment into their own hands. I do not mean for all, but specimen cases?—They do not receive any money into their own hands while they are with us. They get no money until the end of six months after they leave, and then only if they continue in well-doing.

1031. About the girls at Lochburn? I wish to find out what inducement they have to remain in a place where you have no powers to compel them to remain, and how the thing is worked, because it is a difficult problem to get people detained in a place where there is no compulsion, and I wish to understand it?—Well, I suppose the general answer to that question is the desire for improvement and well-doing on the part of the girls. The place also is made attractive and cheerful, and the work is not burdensome.

1032. We will take a girl at Lochburn; can you give us an idea what cash at the end of six months she would get into her hands?—The girl ought to have about 5s a month, and at the end of six months she would have £1, 10s. at her credit in the premium book. Robert W Sinclair.

1033. If she wanted some money to herself you would not give it to her?—Certainly not.

1034. At the end of a year she might have some more money at her credit, and again you would not give it to her?—Certainly not.

1035. And if she were guilty of any infraction of the rules you would fine her?—For any grave offence we would take a month's premium off.

1036. We will take her out to the 18 months. She would then have still more premiums unless she had forfeited them, and you would still not give her any money?—No.

1037. At the end of two years she would be ready to go, and then you would give her the cash?—No, we would give her an outfit which would absorb about half or three-fourths of the premium. We pay any expenses she may have in going to the situation which we find for her, and at the end of six months, if we find the girl has continued in well-doing, she receives half of the remainder of the premium standing at her credit.

1038. Which would vary very much?—It might vary from £2 up to £5.

1039. The girls who come to you for rescue are not necessarily ignorant girls and requiring to be instructed?—The great majority of them are.

1040. Is there any machinery in Glasgow for dealing with cases, such as excited attention in London, of country girls lured, it may be, by promise of some false situation, servants—respectable girls and in every way excellent characters—lured into a strange place, or coming to a strange place and finding themselves friendless and deceived?—Does your rescue work extend to cases of that sort?—We frequently do take charge of such.

1041. Do you retain them or do you merely help them on?—We sometimes do the one and sometimes the other. Where it is thought desirable, we send them to their friends, or help them otherwise. In regard to some cases we find that that would not be desirable, hence we take them into the Homes.

1042. And if these are still girls would you still run them through the mill of these two years?—It depends very much on their progress. Two years is the nominal time. From long experience we found that we could not be really in a position to recommend a girl for domestic service till after two years' training.

1043. Well, the majority of your inmates are reformed prostitutes?—Yes.

1044. A large number of them have been addicted to drink?—A considerable number.

1045. A number of them have been very drunken cases?—Yes.

1046. Do you find any difficulty in restraining them when they are with you?—Well, some of them do get impatient, and of course we have no power to detain them, and they leave us.

1047. But they are less than 24 per cent. apparently from your figures?—Yes. About 60 per cent. of the cases admitted are more or less addicted to drink.

1048. Well, we won't take the less; what do you say about the more?—Well, of those under 20 years of age not more than 18 per cent. are addicted to drink.

1049. What number of your inmates are above 20 years of age?—About half.

1050. Have you got the age per centages?—I have here those above 20 years of age. Of those who are admitted above 25, about 70 per cent. have been addicted to drink.

1051. Any of them notoriously bad cases?—Some very bad cases.

1052. Who have been in the hands of the police for drunkenness?—Yes, and perhaps 10 or 15 times in prison.

1053. Have you difficulty in keeping them for two years?—Well, I could not say that we have no difficulty, but we manage it in most of the cases.

1054. How do you manage it, for that is exactly what we are trying to get at?—As you know we have no compulsory power, and it must be all by moral suasion and making the place as attractive and cheerful as possible, by kindly treatment also, and giving them plenty of work to do.

15 Nov. 1894.

Sinclair.

15 Nov. 1894.

1055. But many of them won't consider that an attraction?—Well, they take a liking to it; they get attracted to it.

1056. Do they understand their own rights when they are in?—Oh yes.

1057. Do they sign any engagement to stay?—No; it is entirely voluntary.

1058. Could you find out a few of the cases of women who had been repeatedly convicted for drunkenness, and who had been notorious drunkards, who have been with you a good long time?—I have several cases in my mind just now.

1059. Have you traced any of these habitual drunkards after they have left you?—Yes.

1060. With what results?—I could give you the names of some of those whom we have ascertained to have continued in well-doing and abstained from drink.

1061. Have you any suggestions on the subject?—No.

1062. You have got no analysis?—No: only private inquiry. We do not put them into the report; it would not do.

1063. But an analysis would not lead to any identification. You have no analysis, however, showing that?—No, I was going to mention that few of the girls go astray through strong drink under twenty years of age, but of those who go astray above twenty years of age, something like 25 per cent. of the cases that come to us have gone astray through the use of strong drink.

1064. I see you work the Stirling Road and Lochburn Homes at a very considerable profit?—There is a slight profit.

1065. The laundry work brings you £5015 a year—88 per cent. of the total expenditure?—Yes. I was going to mention on that point that in our Homes the girls' earnings pay fully three-fourths of the expenditure of the Institution. The work receipts were last year over £5000. This year they have been a little under, and we require about £1000 in donations and subscriptions.

1066-67. How are the Homes managed?—By a Committee of directors.

1068. Elected by the subscribers?—Oh, surely. We have our annual meeting in the month of December when the office bearers and directors are elected.

1069. What staff have you?—Two matrons, 14 lady superintendents, 2 vanmen, an engineman, and secretary. There is one matron in each Home. At Stirling Road we have a matron and 3 assistants, and at Lochburn a matron and 11 superintendents.

1070. Your primary object is to rescue girls from the streets, and I suppose you look more to their moral reclamation than to the work of curing the drunken habit?—We make that the principal object of the institution. The moral well-being of the girls is considered above all other considerations.

1071. Is there anything sectarian in your institution?—No; nothing whatever. We have a number of Roman Catholic girls in the institution.

1072. I suppose you have some religious agency working along with you?—The directors of our institution conduct services every Sunday forenoon in each of the Homes. They take the services in turn, then there are ladies and gentlemen who conduct services in the Probationary Home on Sunday evenings, and I have my own bible class at Lochburn on Sundays.

1073. What about the Roman Catholics?—We never ask them any questions, and they never ask us any.

1074. What do the priests say?—I have no information; we have never had any trouble.

1075. The inmates of all creeds participate in these services?—Yes.

1076. I suppose you have, in addition to that, clergymen visiting?—No; except that we may have a clergyman sometimes at special services. We give two treats to the girls in the year—one at the New Year, and the other in mid-summer, and we have clergymen at these meetings.

1077. What dietary have you; what does it cost per inmate per day?—The cost last year was £10, 1s., or 3s. 10½d. per week each inmate.

1078. Have you any alcoholic or malt liquors in your institution?—No.

1079. And do you attribute the success, which you claim in the reclamation of habitual drunkards, to the total deprivation of liquor?—Very much.

1080. Have you any medical man connected with your institution?—Yes; Dr. James Gray, Newton Terrace, has been coming to the institution for the last 35 years. He and his son are our medical officers.

1081. Have you any cases of delirium tremens coming on after admission?—No.

1082. In Stirling Road?—Well, occasionally a girl has to keep her bed for two or three days after admission, but that is a very rare case.

1083. In connection with the class of girls with whom you deal there will be a number of cases of disease; is there no special provision for dealing with that?—They are sent to the Lock Hospital.

1084. Who sees them?—Dr. Gray sees the girls before they are formally admitted. It is a rule of the institution not to take any girl who is not in good bodily health.

1085. And do you take their declaration for it that they are in good bodily health?—No; Dr. Gray sees them. We have his statement as to the health of each.

1086. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I suppose Dr. Gray simply arrives at the conclusion that they are free from disease, by simply putting a question to them—he submits them to no examination of a private character?—I do not think so.

1087. You stated to the chairman that the reformation of the individual was the first factor in your institution? Then do you consider the teaching of habits of industry the second?—Yes.

1088. You stated that a great number came in who could do nothing, and that these go out with a perfect knowledge of laundry work; do you classify them at all?—In the department of work?

1089. Either in the working department or in the dormitories?—Well, the matron classifies them to some extent, but I don't know that I could give you any detail.

1090. You have stated to the chairman that the inmates all mix together, and that you never found any bad effects, might not the classification of the women both in the work-rooms and in the dormitories account for that?—We have no means of separating them.

1091. But you have separate dormitories?—Large dormitories.

1092. But you would classify them as far as possible in these?—Yes; everything is done to improve them morally.

1093. You consider the temperament of the inmates to some extent, do you not?—Yes.

1094. What allowances do you make for these girls in the matter of liberty, and of seeing and writing to their friends?—We do not allow them to go out at all, but they are not only allowed to write their friends, but encouraged to do so.

1095. Except in your own grounds?—That is all.

1096. Are they extensive?—Yes; pretty extensive, a large playground.

1097. Then, after they have put in 18 months, or 2 years, do you suddenly let them loose on the world?—We find them situations, or restore them to their friends.

1098. The necessity does not exist for gradually restoring them to the outer world, by allowing them out now and again before their term of 18 months or 2 years is up?—No; it would destroy the good management of the institution, if girls were allowed to go out and come back again. We have had a specimen of that in Glasgow already, and it had to be abolished.

15 Nov. 1894.

1099. I think you said the amount of public subscriptions was something between £700 and £1000; is that entire deficit?—Yea.

1100. Have you any difficulty in getting that money?—No.

1101. Is it not the case that the Homes are made attractive by entertainments and that sort of thing?—Well, in the winter time we have what we call recreation evenings. A number of the directors and others, both ladies and gentlemen, take part in a weekly entertainment during the winter months.

1102. Do the inmates take part in the entertainments?—They occasionally do. We have a teacher of music who teaches them sacred and other pieces.

1103. I suppose dancing is not permitted?—No.

1104. You know it is permitted in lunatic asylums? But it is different in our case.

1105. I suppose the female officers you have are of a good class of women?—They must be, otherwise they would be of no use.

1106. Do they stay long with you?—Yea.

1107. You have not frequent changes?—As a rule they stay with us until they become unfit for work and are superannuated.

1108. (By the Chairman.) You have left upon my mind not quite a clear impression as to what you do in the Probationary Home. From that Home I see you sent to domestic service or other situations 16; these, I presume, would be the virtuous girls?—No; these are the permanent cases retained in the Probationary Home. About 25 of the inmates are kept there permanently and do the work there.

1109. Then 'Dismissed as unsuitable'?—That is when they may be medically unsuitable, or being above the age at which we admit, or perhaps bad health.

1110. Take your analysis in your report here of the inmates of the Probationary Home. You have 'transferred to Lockburn,' so many; 'restored to friends and sent to domestic service,' so many. These you have explained. Then you have, 'to poorhouse, 4'; 'to kindred institutions, 2'; 'to hospitals, 14'; 'dismissed as unsuitable, 6'; and 'left voluntarily after a short stay, 41.' What I asked you was what these are, classed as 'dismissed'?—These are dismissed for insubordination or perhaps the state of their health.

1111. Then you would expect to have more insubordination in the Probationary Home than in Lockburn, where I find there were only two dismissed, 23 left on their own accord and three absconded: what is the difference?—The absconded are those who go over the wall.

1112. Why do they go over the wall: they are at liberty to go: why did these three go over the wall?—That is a matter of surprise to ourselves.

1113. Have you often people who abscond?—No; very seldom. One of these girls had some £7 at her credit. She had been with us 20 months, and yet she went over the wall with another girl. There is no accounting for these things.

1114. (By Miss Stevenson.) I see in your report the number of admissions for the year is 215; it does not read 215 individuals: that does not account for readmissions?—We have no readmissions.

1115. If a woman goes out do you readmit her?—Not as a rule.

1116. If she leaves the institution you won't admit her a second time?—If she leaves of her own accord or wilfully, without the consent of the directors we do not readmit.

1117. I am surprised in reference to the classification that you don't find there are any evil results from introducing, among women of notoriously bad character, girls who are of good character?—I have given you my experience of 34 years.

1118. Have you among your inmates any who are mothers; there for a first fault?—We have occasionally.

1119. How do you deal with them—in the same way as those who have been habitually on the streets?—Yea; they are all under the same arrangement.

1120. What becomes of their children?—In some cases their children are provided for by the Parochial Board.

1121. They are separated from them?—Yea.

1122. They have no responsibility?—No: separated at their own wish.

1123. Do the directors ever take any means to ascertain the parentage of these children so as to make the father responsible?—We have had one or two cases of that kind, but they were so surrounded with difficulties that we had to give the thing up.

1124. Then you say that in some cases the women are not in sufficiently good health to be sent into the Home, and they are sent to the hospital: do they come back to you after being treated in the hospital?—The majority of the cases sent from our Home to the hospital do come back to us.

1125. What proportion of those who have been in the Homes turn out satisfactory?—About 70 per cent. of our inmates, who have taken full advantage of the training of the Homes, turn out satisfactory.

1126. For how long do you take supervision over them, or do you follow their cases after they leave the Homes?—Well, our inquiries sometimes extend over five or six years.

1127. As regards those who might be called inebriates, you stated that you very seldom find that a woman under 20 owed her fall to intemperance: in the case of those older—those about 24 or 25—do you mean to imply that their first fall had been due to that?—Yea: from drink. Of course, we have no means to verify the statement beyond their own word.

1128. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have got a system established with these two Homes; has it any connection with the somewhat similar association which has the Hill Street and Whitevale Shelters?—No.

1129. Are you carrying on identical work?—The same kind of work, but with this difference, that they profess to deal, I believe, almost exclusively with discharged prisoners.

1130. Have you any association with the prison establishment?—No.

1131. In what way does the knowledge of your instruction reach the people for whom you intend it?—We circulate leaflets through the city mission.

1132. Is that the only way?—That is the only way.

1133. Do the city missionaries visit the class that you lay yourselves out to receive?—They give the leaflets to the women when they meet them in the street, or if they see them in houses where they may be visiting.

1134. So that it has a somewhat religious element in its inception?—Yea; the inception is a religious one.

1135. Now, as to the age and the class of persons that you reach; have you any information as to the average age?—Yea; a statement is given in our report.

1136. Am I right in supposing that the great proportion of the women who come to you voluntarily are moderately aged?—Well no.

1137. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You state they are all under 30?—Not above 30.

1138. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I see there are 73 of the 215 above 24 years of age?—Yea.

1139. Well, what I am driving at is, that as far as my knowledge of these institutions goes, it is that a young woman will not readily go to them. She only goes after she has found that life has got to be pretty hard for her, and probably her best days are past, I mean physically?—Well, we had according to our statistics last year, 63 under 18 years of age in the total 215, and 77 under 24, that is, between 18 and 24. That is 140 who were under 24, so that a large majority of our cases are under 24 years of age.

1140. Do you find the majority to be in the full bloom of health or the reverse?—In the number of applicants there are a good many who are in bad health.

1141. Weakly?—Yea.

1142. Then as to the number who dislike to remain the full time, can you, in regard to age and physical condition, separate them? Are those who leave you prematurely a physically superior class?—No.

1143. You find that the weakly ones leave you as readily as the others?—Yea.

Robert W.

Robert W.

15 Nov. 1894.

1144. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the number of those under 24 years of age do you include those what you might call preventive cases?—Yes.

1145. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) Do the missionaries who distribute these notices send you applicants?—They do, but the great majority of the cases come of their own accord.

1146. (By Dr. Furquharson.) Do I understand you to say that these women are medically examined when they enter your Home?—They are seen by a doctor.

1147. But does he make examination to see whether they are suffering from disease or not?—I cannot definitely answer that question. He certifies to the committee as to the state of health of the applicant, and that enables the committee to dispose of the case as they think best.

1148. Is it not the case that that class of women generally try to conceal their disease?—I believe that is the case.

1149. And if they decline to be examined you have no compulsory power to compel them?—No; but we have never had any difficulty on that score.

1150. Perhaps they have come for the purpose of getting medical treatment?—Perhaps.

1151. Your admissions to your Home are purely voluntary?—Yes.

1152. What power is there to send to any institution a woman who is making herself a nuisance in the street by solicitation? Can they send her to your institution the same as a child to a reformatory?—No; and that is a point I would like to call your attention to. The magistrates, as already stated, send us cases, and perhaps before the constable who brings them is a 100 yards away from the door they want to get out. They promise anything to get out of the magistrates' hands: and what we want is compulsory power to retain these girls.

1153. On the analogy of boys sent to a reformatory, who are not criminals, but whom you want to detain?—Yes.

1154. Do the police take any part in the reformation of these women by telling them on the streets that they may have an opportunity of going to your Homes?—Many of them do.

1155. You have to be directed specially to those who are on the border line of vice?—Yes. The police have often brought us cases of that kind.

1156. Have you any difficulty in getting places for them?—No; as a rule we have more applications than we can supply: our girls usually turn out very satisfactorily.

1157. Have you any relapses?—Very few. I have stated that about 70 per cent. of our cases are permanently recovered.

1158. Then, one question about the influence of drink. You don't attach much importance, I think, to drink in the primary fall of the woman; do you attach much importance to it in keeping her in her unfortunate position?—Yes; we believe the one reacts upon the other. We think there would be very little prostitution were it not for strong drink.

1159. You think they would come more readily under good influences were it not for the drink?—Yes.

1160. Do you find these women make any attempts to get drink from the outside when they are in the Homes?—They have no opportunity or means for that.

1161. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Are your Homes always full?—As a rule.

1162. You admit no one above the age of 30: what is the reason of that rule? Is it simply because it is beyond your financial power or your area of house-room?—Well, we think that we cannot do a depraved woman after 30 years of age any good. We admit, sometimes cases up to 35, but that is the exception.

1163. Has that been the rule of your institution since the beginning in 1859?—In the original rules of the institution, the limit of admission was 25, but we found a very considerable number of cases applying above that age, and the directors having considered the matter, thought it would be well to extend the age to 30.

1164. Have you any evidence as regards the hopelessness of trying to take in unfortunate women older than that?—We do feel that there is very little hope.

1165. Of these young women, are there many of them poor girls who have gone astray only once or twice, or have they been regularly on the street a long time?—They come to us generally pretty early—after a few months wild living.

1166. And you think that the wild living is due chiefly to drink, and not simply to poverty?—It is very often due to intemperate parents; not so much due to acquired habits of the girls themselves.

1167. Do you mean that the girls acquire the habit from their parents hereditarily?—They do.

1168. We have had some melancholy instances of wretched women brought to us who oscillate between the poorhouse and the prison, very degraded and miserable creatures, would you take such cases?—If they were willing to reform.

1169. And have you such a case as that?—Yes; we have several such cases.

1170. Can you trace such cases, and show that there have been really recoveries among them?—Yes; certainly not the rule, but a good many exceptions. Some who had been very far gone have been permanently reclaimed.

1171. I notice you have no ladies in your committee?—No.

1172. Do you not allow ladies on it?—Yes, we allow them. We had a Ladies' Auxiliary for many years, but they dropped out, and the work seems to be going on. Our superintendents seem to prefer a gentlemen's committee to a ladies' committee.

1173. Your women don't go to Church?—No; the necessary services are provided in the Homes.

1174. And you say you never have any trouble with the Roman Catholic question?—No.

1175. Among your lady visitors are there any Roman Catholics?—No.

1176. And do the priests never wish to come in?—No; the Rev. Father Cameron of Maryhill, has visited the Home several times, but we have never had any trouble.

1177. A great many of the girls seem to be Irish?—A good many; something, I think, like 23 last year, and there were 17 from England.

1178. I see the earnings are £5015—that amounts roughly to about £20 earned by each inmate?—Yes.

1179. Besides that there is the premium you give, about £10?—Well, that is the highest: I said from £7 to £10 for the two years.

1180. So that the girl's labour has been worth from £23 to £25 in the year?—Yes, about that.

1181. (By Miss Stevenson.) You say you had an auxiliary committee, but the ladies dropped off; what responsibility had they in the management of the Homes?—They visited the Homes during the week, and read with the girls, but not as a committee.

1182. They had no jurisdiction? Do you not think that is very likely the reason why they lost interest in it, when they had nothing to do with the administration or direction?—Well, several of the ladies who were originally on the committee died out, and others were not ready to take their place.

1183. Don't you think it would be of value to the Homes, if ladies were associated with the directors in their administration?—Well, I am scarcely in a position to answer that question. There seems to be a diversity of opinion on the subject.

1184. (By the Chairman.) You say that you would like to have compulsory power to detain girls sent to you by the magistrates; would that not involve the necessity for inspection?—Well.

1185. And you are willing to submit to it?—Surely.

1186. There are many people who think that in a place where there is power of detention, there is a liability of people being detained against their will?—Yes.

1187. Would your directors, or yourself, or your officers, have any objection to inspection, even on your

Robert W.
Sinclair.

15 Nov. 1894.

voluntary basis?—I do not see that there could be any objection. All our work is carried on in the most open way possible.

1188. But other institutions of the sort might not be equally well-conducted, and that is why I asked the question?—Well, I do not see any objection.

1189. When a girl comes to you she may have some money. Do you never have a girl coming say with five shillings in her possession?—I am not aware of any such cases. If there are the matron takes care of it.

1190. They don't give it up; at all events you don't get the money?—No.

1191. You are not aware of any case where a sum of money has been handed up?—I can quite understand a case of the matron retaining the money till the girl goes out. But it is quite exceptional when they have money.

1192. But you would not have her have control of the money herself?—No.

1193. What test have you for the age if you draw a pretty hard and fast line at 30?—We can only take their own statement; we have no other means of knowing.

1194. So that if a woman wished to enter she would give her age as less?—Perhaps.

1195. The cases the magistrates have to deal with will very frequently be over 30: do they send them to you?—No; they are usually young cases the magistrates send to us. The magistrates are quite in sympathy with our work, and, as a rule, they understand the cases that will be suitable for our Homes.

1196. You carry on a large industry in connection with laundry work; have any complaints been raised against the system on the ground of its interfering with private laundries?—No. Our price list is the same as that of the Associated Laundrymen of the West of Scotland. We charge as high as any other first-class establishment in the West of Scotland.

1197. Yes; but the workers in these laundries might complain. In fact associated trades do complain, in the case of prison labour, against prison competition with honest labour; and what I wanted to know is whether you have had any complaints?—No; we never have had.

1198. Are the laundresses in Glasgow an associated body?—No.

1199. Is there no association?—There is the Association of Laundrymen.

1200. Employers?—Yes.

1201. But no association of employees?—No. I might mention that several public laundries apply to us for assistants, and we send them girls who have been trained with us.

1202. There is a large Roman Catholic institution in Glasgow with similar objects to yours?—Yes; Dalbeth, in the east end of the city.

1203. You have no interchange of girls?—No. We send to the Roman Catholic institution girls who profess to be Roman Catholics before admission. Before their admission the matron suggests to them the propriety of going to Dalbeth. We make them fully aware that ours is a Protestant institution, and, in the face of that, we don't find many of them ready to go to Dalbeth.

1204. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You were saying the girls never or seldom came with money?—That is so.

1205. One knows that these poor girls, if they have money, all dress smartly: I suppose that is not the class you come across—the well-dressed, smart girl?—When they are stripped of their outward decoration they are very poor creatures; but the great bulk of them just come to us because they have no money.

1206. You do not find them coming to you in their days of prosperity?—No.

1207. You mention in your report that a good many went home to their friends; are these satisfactory cases? Do you find their friends anxious to get them back?—We never recommend them to go to their friends until after we have made inquiry. In many cases it would be very injudicious to send them back to their friends.

1208. I suppose you often find they are very untruthful?—Yes.

1209. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What means do you take of informing yourselves of the future career of these girls, as to whether they lapse or go on doing right?—The matron corresponds with most of our girls, in fact, with nearly all of them after they leave us, and very extensive correspondence is kept up for years after they leave.

1210. You won't be likely to hear of those that fall back?—Yes; unfortunately we do hear of them.

1211. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In speaking of the physical weakness of the majority of those who come in, I presume you refer to the temporary physical incapacity resulting from drink, not organic disease?—The great majority of the cases are through drink, but there are some exceptions.

1212. (By the Chairman.) Have you any other point you wish to state?—Well, there is one point, about the short term of imprisonment that is given to many of the girls. They are sent to prison for eight or ten days or a fortnight, and when their health is somewhat improved they just go back again. We find the short term of imprisonment a great mistake. It does a great deal of harm and no good. We have had cases who have been in prison several times, and we find that the short term does no good. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mrs A. A. FERGUSSON, President of the Ladies' Committee of the Glasgow Houses of Shelter, called in and examined.

Mrs A. A. Fergusson.

1213. (By the Chairman.) You are President of the Ladies' Committee of the Glasgow Houses of Shelter; have you been long in that position?—I was for 20 years secretary. I had to give up two years ago and another secretary was appointed. Before that we had no president, but I was made president then.

1214. Would you describe to the Committee the scope of these Houses of Shelter?—The House of Shelter in Hill Street was instituted in 1850. Its object is to provide a home for females, who, on their liberation from prison, are desirous to reform and to support themselves by honest industry. The average number of inmates in the 'Shelter' during the past year was 50. They are employed in needlework, the institution receiving the proceeds of their labour, in return for which the inmates are lodged, fed, and clothed. In addition to this, a suitable outfit is given to those who remain a full year, and go out with the approval of the committee. The inmates of the 'Shelter' are all lodged in the House, and are not allowed out except with special permission. The inmates are made really very comfortable and very happy, and the results are very good.

1215. Then the other Shelter—the Mission Shelter—is in Whitevale Street?—Yes. The Mission Shelter was established in 1878 to provide for wage earning women, many of them with children, who could be taken in for a shorter period. We began there by giving the women wages as they do in the Dublin Refuge. They also I think get wages in another—Mrs. Meredith's I think. After working this Shelter for over 15 years on the plan of the shorter period we found that it would be better to make our inmates stay a year, and so we are trying the same system as in the Hill Street Shelter.

1216. Then, I understand, that in Hill Street you have solely females dismissed from prison, and in Whitevale Street you have an admixture of outsiders?—Not many: they come from the prison chiefly. Of course in our Whitevale Mission they have all been in prison, but they may not come direct from it to us.

1217. Where do you get hold of them?—We have a Bible-woman at the prison gate, and a room opposite the prison in Burnside Lane where we give them breakfast. Our report for the past year shows we gave over 5000 breakfasts. The Bible-woman talks with them, and, when they will go, takes them to our Homes, and the Probationary Home, and other similar institutions.

Mrs A. A.

1218. In Stirling Road are there many females from prison?—Oh yes; I should say that there is a class of our women in prison, no matter what they are, that go to different institutions, but I must say our two Shelters are for prisoners.

1219. Do you work in conjunction with the Prison Authorities?—Yes: Miss Miller, matron in Glasgow Prison, is one of our Ladies' Committee.

1220. I understand that they have some system under which a certain proportion of a prisoner's earnings is reserved and given to the prisoner through you?—There is a Bible-woman who does that through the Prison Aid Society.

1221. But not through yours?—No; we get nothing at all.

1222. Then you keep these women in your Homes for a year, and during that time, I suppose, they get no money?—No.

1223. Do you credit them with any earnings they may make?—No wages are given them. They get a good outfit, and that costs £2, 17s. 9d. usually.

1224. What do they earn?—Last year in the Hill Street Shelter they earned £360, and in Whitevale £1326, for laundry work.

1225. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Including lodgings £206, and clothing £83, the total earnings in Whitevale are £1616?—If you add these altogether the total is £1616.

1226. (By the Chairman.) Do you find the labour of these women so productive as to enable your institution to be practically self-supporting?—No.

1227. You require how much in subscriptions?—We would require £700 a year of subscriptions just now. They have, however, fallen off to about £500, and we are making an effort to raise the other £200. Our treasurer, Mr. Church, says that with £700 we could go on as we are doing.

1228. Why do you work two Homes instead of consolidating them?—Because I do not approve myself of large Homes.

1229. But does it not cause duplication of staff and extra expense?—We work ours very economically.

1230. I suppose a very large number of your inmates are prostitutes who have been addicted to drink?—I should say half nearly.

1231. Many of them to such an extent as to come under the category of habitual drunkards?—Not the first convictions.

1232. But you don't confine yourselves to first convictions?—No; but they are all the best cases. The matron of the prison usually sends us first convictions.

1233. But I suppose you don't confine yourselves to first offences?—Oh no; if they say they are from prison we must take them.

1234. Have you any statistical statement of the number of imprisonments undergone by any of your inmates during the last year?—I have it in a note-book here.

1235. Generally, have you many women who have been five, or six, or ten times in prison?—Not in Hill Street Shelter; we have them there who have been three times in prison. In Whitevale Mission they have been very often in prison.

1236. And very often for offences connected with drunkenness?—Nearly always.

1237. You keep them in these Homes; what exercise do they get?—Have you grounds round the Home?—That is what I think we are rather badly off for. In Hill Street we have just a little square place, and they walk there during the day at meal times.

1238. And in Whitevale?—We have more room there, as we wash there, and we have a bleaching-ground.

1239. During the time they are with you are they allowed out at all?—After six months in Hill Street they get to church. Anyone who wishes can get, but many of them do not care to go. They can also, after six months, get out to see their friends if they can be trusted. Mrs A. Fergusson. 15 Nov. 1894.

1240. It is precisely the women who would not be trusted who would probably wish to get out?—After being in that time you have a very good idea. Their friends also come to see them.

1241. How do you keep them from going out?—We cannot keep them because they can go over the wall. The wall is quite low. Perhaps one in a year goes over the wall.

1242. But what necessity is there for them going over the wall?—Because the door is locked, but, of course, we all like freedom.

1243. Suppose a woman came to you and said I want to get out?—Oh well, we have nothing to keep her. We try to put her off the notion, but they can go if they choose.

1244. Now, you have a certain number who are dismissed: I suppose that is for insubordination?—Yes.

1245. When one of your inmates is dismissed or absconds she very probably turns up in the hands of the police again?—I have known cases where they were sent back to prison the very same day they left.

1246. Would you receive them?—Well no; we are very chary in Hill Street. We have 50 inmates working there at three tables, and you can imagine what a commotion it would make in the workroom to bring one back. We do not take them back if we can help it.

1247. Have you many young prisoners?—Yes; from 18 to 20 years of age, and there is one in just now of 16. The youngest we ever had was 15.

1248. What was she in for?—I can't remember.

1249. Have you many young prisoners like that?—No, very few. I should say that 17 and 18 are the youngest we usually have.

1250. And their offences?—Well, some of them are for drink, some running away from home. I admitted two yesterday of the latter. One ran away from Bo'ness and came to Glasgow during the Fair, and, landing in prison, came to us.

1251. For disorderly conduct?—Yes, I think so.

1252. You find, however, practically no difficulty in keeping the women there for 12 months?—No.

1253. What do you do with them afterwards?—We try to get situations for the younger women as servants, and for the others as dressmakers, or in mills and other places.

1254. You don't give them any training for domestic service?—No, except that the whole of the work of the House is done by the women. We employ no outside labour. There is the cooking, there are washers and scrubbers, and the doorwoman, and then there is one trusted woman who goes out the messages and collects the money for the washing.

1255. Are the trusted women ex-prisoners?—Yes.

1256. I suppose you keep them longer than a year?—Well, we try. The cook and the gatewoman get a little wage.

1257. Who collects for your washing?—One of the prisoners; one of the trusted women, and I never knew them to run away with the money.

1258. Have you many of them, or do you stick to the one?—Of late we have had seven. Some time ago we had one old woman for ten years. She died with us.

1259. But you would not turn one of these off at the end of the year?—Well, they are all anxious to go out if they can get situations.

1260. But you must pay these women who go about on this work of trust?—They get a little. The cook gets £3 a year, and the others get about the same. We are not a wealthy institution.

1261. I suppose these women who collect the washing accounts must have often a considerable sum of money?—They have, but they never go wrong with it.

1262. Could you charge your mind, say during the last five years, with how many of the prisoners you have employed on that work of collecting the washing accounts?—It is always one woman.

1263. But then you have to change her?—Well, I should say there would be five women, but I can't say definitely as I was abroad, and do not know for some 18 months.

1264. You told us that the women are sent out partly to domestic service, partly to mills, shops, and so forth. Do you trace them up afterwards?—At one time we engaged two of our ladies to do that, especially where they were servants; but we found it did not answer. The women did not like it. Our best cases often were those who endeavoured to disown connection with us, and now we do not make any attempt to trace them. But some of the better cases come back to us, and ask us to bank their money, and to see the matron.

1265. To bank their money with you?—They have a little book, and they bring their savings—a good many of them come with their money to our matron and leave it; and she puts it into the bank.

1266. Do you happen to know of any case in which the money banked came to a considerable amount?—No, I do not know; but I will try to get the information from Mrs. Murray. I shall send a few specimens of their bank accounts, if you wish them.

1267. Is there any other point on which you would like to speak? You do not consider that you want any powers of compulsory detention?—No, we have never found them running away much from us.

1268. But your door is locked?—Yes, it is locked; but, as I said before, the wall is low.

1269. Do they ever come and ask you to get out?—Oh yes; when 15 left voluntarily last year.

1270. And you cannot refuse any one?—No; we cannot, it is voluntary. There is more good done if it is voluntary, for the woman coming to us in that way really wish to do well.

1271. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreif.) Do you take any woman who come to you?—Yes, from prison.

1272. Even old offenders?—Yes, we do not turn away any prisoners.

1273. That is within the limits of your house being full?—If a prisoner comes above 50, we make up the sick-room into a bed-room, where we can put three beds. We have 51 to-day.

1274. But there must be room for far more than 50 in Glasgow?—We have 50 in one Home and 70 in another.

1275. Among these are there married women often?—Oh yes; a great many. How many have been returned to their homes? Twelve I think, from Hill Street Home. Their husbands often come to us and take them home again.

1276. Do you take children into the Home with the women?—No.

1277. But there are occasionally women with babies who come out of prison?—Yes, if the little babies are born there. They come out about six weeks or two months old, they do not come to us. We have no accommodation for children.

1278. In the Hill Street place you only have sewing work?—Yes: only four of our women wash. We have no room for more washing. It is an old fashioned self-contained house. We find that it is better to have both sewing and washing for the women. Sewing seems to refine the women more, and we find that after a year's sewing the results are better than after a year's washing.

1279. I do not profess to know much about sewing, but I suppose a great many of them cannot do decent sewing when they enter the Home?—They cannot hold a needle many of them, but when they go out they are very often very good sewers.

1280. I have been interested a little in some work in England as regards the number of poor half-criminal, half-imbecile women. Apparently there are a great many who drop into the criminal class, who have no power of self-restraint or control of will?—They are weak by nature; they were born weak. They are hereditarily weak and usually lazy also.

1281. Do you have many of them?—Yes.

1282. And do they pass through your Home?—They do. Mrs A. A. Fergusson.

15 Nov. 1894.

1283. And some will never do well?—I should think that in my 23 years' experience, and constantly thinking about our women and loving the work, that one-third of our women do well. I was just speaking to the matron yesterday before I came here, and she said that I could safely say one-third do well.

1284. That is very satisfactory to hear?—It is a large percentage, but that is not magnifying at all.

1285. Would you take in these sort of poor half-imbecile girls?—Yes, if they come from prison.

1286. What is done with them?—They are better washing. They go to Whitevale.

1287. Do you keep them on beyond a year?—We would keep a woman on if she cared to stay. They can stay as long as they like, because they are more valuable to us when the year is out. We would not pass them out unless they have a situation, but they are all, as a rule, very anxious to get out at the end of the year.

1288. Some friends of mine have been interesting themselves lately in places in England for these poor girls. We have made some cottage homes, and they try to make them pay?—That is a great thing.

1289. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you give the women who come into your Home instruction in sewing?—Yes. They are most beautiful sewers. We got a certificate at the last exhibition.

1290. The theory is to give them a temporary refuge until they find occupation?—It is not an asylum of a permanent character.

1291. Do you meet the women at the door of the prison, or how do they hear of your Home?—All the prison officials help us very much. We work along with them and they are most kind to us. I do not know anyone more kind than another. Both Mr. Alexander, the chaplain, and the matron help us very much.

1292. In a way they advertise your Homes for you?—Yes. Miss Miller, or any of the lady wardens, give them a note to our matron if they are a good case.

1293. What sort of offenders are they chiefly?—They are imprisoned chiefly for drunkenness, and get sentences varying from 30 days to 40.

1294. It is not crime or petty theft?—Yes, we have convicts too. But there are very few convicts here in Scotland.

1295. Do you think those criminal women have been largely led into their offences by drink?—Yes.

1296. But do you think there is any form of criminality in which sobriety comes in?—We have many cases of theft, and we find that a woman once convicted of theft very often goes back to it.

1297. But I suppose some of the more scientific forms of crime are spoiled by drink? By that I mean picking-pockets and that class of crime for which you want a light touch and a good eye?—We have very few of that sort.

1298. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Having regard to the willingness of the inmates of your institution to remain there voluntarily, I should like to ask the particular character or condition of life in which they are? Do you think that many of them are worn-out women—women, at any rate, unable to sustain the struggle of their life, such as it is?—We have a good many old women, but a great many young ones. Young wives come in for drunkenness, and then they go home, while a number of them we assist to emigrate.

1299. Taking single women to begin with, is there a disposition on the part of a young woman in full vitality, strong of body, and of good looks probably, to go to your institution for reformation?—Yes. We have a great many like that. I do not know why it should be, but we find illegitimate children very often go wrong. We very often find those, where they are illegitimate, and we very often find the father and mother were drunken people. And I believe they also drink from heredity.

1300. The continuity of interest in these individuals is carried on, I think, by the chaplain of the prison going from time to time to see them and counsel them?—He is a very nice man and helps us very much.

Mrs A. A.
Fergusson.

15 Nov. 1894.

1301. And, of course, the continuity of interest is one of the most important elements in their reformation? —Yes. It does a world of good. I think the kinder and stricter you are it does them the more good.

1302. I was interested in what you said as to the different effects in the way of reformation of the different kinds of work that you gave these people to do. You said you thought the chances of reformation were more likely when you gave work which was of a character pleasant in itself, such as needle-work and refined sewing, than in coarser work such as washing?—With the long experience we have the results of sewing are better than washing.

1303. So that in any scheme for the reformation of such persons you would think that a very large amount of attention should be paid to the occupation at which they are placed?—Well, of that I do not know, but I think that many of the young strong girls are better washing, even although it does not elevate them. It is not so monotonous, I think. Our own system where we have both is best.

1304. But speaking generally, not simply of sewing and washing, but of anything else, with any occupation which shall be coupled with the reformatory system would want to be more carefully considered—that there are differences in one work as compared with another? —I only know of the two I have mentioned, and I know sewing is the better. We tried bag-making, I may say, but it did not pay.

1305. (By the Chairman.) Are such institutions as yours inspected under the Factories and Workshops Acts?—Ours are not inspected at all. We had a note from a Roman Catholic Priest, asking if he might call on any Roman Catholic woman, but we did not allow that.

1306. You employ a large number of women there, and I should think that your place would come under the designation of a factory?—It might, but we have not had an inspector.

1307. Do you observe the rules laid down in the Workshops and Factories Act?—I do not know the rules.

1308. Because if you do not, and the place is a workshop and factory, you might find yourself in a difficulty? —We would be very glad to see an inspector.

1309. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is the class of women who come to you very much the same as those who are admitted to the Magdalene Asylum?—Yes, and no. Many of them are, and many of them are not. Many of them are respectable women fallen through drink.

1310. I see in your statement of accounts in regard to the Whitevale Institution you have one item of expenditure—wages to women, £486, 9s. 3d.?—That has been for 15 years, though this year we changed it. The women made so much a day. The best washers made about eightpence.

1311. Did this go to the women?—It was put in books, and they got it when they went out, but we changed the system this year. They must stay a year now the same as in Hill Street.

1312. (By the Chairman.) Do you allow alcohol or malt liquors to be used in your place?—Never. That matter came up at the recent women's conference in Glasgow, and it was said that in English homes they tried tonics, but we find doing nothing of that kind is the best thing.

1313. I should not have expected that, but I wished to have the fact noted. You mentioned that you had cases of wives who had been committed to prison through drunkenness and who had then come into your hands. Have you many of those?—Yes, many.

1314. And kept them for a year?—Yes. We kept them for a year. They were what we would call respectable women, and they have gone back to their homes after that time and done well.

1315. Cured of their drink habit?—Yes, cured. I know two cases where they fell after they left us, but they pulled up again.

1316. Have you any idea of the number of cases?—I can send you them.

1317. Do you remember any case of that kind within the last 12 months?—No. Miss Mitchell has taken my place as secretary, and I am not so often there.

1318. You brought here a character book and you said that it contained some illustration cases. Would you select one or two and leave them with the Committee?—Yes; I will do so.

1319. (By Dr. Sutherland.) There appeared a difference between your total and mine prepared from your annual report. I find you put the figure of profit at £1326, and I £1616; but the £1616 is correct in so far as it contains proceeds of work, lodging money, and clothing repaid?—Yes.

1320. Now you have assimilated the period of detention in both your Shelters, I suppose, for the reason that you found that short periods failed at Whitevale? —We thought a year little enough time; and we did not find the results of six months so good.

1321. You have informed the Committee that 33 per cent. do well?—Yes, especially at the Hill Street Institution.

1322. I understand you to say that you are not quite in favour of compulsory detention, i.e., having power to detain them against their will?—No; that would be a licensed Home; we cannot do that.

1323. But supposing you got powers would you not be benefitted? My reason for putting this question—there is one special case in which I am interested—the wife of a most respectable man?—Yes, I know that case.

1324. Would it not be desirable to have compulsory power in certain refractory cases?—Yes, to have a Home for compulsory cases like that.

1325. May I ask you if you classify your inmates at all?—No.

1326. I was under the impression that the Hill Street women were somewhat different from the Whitevale ones?—They are perhaps a little better; but I think that is owing to the sewing.

1327. Then you classify more by their physical fitness for work rather than by age or by their moral temperament?—We take those into Hill Street who come from prison and they are set to sew, and those we put into Whitevale Street are set to wash.

1328. So that physically you classify the one for laundry work and the other for needle-work?—Yes, but not from their character.

1329. Do you send many to the Rottenrow Hospital? —I should say about five in the year. They are sent at once. Our women are very angry if that appears.

1330. (By the Chairman.) But how should that arise among prisoners? That would be already dealt with? —They ought to be dealt with, I think, but they are not.

1331. (By Dr. Sutherland.) On that point I am safe in saying a compulsory examination could not be made in prison or anywhere else. Would you inform the Committee how you make your Homes attractive by entertainments and such like?—We have, I think, on the average, an entertainment every six weeks in winter, and we have a trip in summer. Any of our women who are very ill get to a Home by means of a line—what we call (the decent ones) are sent to Lenzie chiefly. We have magic lantern exhibitions, and the Kyrle Society give the women prizes for those who tend their flower-pots best.

1332. (By the Chairman.) You say they are sent to a Convalescent Home?—Yes, if they are ailing.

1333. What is the average number of hours a day your women are employed?—From seven in the morning till eight at night.

1334. And what about Saturday?—That is a half-day.

1335. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think that heredity has got a great deal to do with the class of people who come about your Shelters?—A great deal.

1336. Do you think that heredity has really more to do with this class than environment and habits of idleness?—I daresay environment and idleness have as much to do with the people we have as heredity.

1337. (By the Chairman.) Have you anything further to add?—I should like to state that we see no reason why the Government should not pecuniarily help us in the same proportion as they do male discharged prisoners. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mrs A. A.
Fergusson.

DAVID YELLOWLEES, M.D., LL.D., Physician Superintendent of Gartnavel Lunatic Asylum, called in and examined.

David
Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

1338. (By the Chairman.) You are the Medical Superintendent of Gartnavel Asylum?—I am.

1339. And you have been so for a great number of years?—For 20.

1340. You are also President of Glasgow Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons?—Until a week ago, I was.

1341. You have taken a great interest in the subject of legislation for the habitual drunkard?—Yes.

1342. Even so far back as the time of Dr. Dalrymple's Committee?—Yes.

1343. And you took an active part in promoting legislation for habitual drunkards that was subsequently allowed to get through?—I tried to do so.

1344. You are of opinion that practically, what legislation has been carried, is of no use?—It is practically useless.

1345. In Scotland, as a matter of fact, there has been nothing done as the result of the Act?—In Scotland it has been a dead letter. No one has thought it worth paying the stamp duty to get a licence.

1346. Can you tell us if there are many unlicensed Retreats?—There are a number.

1347. Can you tell us something about them?—I have no personal knowledge of them.

1348. I do not want to ask you regarding anything which you have no information, but for the information of the Committee, if you could we should like to know the names of any unlicensed Retreats?—There are quite a number of people who write to me. I continually get letters saying 'can you send me a patient—inebriate 'or insane'; but there is no place that is avowedly a Retreat except one near Stonehaven. There is also one, indeed there are several, in Skye. This one in Stonehaven is perhaps best known to me, but I only know it from having sent patients to it, and from the opinion of others.

1349. You don't know the number of patients there?—No.

1350. You only know Stonehaven and Skye?—Yes. I know in Skye there are several places; but my feeling is not favourable to these Retreats. These Retreats receive patients for the sake of the board they pay, and there is a want of curative means, a want of the necessary tone, and a want of the reformation and restoration that one desiderates. The patients are simply easy, jolly boarders, who fish and play billiards and amuse themselves, and who tend to demoralise each other by the low moral tone which prevails among them.

1351. The theory which has led to the fixing of Skye is that it is difficult to get drink there?—Yes; which is apt to prove quite a theory.

1352. You come in contact with many illustrations of the evils of drunkenness?—Continually.

1353. I should like you to give the Committee your opinions on the subject of chronic inebriety and dipsomania, as to whether it is a vice or a disease, and how far the vice and the disease are co-terminous?—I do not think it is possible for anyone to draw an exact line, between drunkenness the vice, and drunkenness the disease. There is a period when a man who is a mere drinker becomes a hopeless and helpless drunkard. He cannot help himself; but no one can draw an exact line, and say in such a month that man passed from one to the other. Of course there are certain cases where from the beginning you trace the drunkenness to some brain condition, and that man is from the first, by reason of disease, not to be dealt with as an ordinary drunkard would be. But in the vast majority of cases the disease grows out of the vice.

1354. Can you give the Committee any illustration of drunkenness arising out of disease?—Such cases are frequent. One of the first indications of the mental disease is relaxation of self-control, and the man who has formerly been right and proper in his behaviour, becomes drunken and dissolute. That is the first step of the break-down, and it has begun in the moral rather than in the intellectual part. These cases occur continually.

1355. I suppose there are frequently cases of persons who have been previously sober, and who after a sun-stroke take to drink?—That is another illustration of how a weakened brain may destroy self-control, and the man may lapse suddenly into habits which were previously foreign to him.

1356. On the other hand you have got very large experience of cases in which brain disease has been brought on by drink?—Yes.

1357. I suppose you have many cases passed through your hands in which a short period of enforced sobriety cures the brain disease?—Yes, for the time.

1358. Showing the action again of the vice on the disease, and the disease on the vice?—That is so.

1359. Have you any observations to make with respect to heredity?—I do not think there is any condition more definitely hereditary than habitual drunkenness. I never come across such a case without asking questions regarding the parents, and I am rarely disappointed in getting an answer such as 'oh yes, her mother drank heavily.' I have the most deep conviction of the hereditary character of drunkenness, quite as much so as any other disease you could name. I do not of course mean mere intemperance in the sense of mother or father occasionally exceeding; but when you get the drink disease I regard it as one of the most transmissible of all diseases.

1360. You mean drunkenness sufficient to attract attention—regular debauchery generally culminating in insensibility and complete loss of self-control?—The effect depends very much on the person. It is striking how drink in certain cases will develop successive attacks of delirium tremens, in another case will develop insanity pure and simple, and in another case will develop this confirmed drunkenness. The people who take delirium tremens may not become permanently insane. In other cases the drink produces brain disease, and they land in an asylum; and thirdly, there are the habitual drunkards who unhappily for their friends do not land there.

1362. I remember at one time having seen at Gartnavel a woman who told me she had repeatedly been under your treatment. You have cases of that kind?—Frequently; there are some persons who vibrate between the asylums and the public-houses outside. They work for a little and then fall into drink again. In this connection the pauper is really a great deal better off than the wealthier class. If a pauper is an habitual drunkard, and becomes unmanageable, he either lands himself in jail or in the asylum, and either place serves the purpose of keeping him from drink; but if the man is unfortunately of a better class the law gives no power to interfere, and so he ruins his home and brings misery on everyone around him.

1363. There is a peculiarity about the Scottish law as to the detention of the lunatics which I wish you would explain. I refer to that which permits you to take in cases applying to you voluntarily?—I do so frequently. Persons can apply to me for voluntary admission to the asylum. They have only to ask the Lunacy Commissioners to sanction their admission, which they do as a matter of course, and the persons are admitted. They are usually persons afflicted with slight melancholia or something of that kind, and the asylum is an hospital for them. Sometimes the person comes after a debauch in a fit of remorse, saying 'I wish you would take care of me, I have been a fool.' Such cases I receive when they come in that mood, but I am sorry to say the mood is often a very transitory one, and in the course of a week or a fortnight they are quite sure they are well again, and want to go away, and it is difficult to keep them.

1364. You have, in fact, no power to keep them?—No, unless I can prove that they are insane, which I cannot. On the other hand some persons are sent to me, who, being essentially drunkards, have had a sudden access of insanity, and their friends take the opportunity and have them sent to an asylum. I always, however, dissuade them from sending such cases. It is a mistake as regards themselves and as regards the patient. A man after being taken in, gets well in a fortnight and often less, and not being legally insane I cannot keep him. He demands his liberty, and the result is that he gets out in the course of a month, embittered against all his friends, and ready to wreak vengeance on his wife; or on the other hand, he has the excuse of being called a lunatic to drink worse than ever. While in the asylum he is often a nuisance to other people. Respectable lunatics do not care to be associated with a man who is just a demoralised drunkard, and I think in their interest he ought not to be there.

David
Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

1365. You mentioned about delirium tremens. How far do you consider that comes under the province of lunacy?—Beyond question, a man under the influence of delirium tremens is for the moment a lunatic, but the thing that causes the difficulty is, that the lunacy is so transient. If you take care of him he will be well in two or three days, or a week at most. The social position comes in very much in such cases. If a poor man, living in a small house with other people, is attacked, he is certain to land in a Police Office or an asylum. But, if a better-class person, his wife takes care of him, and he comes round in a few days.

1366. But often he gets into a bad mess?—Often-times.

1367. There was the case of a man of the name of R.—?—I know it.

1368. That was a case of delirium tremens?—It was a case of another form of insanity due to drink. It was a case of the suspicions which drink arouses. The drink produced not delirium tremens, not a sudden blazing off, into excitement with hallucinations of vision, but created all sorts of suspicions—that so and so had an ill-will at him, that he would serve him out, that if anybody came near he would do for him; he would fire at him.

1369. You are of opinion that many cases of intemperance—of drink craving—would be cured if sufficiently long seclusion from drink could be secured to enable the will to reassert its power?—Some of them would. It depends on the time you get the case, there are few things more hopeless than that confirmed condition. It also depends on the honesty of the patient.

1370. Therefore you would expect in the case of voluntary patients better results than in others?—Yes, if they had sufficient continuity of purpose to desire it all the while. But we find they remain full of remorse the first week, and the second they get self-confident, and the next they want to go away.

1371. And insist upon going out?—Yes.

1372. And I suppose the prospect of getting drunk outside is part of the inducement?—Yes, too often.

1373. We have been hearing to-day of two institutions where they have a number of drunkards or people who have just come from prison and so on, very much addicted to drink, and in many cases had been repeatedly convicted, where they remain voluntarily in institutions—for in one case a year, and in another case two years without any compulsion?—Yes, you do get cases like that where the people honestly intend and desire to get better; I know a patient just now, who is a voluntary one in an asylum, and her great reason for staying there is that she might break into the drink habit again and probably drown herself.

1374. But we were told of a number of drunken inmates, and they stay there voluntarily, and your voluntary cases I suppose very often sacrifice their payments in advance in the case of the lunatic asylums?—The social grade has a good deal to do with it. Probably these inmates you refer to were of that very low class to which a comfortable home was a consideration. The people I have been speaking of were of a different social grade altogether.

1375. And that is an important difference?—I think so. David Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

1376. In dealing with habitual drunkards you are aware that we may divide these roughly into two classes—first the non-criminal habitual drunkard, and then the quasi criminal habitual drinking man of the Police Courts?—Yes.

1377. Take the first class, the non-criminal class, who may also be divided into those who submit voluntarily to go into Retreats, whose case is more or less admitted to be provided for, and —?—But why should the restrictions be so exceedingly irksome and unpleasant.

1378. We will also take your views on that; but I am simply going to make the division. First those who submit themselves voluntarily, and the second class who have not yet been dealt with; namely, those whom it is suggested friends should be able to take proceedings against and get committed. Now we will take the voluntary class first and then those whom we propose to deal with through their friends; and then we have the quasi criminal class. You have some remarks to make about the voluntary class?—You mean those who voluntarily go to Retreats.

1379. Yes.—Well, I think it is the greatest possible mistake to put any obstacle in the way of their going. If they are intelligently able to say, 'I have been a fool, and I want to be made better,' why should it be necessary to use the words 'habitual drunkard'?

1380. It is now the Inebriates Act?—But they are obliged to say under this Act that they are 'habitual inebriates,' that undoubtedly is a much better word, but why should a person have to go before two Justices to do that, why should it not be possible for a person who is sane to seclude himself for three or six months.

1381. It is quite possible that going before two Justices has a deterrent effect; but Parliament has decreed in its wisdom —?—Or otherwise.

1382. That certain forms shall be gone through before any person can be allowed into these places, and you would propose that there should be less formality?—Why, even a person who wants to go into a lunatic asylum has not to go through such a formality. All he does is to write to the Lunacy Commissioners and say, 'Will you please authorise my residing in such a place for a certain time.'

1383. But this man is committed to a Retreat for 12 months, whereas your patient can go out in a little time?—Yes, on three days' notice; but certainly something far less formidable than this is necessary. I have known only one habitual drunkard who would sign that statutory request.

1384. All the habitual drunkards that are to be found in Retreats, that is unlicensed Retreats, belong to the class of which we are speaking?—Yes, voluntary.

1385. And they are frequently more or less wealthy, and they support themselves, or their friends pay for them. Now is there any inspection of those Retreats?—None whatever.

1386. Do you think there should be?—I think there ought to be the same law about them as for keeping lunatics for pay. You are permitted to keep one patient upon a medical certificate, but if the person desires to keep more, then the house must be recognised and licensed by the Lunacy Commissioners, the boarders must not exceed the number specified, and for each boarder a medical certificate and the sanction of the Commissioners is indispensable. I do not think these present places are on a right footing.

1387. Do you think there is a liability to the abuse of the powers of detention?—I do not know how the boarders are detained, but I am quite sure there is detention of some sort or other.

1388. Do you think it is desirable that the same kind of inspection should be applied to them as to licensed houses for lunatics where there is much greater precaution taken?—Certainly, some kind of inspection; but I doubt very much whether I would favour the existence of these places at all. I would favour the system of one patient being taken into a private house because it might do much good, but I would rather not see any half-way house between solitary treatment and some recognised system of treatment.

1389. But is there not the danger that in the treatment of one single individual in a family that he would be able to get at drink?—You would not send a person to a place unless the people would keep drink from him, and would try to exert upon him the only influence that would do him any good, the strengthening of his moral faculties.

1390. But if you take a man away from his own family who goes off for debauches, he would be free from the family influences exercised upon him; if he is a boarder, and if he had money, he could get drink and would continue there?—He would get no money when he is away; his absence mitigates the evil at home; and when he falls into the hands of a good man the results have in some cases been really satisfactory.

1391. I suppose you send a good lot away?—I am continually asked about drunkards whom I do not see—'can you tell us where to send him or her,' they say, and I turn up a list which I have, and give the address of some farm-house or a place of that kind. I have sent people beyond Stornoway, where there is a remote farm 12 miles distant from a public-house.

1392. In connection with these Scottish unlicensed Retreats, are they all for men, or are there any for women?—I do not know any for women, that are not also for semi-lunatics. I do not know any one for drunkards alone; there is a place in the Canongate of Edinburgh. If all stories are true it is a peculiar place, but I know nothing of it.

1393. With regard to these places that are for women; they receive both habitual drunkards and semi-lunatics. What is the law as to semi-lunatics?—I mean by semi-lunatics those who do not need asylum care. I mean people who are perhaps not ill enough to go to an asylum. They may be sent to houses licensed by the Commissioners, and cases of this kind sometimes go as ordinary boarders.

1394. And are they inspected?—Yes, by the Commissioners, but the habituals who reside there are not inspected.

1395. Now the second class—those whom it is proposed should be dealt with on the initiative of their friends. What is your opinion as to the desirability of that?—I have the very strongest opinion as to the necessity of it. It is the greatest and most clamant need, I think, of our social life just now, to get some means of restraining those people from ruining their homes, and making all their friends wretched.

1396. Have you thought out any details?—No; but I do not see any more difficulty in dealing with them than in dealing with lunatics. If a person becomes insane, his friends go to the sheriff and they produce evidence of the insanity, and the sheriff, if he is satisfied, gives an order to commit that person to the asylum. I think there ought to be a precisely parallel thing here, and I think the friends or somebody interested, just as with the lunatics, ought to be able to go to the sheriff and produce evidence, partly medical and partly non-medical, and the sheriff should have the power of commitment of the patient if he saw fit, and was satisfied with the evidence—that is he would give an order for the detention of that person in such a Retreat for a certain time.

1397. And that would be inspected?—Certainly.

1398. The law makes every provision for the management of a lunatic's property?—Yes.

1399. But there is no such provision made in the case of habitual drunkards?—No; but the habitual drunkard is in the position of a man who is unable to manage his own affairs also; and I see no reason why a curator should not be appointed during his detention. It seems to me the lunacy machinery is perfectly simple and applicable.

1400. You have described the Scottish lunacy system; it is very different from the English system?—Yes; I am happy to say the Scottish system is different. I think if they in England could be enlightened by seeing the simplicity of our system they would be delighted to adopt it.

1401. But do you know the English system?—So far as I know there, I think a patient is reported on by the Inspector of Poor, and that two Justices give an order, and he is sent to the asylum as a lunatic, under proper care and control. That part of the English machinery would work well; but there are other formalities.

1402. In this inquiry, however, we are confined to Scotland?—I am very glad to know it; it seems to me to be so easy in Scotland to draw up a scheme that I earnestly hope something will come out of this inquiry.

1403. Now we come to the third class—that is the quasi criminal habitual drunkard. Do you think that your machinery for producing evidence before the sheriff could be easily adopted?—Certainly: and one good reason to be put before the sheriff would be very often that this man is not only an habitual drunkard, wasting his means and ruining his family, but that he had committed some criminal act. This would be part of the evidence against him.

1404. But supposing he assaulted a man with an axe, as the law at present stands would he not find himself charged with being a dangerous lunatic, and sent into your care?—Yes, probably.

1405. And would there not be some difficulty in getting him out?—We would cure him of his drunkenness, but such cases are exceedingly difficult to deal with as regards their future.

1406. Because you are obliged to declare that there is now no risk of injury or danger to any one by his release?—Yes, on that ground they are very difficult to release that declaration involving serious responsibility.

1407. And I understand the medical superintendent cannot declare that, and a patient may be kept in months after he is perfectly sane, because there is no machinery for liberating him?—Well, not months after he is perfectly sane, but because it is doubtful if he is so sane as to be safe.

1408. Months after you think it would be better for him to be out?—Months after the risk was so small that it might have been run, but the law does not choose to run it.

1409. You think that such people might be much better dealt with by being sent to a special Inebriate Retreat?—Yes, in some cases; the man would be taken up short then. He would not be dismissed with a short sentence and allowed to do the same thing again. It would be a good thing to recognise habitual drunkenness and deal with it.

1410. It has been suggested that we should register the convictions against drunkenness. For instance one witness suggested that a man being brought up for the first time should be registered, but dismissed without any punishment; on the next offence there should be some punishment, or it might be no punishment; and again a mark placed him; and that after a certain number of convictions within a certain time he should be sent before the sheriff on a charge of being an habitual drunkard, and the sheriff should receive such evidence as could be produced as to his habitual drunkenness, and thereupon he might be committed?—I do not see anything wrong with that, but it does not meet the case of the better classes who are not arrested.

1411. Then about the monetary arrangement?—I think it would require to be worked out on the same plan as the dangerous lunatic is dealt with when sent to an asylum. The law requires that the parish where the deed of violence has been committed should pay for him, and it has recourse against his Parish of Settlement.

1412. As for the deed of violence?—The deed of violence simply determines that the sheriff shall take action against the man.

1413. But the sheriff would be the judge simply?—The Procurator-Fiscal would take action and say in the case of an habitual drunkard, 'Here is a person who has been convicted [say] 25 times, and I bring him up for committal to a Retreat.'

1414. And the expense would be put against his Yellowston.

Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

parish?—Yes; but it might be, as it often happens with lunatics, that the friends say 'we will pay,' and then the matter is arranged with the Retreat by the friends.

1415. With respect to the quasi criminal drunkard committed by the sheriff on account of his public appearances, you would have to treat rich and poor alike?—Certainly; in the first instance.

1416. But in the second instance?—The rich man's friends would come forward and say 'we will pay for him; we do not want him to be treated as a pauper.'

1417. And in that case you would deal with him as with the civil prisoner, and allow him to get such comforts as he wished, always debarring alcohol?—Yes, and anything the parish had paid I would make that man repay.

1418. You would make everyone repay who could?—Yes, certainly.

1419. And then if a man went from the Retreat to work again the parish would have a claim against him?—Oh no. That would be a weight hanging about many a man which he would never get rid of. With such a weight he would have no self-respect or care for his life.

1420. You think that that would be the simplest machinery, but that of course would leave the wife and dependents of the man often in a bad fix?—They would then be dealt with as in the case of pauperism; they would have to appeal to the parish.

1421. But people of that kind do not get much assistance from the parish?—It would be the most blessed day for them when the man was shut up, and they were thus free to do what they could for themselves.

1422. Now as to the time of seclusion—this is an important matter?—Not the least use in anything less than 6 months, and if he comes back again, 12 months. There are some cases where I think you may safely begin with 12, but certainly nothing less than 6 would be of the least permanent value.

1423. Do you think 12 months is sufficient?—In some cases it would not be, in others it would.

1424. Well, if you were asking for powers?—I would ask power to let him out at the end of, say 6 months, on probation. I would let him out on the footing that if he did not behave he would have to come back to do his period over again.

1425. Among your lunatics whose disease has been brought on by drink, and who have been detained for long periods, and become cured and are sent out, do you find the craving for liquor has been overcome?—Yes, generally; because where it has developed lunacy it has not been going on so long—it has more rapidly produced brain results—and the craving does not usually remain.

1426. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You propose that the maintenance of habitual drunkards, or inebriates unable to pay, should fall upon the parish in which, it may be, an act of violence is committed, or the state of drunkenness from its frequency is known?—Upon the man's Parish of Settlement, wherever that might be.

1427. Do you think the parishes would resist having this burden thrown on them?—I do not think they would like it, but I do not see that you can have anything else. It is the same in lunacy. He is a man who must be taken care of for the good of the public.

1428. Would it not bring up fresh questions of settlement and costly litigation?—We are getting wiser in that way, and going to get bigger districts.

1429. You know that in Glasgow there are certain districts where the population is a migratory one, and where a large percentage of the ne'er-do-weels take up their abode. Would there not be a likelihood of heavy burdens falling upon such a parish or district?—Yes, but not more so than in the case of lunacy. So long as the parish has to pay for those accidental classes I do not see what other mode of payment could be suggested. Of course where there is private means the parish has recourse against them. Is it not the case at the present moment that part of the maintenance of those police drunks is borne by the Crown?—I do not know about the police drunkards. I only know about lunacy.

1430. Assume that the maintenance of drunkards at present brought before the Police Courts is borne by the Crown, during their residence in prison. Would it not be likely that the parishes would resist having this part of the cost thrown upon them, and off the Central Government?—Possibly they would, but I do not care whether the Government or the parish pays it. It was a parallel to the arrangement for lunacy which was in my mind, for the two cases seem to me practically the same.

1431. Would it not be a sine qua non that the Government would like to have some say in connection with these Homes if in part it contributed to the maintenance of the inmates?—I would not be in favour of the Government maintaining these Homes altogether.

1432. But, if the amount now contributed by the Central Government was calculated, and if it was found desirable to continue that subvention in an altered condition of things, would not the Government have some say in the inspection and management of the Homes?—To that there is an exact parallel in lunacy. The Government gives a grant-in-aid of the maintenance of pauper lunatics, precisely the proposal which you suggest, and if the same arrangements were made the Government would help to the extent of 4s. a week, the same as they do in the support of every pauper lunatic. By all means let the Government help in the support of the habitual drunkard in the same way.

1434. Is it not the case that where a single lunatic is taken care of, or is in the custody of a respectable family, that the Lunacy Commissioners must be satisfied with the respectability of the family before the lunatic is allowed to go there?—No, that is not so. On my certificate I can send a lunatic, whose malady is not confirmed, for 6 months to any house of my choosing, and the people in that house have the power to detain that lunatic for that period, and the Lunacy Commissioners have no knowledge of it whatever. After the expiry of 6 months, the case must come under their cognisance and inspection. This is a very valuable point in my opinion.

1435. (By the Chairman.) Why?—A great many cases that need removal from their homes, and will get well if placed in suitable surroundings, can often be dealt with in that way and saved from being sent to an asylum, or legally recognised as lunatics, if you know the proper person to send them to.

1436. But they must be formally committed to you?—No. They are patients whom I see in consultation, and I give a formal certificate in a form which the Act prescribes, saying that this patient is labouring under insanity, incipient or not confirmed, and that it is advisable that the patient should be sent from home, and should be under the care of a certain person for a certain period. That very often secures recovery.

1437. You do that as the superintendent of an asylum?—I do it as an individual and not as a superintendent at all. Any doctor has this power under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 51, sec. 13.

1438. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it not the case that those individuals are visited periodically by the Lunacy Commissioners?—No. The persons visited are those who are confined in the houses licensed by them. There are many of these throughout Scotland, receiving it may be one patient, or two, or more, and all these are houses which are specially recognised and licensed by the Commissioners, and are under their inspection regularly.

1439. Do you consider that the same civil and social disadvantages attach to the inebriate as to the lunatic?—No, except in so far as it might be necessary for his business to be managed or carried on while he was in seclusion. It might, of course, be a business which required his personal attention, but so far as his counsel was required he might be allowed to give it.

1440. Do you think the same stigma attaches now in society to the man who drinks to excess as to the man who is insane?—I think the stigma is greater

David
Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

upon the man who drinks to excess. I think people are getting wiser about lunacy, and do not look upon it as they used to do.

1441. But is it not the case that among commercial men the same stigma and disabilities do not attach to the man who drinks?—That may be so.

1442. Apart from delirium tremens, mania a potu or chronic alcoholism, would you describe to the Committee the general physical and mental infirmities not amounting to insanity produced by excessive and prolonged drinking?—There is first of all, delirium tremens; then there is next the mania a potu of which you have spoken, which is a short attack of acute insanity, lasting for two or three weeks; then there comes what is properly called the insanity of intemperance, alcoholic insanity strictly so called, where the patient from long drinking becomes suspicious, is quite certain that so and so intends to do him harm, that somebody slandered his wife, that people whisper base things into his ears, that somebody discredits him in public estimation, that somebody put something into the Mail about him, and that he knew all about it. That may assume a violent and dangerous form, or it may be a thing which goes on for months and months, until the man becomes a victim to the delusions and a morose, ill-conditioned, good-for-nothing man. If he drinks still more he gets into a condition of chronic alcoholism, when not only his brain but his whole system becomes paralysed, and then he is an utter wreck, body and mind. You also may have General Paralysis induced, and of course you may have Dipsomania, or insane drinking,—it may be in an acute form, or periodic, or habitual.

1443. Is it not your experience that habitual drinking, short of those defined and pronounced mental conditions, results in many cases in an irritable and ill-balanced brain?—Certainly.

1444. And that a long period of rest is necessary to rectify that condition?—Certainly; and abstinence.

1445. In your long experience as a medical jurist, is it not the case that men and women, more especially men, have been drinking to excess for months, and it may be years before they committed fatal assaults, and that it is only then that they are arrested by the police?—Quite true.

1446. Would you do anything with a man like that before he gets that length?—The only course is that the friends should be able to appeal to the sheriff.

1447. Might not friends, or neighbours, or the police take the initiative?—Yes, and it would be for the sheriff to be satisfied, after inquiry. I really think there is great room for parallel here also to the lunacy procedure.

1448. Would not the public weal and the protection of the lieges be a good excuse for asking an inquiry?—Yes. A neighbour could say 'I live in the same stair as this man, he upsets the whole place, and behaves like a dangerous madman.'

1449. You have been a medical witness in some 30 such cases as I have referred to?—Yes, probably.

1450. (By Miss Stevenson.) In your experience have you found any justification of the assertion which has been made so frequently lately, that there is a large increase of private drinking amongst women of the educated and better class, producing in their case mental disorder?—It is very difficult to be sure, but I confess that my impression is in the direction that among women of the better class there is a greater tendency to tipping that in former times.

1451. Is that not the result of the fact that you, as a specialist, are more likely to be consulted in regard to such cases than the ordinary practitioner would be?—I do not think so, because I have my impression more from what I hear from other practitioners than from my own personal knowledge. A great many of them consult their own doctors before they think it grave enough to consult me. I am speaking rather by the opinions of others than by personal knowledge.

1452. (By Col. M'Hardy.) As to the length of time, the minimum length of time of seclusion, I think you said six months?—Yes.

1453. Did you say what in your opinion should be the maximum length of time of power of detention?—I David think that would depend on the experience of each case. Yellowless. I should be disposed to dismiss the case at the end of six months for a probationary period of, say three months, and if during that time the patient broke down he must come back and do it over again. I would repeat it until there was some reason to think that his health and behaviour had improved.

1454. You mean repeated periods of six months?—Yes. I would have his limit decided by experience.

1455. But you would have to start with some sort of limit?—I would start with six months, and only if he proved himself worthy would I let him free; if he broke down within three months I would bring him in again and detain him for six months, and I would keep him a longer period if he broke down again after a second trial. I would let the man out only when there was some reasonable hope that he had become a moral being again, and fit to guide himself.

1456. And you don't think you could define the limit with which to experiment?—Yes, I would take power to experiment with him until he was cured.

1457. Or that cure was impossible?—Yes.

1458. In such cases then you would take power to confine him for the rest of his life?—Yes, certainly.

1459. Do you think it would be necessary in every case where there is a case of less advanced inebriety to have the same amount of restraint or seclusion imposed?—No, I think not. That I think would entirely depend upon the kind of case. Often and often more can be done by giving a certain amount of freedom, and putting a person on his honour, than by a severe treatment.

1460. What would be the least form of restraint which you think might be ordered by the magistrate? The magistrate could order, if an habitual inebriate or offender was brought before him and shown to be a man who got frequently drunk, what would be in your opinion the smallest amount of restraint?—That he should live in the institution and not go beyond the bounds of its discipline, and that while there, he should employ himself in some way or other.

1461. But in every case you would move the case, whether an elementary or developed one, you would move him to some distinct institution for the purpose?—I would.

1462. You would not leave him among his family or friends under some sort of guardianship?—No. He would break down within a week.

1463. You said something about sending one lunatic patient to a private house?—Yes.

1464. Can you deal with the inebriate in the elementary stages in that way without sending him to an institution?—It would depend a good deal upon the case, because although they may all have the same name, you may have very different persons under that name.

1465. There may chance to be a suitable place to send the man?—He may go to one where the person in charge has not much else to do, and can devote himself to the patient. Some have benefited very much by such care. But that is a question of the suitability of the guardianship and of the kind of patient.

1466. But you think that, in the same way as certain lunatic patients may be treated by boarding out in proper places, habitual offenders might be similarly treated?—When they have passed through the institution. I would send them all to the institution in the first instance for six months, and then before sending them for the period of trial, I should say 'You don't need to live here. You can go either here or there, but your break-down will imply your coming back. You need to show that you have learnt during the six months the self-control and self-restraint which you have been deficient in. We cannot take your name off the books till you do so.'

1467. What treatment as regards occupation would you give to the persons in any institution? You know the nature of their occupation would be a very important thing in connection with their recovery?—Very important, and very difficult, because of course it must

15 Nov. 1894.

David
Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

be suited to a certain extent to the former habits and mode of life of the individual; and there must be a certain degree of compulsion. Idle loafing simply means deterioration.

1468. What occupation—say, teasing oakum or some such unsavoury occupation? Would that have an effect?—It must be something else than teasing oakum. I think if the occupation is to be salutary and beneficial it must not be so disagreeable.

1469. (By Dr. Sutherland.) It must be educative?—To a certain extent. It depends upon what the man can do. It is a difficult matter to get at.

1470. (By Col. McHardy.) You said that a man went on until he came to a certain period when he was sent for to be taken to a lunatic asylum, or to a prison, which equally serves the purpose?—In respect to absence of liquor.

1471. You do not mean to convey that a short, or even a long period for the matter of that, in prison is a scientific treatment?—It was simply the fact that he got no more drink.

1472. As a matter of fact, do you consider that imprisonment—I do not know if you are familiar with the details of imprisonment for a short or a long period—is a scientific treatment for continued inebriety?—I do not.

1473. Why is it not a good treatment?—There is nothing regenerative about it. The only hope in treating the habitual drunkard is to awaken his moral sense, and try to lift him back to the position of a self-controlling individual. There is nothing in prison that does that. He becomes a mere part of the machine. There is nothing to improve or elevate his moral nature; and nothing to strengthen his will power. He has no opportunity of using it at all.

1474. Is it the fact that his moral qualities get deteriorated with the deterioration of the actual physical tissues of the body?—Yes.

1475. And by wise treatment in the way of food and so forth, you can restore physical conditions?—In certain cases, and within certain limits.

1476. And you would expect his moral improvement would go on per se?—Yes, with suitable moral treatment and surroundings.

1477. It is necessary for us to think about the financial bearing of the question. It has been suggested that part of the payment for these people in a Retreat should be partly paid by the State and partly by the Local Authorities. Would it be a reasonable arrangement to make that, if you are dealing with a prisoner, a person, quasi offender, a culprit, that he should be paid for by the State, as it would relieve the State from a prisoner; whereas in the case of a man or woman who had never been brought before the Court, but for mere reasons of the improvement of society it was found a convenient thing to prevent disorder in the domestic circle, that they should be paid for by the Local Authorities?—Well, it is very difficult to draw the line so definitely as that, because there are a multitude of habitual drunkards who never get the length of being criminals, and who had much better be caught before that, and yet who have no means to fall back upon. I quite see the force of your remark that when they get to be prisoners the State supports them in prison and should support them out of it, but there is a class of the habitual drunkards of the poorer grade who have no means, and yet you cannot wait, until they become quasi criminals. There must be some mode of supporting them.

1478. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I suppose the first step towards the moral reformation of the drunkard is to keep drink from him?—Yes, abstinence.

1479. Then seclusion is the way?—Certainly.

1480. And there is advantage then in shutting him up in a prison?—Yes, to that extent.

1481. That is the part of the prison discipline that is valuable?—Yes.

1482. Do you call insanity a disease?—Certainly, it is a symptom of brain disease.

1483. But you do not say whether chronic inebriety is a disease or insanity?—It is sometimes one, and sometimes the other, and sometimes both. There is a certain line where the vice becomes the disease. David Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 18

1484. Then you could treat a man of this class probably through the lunatic asylum?—No, I do not want them at all. I don't think they should be there.

1485. But suppose a medical man would say a case of inebriety was a case of insanity?—If the chronic inebriety had led to certain acts which were really acts of insanity, then of course I could receive the patient; but I should probably say 'don't send that man to me if you can avoid it. He will be quite well in the course of a fortnight, and then I must send him out, when he will be more angry than ever with his friends, and will drink again as before.'

1486. You think your period of detention is not long enough?—It is not. The law requires me to dismiss a patient who is medically sane, and chronic inebriety does not constitute per se insanity.

1487. You said you thought drinking was increasing among women?—Yes.

1488. Do you think inebriety has so much increased as to make it desirable that there should be legal measures for its suppression? Are you prepared to say that there is on the whole increased chronic inebriety?—If I were to judge from my own experience I should say there were clear grounds among the better classes for legislation.

1489. But do you think that the conditions are so formidable that legislation is necessary?—Most emphatically, yes. When any person becomes a habitual drunkard, as defined in this Act (Sir Charles Cameron's Act), I most earnestly and strongly say that it is of the greatest consequence that there should be legislative means to confine and care for that man or woman.

1490. Are you sanguine of the curative effects of prolonged isolation?—I am not.

1491. Not even in early cases?—There are some cases in which the treatment will be effectual and the patient recover. There are a certain number in which there will be no permanent good to the individual, but a mighty and blessed deliverance to the people connected with him.

1492. Is that because some distinct or organic disease of the brain has taken place, or only for family reasons?—It may be the length of distinct organic change, or even if not, there may be such perversion of will as to make the man as hopeless as if there were organic change. The wretchedness caused by such cases is unspeakable.

1493. Your suggestion then is to get these people out of the way?—Both for the sake of the person and the friends,—just as in the case of lunacy.

1494. You are familiar with the literature of foreign countries on this subject?—You mean the American cures. No; I don't believe in it, and they don't believe in these cures themselves.

1495. They don't?—Well, many of them do not.

1496. Do you think the results of the Dalrymple Home are valuable for statistical purposes?—I do not know the results.

1497. Of course they are a small number of cases?—I don't know the results, I can only speak of my own knowledge, and I say the cure of such cases is a very very difficult matter, and that I have known in my life only a small number of them.

1498. You think the period of detention must be decided by the medical man in attendance?—It should depend entirely on whether the detention has attained its result or not. If the man cannot keep sober for three months outside, what is the use of letting him go.

1499. Would you have a fixed maximum. You would not keep him in ten years, say?—If a man is tried and continually breaks down what is the use of letting him out.

1500. Would it be essential to sentence him to a definite period at first?—Yes, and that could be extended if a man broke down during his three months' probation.

1501. You would have a sort of ticket-of-leave, then?

—Yes; but we call it in the Lunacy Department 'probation.'

1502. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You mentioned six months as the time you would detain them?—Yes.

1503. In the case of habitual drunkards—these miserable cases which qualify for being called habitual drunkards—would there be any reason to hope that six months would be sufficient?—It would be perfectly useless in many cases.

1504. We should only have confirmed cases, semi-police cases, those curses to society and to our streets; would six months be long enough to give them a chance?—I don't think it would; but the sentence could be six months, with supervision for other three months, during which he could be watched and brought back again if necessary.

1505. Would it not be better to make it 12 months at once?—In certain cases it might. I think 12 months would be rather severe for a universal law. I think there are some persons who, if they get well at all, would get well in 6 months.

1506. (By the Chairman.) But don't you think that would be left to the sheriff?—Yes.

1507. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You would allow the sheriff to sentence a drunkard to 12 months if the evidence warranted?—Certainly; giving a period of supervision thereafter.

1508. Talking of hereditary cases; can you, as a physician, say beforehand, after examining a child whose parents are drunkards and where there is a bad hereditary record, whether that child is certain to be a drunkard or not?—Nobody could say that.

1509. You can get no indication from the brain or in any other way?—No, but you would earnestly admonish the guardians of such a child never to allow it to taste alcohol in any form, and it should be explained to the child as soon as he or she was old enough to know.

1510. There are a tolerably large class, are there not, who are not quite insane enough to be sent into a lunatic asylum, but who yet are so utterly feeble of will as to approach very nearly to imbecility—miserable girls, some of them who produce wretched creatures?—A large class.

1511. What should you do with them?—That is a very large question; I don't know.

1512. I understand in their case it is more of an infirmity than absolute moral weakness?—That is quite so. The same question in a certain sense comes before me continually in my department. It comes to me in this way:—Am I to allow this poor wife or this epileptic husband to go home, where they may beget more children, who may be lunatic or epileptic? That is a question that is coming up continually; it ought to be spoken about far more plainly.

1513. Have you any distinct ideas as to how such cases should be treated. Would you recommend that the Commissioners of Lunacy should have the power of shutting them up for life?—It is a very large and very difficult question. I would not like off-hand to give an opinion; certainly not an opinion that could be put on evidence, although I have very definite opinions in a direction which Dr. Sutherland has indicated.

1514. You talk about the people who go voluntarily into Retreats, being able to support themselves, but a poor man however much he might wish restraint could not do that?—The only thing for him to do would be to go himself to the sheriff and say, I appeal to you to protect me against myself.

1515. But the law just now can do nothing?—Nothing.

1516. In drawing a parallel between lunacy and inebriety, is it not the case that a physician can tell far more distinctly that a man is now mentally sound, than he can tell that he is sound as regards the temptation to inebriety?—Certainly.

1517. And that makes it all the more difficult to let the inebriate out?—The question is the testing of the will power of a man, and you cannot gauge that unless he is subjected to temptation.

1518. So on that particular point you cannot draw an exact parallel?—That is why I advise a period of probation, so that he may have an opportunity of showing whether he will stand or fall. David Yellowlegs.
15 Nov. 1894.

1519. In these asylums you consider that occupation and employment would be necessary?—Most needful.

1520. What compulsion would you put upon the lazy rascal who declines to work?—In asylums we say that if a man does not work neither shall he smoke. I think that addition to the decalogue might be put in force there, and other inducements might be given in addition, especially that a certain amount of remuneration would be given for the work done. Granting or withholding indulgences, and giving a man the feeling that he was working for his wife and children outside, would induce him to do some work.

1521. (By Miss Stevenson.) In regard to the management of the proposed Retreats for inebriates, do you think that there should be private management or private asylums, or that they would be better like the district asylums, where it is no one's interest to detain persons?—They must be on no account anything except public in the latter sense. It must be no one's interest to have any one there.

1522. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have told us that you do not wish to do what I may call, coddle the drunkard. Would you not consider the deprivation of liberty for a considerable time, and the insistence upon the performance of work would be in itself a punishment?—No; I think it would be treatment. That is the word I would use.

1523. Do you not think that the deprivation of liberty for six months would make the inebriate pause and reflect?—Yes; but you have brought it on yourself.

1524. While he remained there you would expect a beneficial change to take place in the tissues of the man's body from the healthy recreation and diet he receives?—Yes; and the abstinence.

1525. From your knowledge of American Homes do you think they are properly conducted?—I think they are a mistake, I do not approve of private Homes such as Miss Stevenson has alluded to.

1526. But you have no fault to find with the American Statutes for the creation of those Homes?—I do not know sufficient about them.

1527. In answer to Col. M'Hardy you said different cases required different treatment. Does not that suggest that there should be a classification of inebriates, either in different institutions, or in the same institution?—You are obliged to have a classification of some kind. You cannot place a man from the lowest parts of the city, and a man whose surroundings have always been something totally different, together. The one is able to pay for his privileges and the other is not.

1528. But do you not find that the mental obliquity in inebriety is very considerable?—Certainly.

1529. And that being the case would it not be desirable either to classify them in different institutions or in the same one?—To a certain extent, but the variation in obliquity is nothing like the variation in lunacy. The variation would be more of a social than a medical one.

1530. (By the Chairman.) Now as to the definition of an habitual drunkard, do you think it is satisfactory, or is there any amendment or modification you think it would require?—The terms of definition are those:—'At times dangerous to himself, or herself, or to others; or incapable of managing himself, or herself, and his or her affairs.' The words 'at times' applies to both parts of that sentence, and if that is so the definition is a very good one. A man is only at times dangerous to himself, or herself, or others, and he is only at times incapable of managing himself or herself.

1531. So you think it is satisfactory?—Yes; supposing the words 'at times' to apply to all the succeeding phrases.

1532. But I think it does?—Very well.

1533. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) It might be repeated if there is any doubt about it?—Yes.

1534. (By the Chairman.) There are a number of

David
Yellowlees.

15 Nov. 1894.

nostrums for the cure of habitual drunkenness?—I do not believe in one of them.

1535. What is the opinion of the profession regarding them?—I do not know any person who believes in one of them.

1536. You mentioned the case of epileptics. In some respects there is a resemblance between epileptic cases and cases of drunkenness. You have an epileptic who is perfectly sane, then gets into a fit of epilepsy, and is for a time absolutely insane. What powers have you?—He is distinctly regarded as an lunatic; if his fit did not come more than say once a year I could not keep him, but as you know the fits recur generally every two or three weeks or every month, and it would be a most wrong thing to send such a man out. Although for a time he seemed intelligent enough, his fits recur so certainly and with so much danger, and probably violence, that it would be quite wrong to let that man out.

1537. Would the law justify the detention of a person who is for the greater portion of his time sane?—Well no, not for the greater portion.

1538. But say there is a man who has an epileptic fit once a week, having a short interval of insanity it may be during which he has homicidal tendencies, and then in the course of 12 hours is quite sane again?—That is not a very common case. Usually the man has a day or two of irritability leading up to the attack, and it usually takes a day or two in subsiding again.

1539. But in some cases the fit comes like a shot?—Yes, the fit.

1540. May not the insanity come on suddenly in some cases?—Yes.

1541. I have in my mind one case where a man in a sudden fit of epilepsy stabbed a man right off?—That does happen; but, as a rule, there are symptoms. I think none of these epileptics should be allowed out, or at least until it is impossible for them to procreate children. I would also apply that to other classes.

1542. You have mentioned the case in lunacy, of medical men giving a certificate when it is a case of incipient lunacy, and when it is for the patient's benefit that he or she should be sent to a private family, but what control have you over the patient?—Simply that she is placed under the control of a person known to me who can prevent the patient going away, and carry out my treatment.

1543. Without being liable to false imprisonment?—Yes.

1544. Could it be applied to the case of an habitual drunkard?—The Lunacy Board has a regulation for the temporary residence of patients in private houses, and the same could apply here.

1545. What is the form of the regulation?—'A person suffering from incipient or transitory mental disorder may be temporarily received, and kept for profit in any private dwelling without an order of the sheriff or the sanction of the Board, but such temporary residence shall not exceed the period of six months, and the occupier must be authorised to receive the patient under a certificate granted in the following form,—"I a medical person duly qualified in terms of the Act, certify on soul and conscience that C. D. is afflicted—[here state nature of disease]—but that the malady is not confirmed, and that I consider it expedient, with a view to recovery, that he should be placed for temporary residence in the house of 'so and so for a certain time not exceeding six months.'"

1546. As to the rights of custody; there is no force?—No, but the right of custody is implied in the words 'a person may be received and kept for profit.'

1547. The Lunacy Commissioners have that power?—Yes, under section 13 of 29 & 30 Vict. cap. 51.

1548. With regard to people generally, or with regard only to asylums?—With regard to lunatics, when the disease is incipient and not confirmed, this is the statutory regulation.

1549. Has that right—the right of custody ever been contested?—Not that I know of; I do not think anyone would do so in connection with this class of cases.

1550. But of course you know that lunatics are occasionally litigious, and a person who might be detained might raise the question?—It has never been contested so far as I know.

1551. Of course that would impose no liability on you, because it is conferred legally on you?—Yes.

1552. But if these custodians have not a legal right to enforce custody you perfectly see it might be disputed?—Yes.

1553. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Suppose an unprincipled medical man was to give a warrant?—The certificate most definitely states that the malady is not confirmed. Now you are really dealing with cases where the malady is very much confirmed, and the only cases we would care for in private houses would be habitual drunkards who had passed through the institution, and after they had learned control. They would then be in the convalescent stage.

1554. (By Dr. Sutherland.) If under those regulations, which I presume are sanctioned by the Secretary of State, a private individual can detain a relative and can lock him up, is the matter known to the Board of Lunacy?—No; such a patient is not seen by the Board at all. There is no record by the Board of Lunacy.

1555. Is not the sanction of the sheriff got?—No; it is the strongest thing in the Act.

1556. (By the Chairman.) Is there anything analogous to it in England?—Not that I know of.

1557. What is the date of it?—It is dated 1866.

1558. It is not very much used is it?—It is used in borderland cases which are not quite ill enough for an asylum, and where it is better to get them away from home influence, and in that respect it is exceedingly valuable.

1559. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would it not be better if the punishment in a private house, whatever the nature of it may be, were recorded, and some authorised visit periodically made by an independent party?—I do not think that anything approaching punishment would be right at all in such cases. They are all just incipient cases, and a case which requires locking up at all would be unsuitable for it.

1560. Would not the guardian inform you if that were necessary?—Certainly, to get rid of him.

1561. (By the Chairman.) Recovery in your hands from habitual inebriety is more rare than from lunacy?—It is much more rare.

1562. But that arises from the fact that we have not been treating it properly?—I do not know; but there are more recoveries from lunacy than from habitual drunkenness. [The witness then withdrew.]

Rev. Robert
Pryde.

The Rev. ROBERT PRYDE, M.A., Townhead Parish Church, as representing the Glasgow Presbytery, was called in and examined.

Rev. Robert
Pryde.

1563. (By the Chairman.) You are the minister of Townhead Parish Church?—I am.

1564. You have come here to give us such views on the subject we are inquiring into as commend themselves to your Presbytery?—I come representing a Committee of the Presbytery.

1565. I suppose, like other clergymen, you and your committee have had under consideration the subjects which are to come before us? Is it a Temperance committee?—No; it is the Committee on Life and Work.

1566. You see a very great deal of the effects of intemperance?—Yes, not only in my present charge where I have been for 15 years, but I have also seen the effects in Ayrshire previously, in Aberdeenshire before that, and also in Fifeshire. I have been 27 years minister altogether.

1567. But you have more experience with intemperance here than you had in your other charges?—Undoubtedly.

1568. Do you consider that any interference on the part of the legislature with the liberty of the subject is called for?—I have long thought it the only solution of the question.

1569. Would you be in favour of dealing only with the drunkard who comes before the Police Court as a quasi criminal, or would you deal with the drunkard who is a drunkard simply in the bosom of his family?—I would deal with all parties who might be considered drunkards under the definition of the 1879 Act, whether they had become criminals or not.

1570. And how would you provide for their maintenance?—The only way I can see would be by means of a rate.

1571. Do you think the people would submit to a rate?—I do not think they would if it was heavy, but I do not think it would be heavy, as the statistics of some of our Homes at present show that what is derived from the work of the inmates covers their expenses. In the Lochburn Home, for instance, 88 per cent. of the expense is cleared by what the inmates do.

1572. And you anticipate that you would be able to get a similar amount of work out of the habitual drunkard?—Well, some of the Homes are even higher than that I have mentioned. There is one in Edinburgh that runs us over 100 per cent., but a good many are not up to the 88 per cent.

1573. With respect to the family, we will say, of a man committed as an habitual drunkard, how would you do with him?—Well, that is one of the difficulties that has presented itself to my mind. Of course some provision would need to be made for the wife and children who are unable to support themselves. I fancy that if you impose a rate for the purpose of the Act, that you would need to make some provision also for the maintenance of the wife and children of the poor man.

1574. In connection with your experience on this subject, do you find that habitual drunkenness exists most frequently among the men or the women?—In certain grades of society, and in certain occupations, there is no doubt that the men who are drunkards are in the majority. I think the lower down you go you find that the ratio as between men and women increases, there are more women in the lowest order than you will find in the slightly higher orders.

1575. Do you come across many cases where drunkenness constitutes the curse of a family?—There are hundreds.

1576. Where they pawn everything?—They sell everything they can. There are houses up in my neighbourhood where there is scarcely a thing in the house.

1577. I suppose in those cases both husband and wife drink?—Yes.

1578. I suppose you find very many sad cases, so far as the children are concerned?—There are an enormous number of children who are provided with clothing through the School Board at present.

1579. Have the School Board the power to provide clothing?—Well, they report.

1580. To some charitable organisation?—Yes; the Charity Organisation Society is the society that provides the clothing, but the School Board Officers report as to the cases of children who are often practically naked and need the clothing.

1581. You speak the unanimous opinion of the Committee of the Presbytery you represent?—I cannot say I speak the unanimous opinion of the committee of the Presbytery, as there has been no deliverance to the Presbytery on the matter.

1582. You come as a delegate and may be presumed to represent their opinions?—Yes.

1583. You think that, judging from what you see, public opinion in Scotland is advanced enough to support such propositions as you make?—I have some doubt as to whether in many quarters it is advanced enough at the present moment; but I am convinced it is growing, and has grown within the last 20 years.

1584. I doubt myself whether it is advanced enough to stand the rate, is that the point you have some doubt about?—Principally the rate, but the principle of taking hold of those who are unable to take care of themselves, I think, is pretty universally accepted now.

1585. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I understand you would lock up the habitual drunkard for a time?—Yes.

1586. Instead of sending him to prison for three or four days, would you extend the period of detention?—Yes.

1587. For how long?—As far as I have been able to judge from experience I would put the minimum at three or four months, and run up the maximum to one or two years.

1588. And would you give the committing magistrate the power to decide?—The committing magistrate along with medical officers. You require under the present Act a certificate from two medical men, and probably the length of confinement in each case might depend on the medical evidence.

1589. Have you had experience of a real reclamation of drunkards?—I have had a few experiences, not a large number. I have known one gentleman shut up by his relatives for 12 months. He was in a good business as a solicitor, and he came back and took up his business where he had left it, and has carried it on for 20 years most successfully.

1590. What did they do with him?—They sent him to a Retreat.

1591. But they would not force him to go—he was a consenting party?—It was from pressure from home and on the part of his friends.

1592. Was the Retreat in Scotland?—In one of the Western Islands.

1593. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Would your proposed rate be a special rate or an addition to the Poor Rate?—I fancy it would depend upon what authority you put it under, whether under the County Council or under a more Local Authority such as you have in the Town Council.

1594. Would you be inclined to advocate any help from Imperial sources?—Undoubtedly; because I think we should not work in too limited areas. It is a question which touches large areas, and really becomes an Imperial question—it is for the State as a whole.

1595. But would not you be afraid that this growing public opinion would be a little chilled when they found that they had to pay an extra rate for it?—Well, it might.

1596. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have told the Committee that you know of Homes where the work done makes them self-supporting. Now, assuming that that could be done in the institutions which you propose should be called into existence for habitual drunkards, do you think there would be much necessity for an increased rate?—Not unless you take in hand the maintenance of the wife and family of poor men when these men are in the Homes.

1597. Is it not the case that this is done when they are now in prison?—Yes; the Parochial Board assists them if they need assistance. [The witness then withdrew.]

Rev. Robert
Pryde.
15 Nov. 1894.

The Rev. ROBERT HOWIE, M.A., St. Mary's Free Church, Govan, as representing the Free Presbytery of Glasgow, was called in and examined.

Rev. Robert
Howie.

1598. (By the Chairman.) You give evidence, do you, as an individual?—I give evidence partly as representing the Free Church Presbytery of Glasgow. I am convenor of the Presbytery's Committee who have considered the subjects connected with your inquiry. We had a meeting of the committee first of all, at which we agreed on certain points, and then we had a short reference to the matter in public, and we had a pretty lengthened conference, at which we came to a unanimous judgment on certain points on which I am prepared to make a statement.

Rev. Robert
Howie.

15 Nov. 1894.

1599. Will you please read your statement?—'At Glasgow, 6th November, 1894, the Free Presbytery of Glasgow met and was constituted. Inter alia. The Presbytery then entered into conference on some of the important matters to which the Departmental Committee at present visiting the city is directing its attention: and a very general opinion was expressed that legislative sanction should be given to the compulsory confinement of those who have come to be regarded, and who regard themselves, as inebriates.'

1600. Then the opinion of the Presbytery is surely a head of public opinion in Scotland?—We believe public opinion is very strong on this point, in support of action in the direction indicated. We felt the matter so pressing three years ago that we had a committee dealing with it, with a view to attempting something local.

1601. You mean the Presbytery?—Yes; I mean the Presbytery. We had a committee to deal with the whole question of habitual drunkards, and we were anxious to establish a Retreat under the auspices of the Presbytery, and to raise voluntary funds, but we found, on looking into the matter, one difficulty was in not having power to detain the individuals who might be confined, and looking more fully into the question we felt it had broader aspects than what concerned any single church. The people of this class are outside for the most part all our churches, and we felt it was a question more for the State than the church.

1602. But you say you had ideas about a Retreat?—Yes, something like that at Brownsland.

1603. Where is that?—That is at Peebles. It is supported by voluntary contributions. Some 12 persons are there.

1604. (By Dr. Sutherland.) And the inmates or their friends subscribe 7s. a week?—I think so.

1605. (By the Chairman.) Was it chiefly intended for drunken wives or for husbands?—Mainly for wives, but for drunken husbands also. We intended it in the first instance to be for wives, as their case seemed to those interested to be the worst.

1606. And besides it would be easier to get husbands to maintain the wives under such circumstances than the wives to maintain the husbands?—Yes; the difficulty always is to get some party to undertake the maintenance.

1607. Then how would you propose to deal with the habitual drunkard of the Police Court—the man with the record number of convictions?—We thought that if a man had been confined four different times in the course of the year he should be regarded as an habitual drunkard, and put into one of these Retreats against his will, and treated in the course of two years with a view to his being cured. We think that the state should have the power to deal, without their permission, with those who have been convicted in the Police Courts. We feel, further, that the Act of 1879 should be amended in this way—that it should not be in the option only of the party himself to apply, but that there should be power on the part of the friends or on the part of two duly qualified medical men to have a man committed to one of these Retreats against his will.

1608. But so far as the finances of such a scheme are concerned, what do you think regarding them?—We think that should be thrown upon the Local Authorities throughout the country, probably Government assisting, and that there might be a utilising to a certain extent of some of the accommodation in poorhouses. In many parts of the country you have poorhouses that are not fully occupied. These might be to a certain extent taken advantage of. Of course, they would require to be set apart entirely for habitual drunkards, and not to have the poor associated with them. But I have looked into the question of accommodation that is provided in poorhouses, and the numbers that take advantage, and I am surprised to find there are upwards of 5000 unoccupied places in the various poorhouses of Scotland. Some of these poorhouses in which there are very few people, I think, might very well be taken out of the group to which they belong. You might have a number of groups in Scotland; and here and there over the country have places that could be licensed, and by a combination of the various districts under Local Authorities all the expenses could be met through the rates.

1609. That is a scheme to which the Presbytery is not in any way committed? It is a personal suggestion?—The Presbytery virtually endorsed such a scheme at its meeting. I made a pretty full statement to the Presbytery and every one who had raised any difficulty was very enthusiastic about it, and thought that a scheme of that kind should have support.

1610. You deal largely in statistics?—Yes, I do.

1611. About these remarks to the Presbytery in which you described your scheme, have you a copy of it which you could put in as an appendix?—Yes.

1612. Do you happen to have a report of the speech which you made to the Presbytery?—I have a statement here which contains my views and I will read it. 'The following are the points which I think might with advantage be adopted in any scheme for dealing with habitual drunkards: (1) That the term "Habitual Drunkard" as defined by section 3 of the "Habitual Drunkards Act 1879" should be extended to include any person convicted, or having forfeited a pledge for drunkenness four times in one year; (2) that Retreats or places of detention for such persons be established, upheld, and administered by the Local Authorities; (3) that an habitual drunkard convicted of a crime or any offence of which drunkenness was an element should, instead of being sent to prison, be sent volens volens to a Retreat, and detained there till cured—this principle has been adopted permissively in section 11 of the "Cruelty to Children Act 1894" for habitual drunkards convicted of offences against that Act; (4) that by an extension of clause of the "Industrial Schools Act 1880," on application being made by the School Board or the Procurator Fiscal, the sheriff should be empowered to take the children of habitual drunkards from the control of their parents and send them to an Industrial School—this section gives that power in respect to the children of prostitutes and children living in houses of ill-fame—and (5) that any habitual drunkard though never convicted before a Court or personally applying for admission to a Retreat, may be committed to a Retreat on the application to the Local Authority of two duly qualified medical men, for a period of not less than three months, and not more than three years, such application shall be accompanied by a statutory declaration to the effect that the person named is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Act.' These suggestions were not formally put in that shape to the Presbytery, but I have since conferred with some of those who were present, and we feel that they express very much the views of Presbytery.

1613. You make some reference to some provision in the Cruelty to Children Act. Do you know what section it is?—Section 11.

1614. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you propose rigidly to define an habitual drunkard?—Do you propose to apply it indiscriminately to all people who may be convicted four times a year? Before answering, please bear in mind that working men and industrious persons may, and do, occasionally get drunk four times in the year, and yet can in no sense be classed in that category?—I think if they have been four times in prison for drunkenness in the course of the year they should be classed as habitual drunkards. A great many more may be entitled to be regarded more as habitual drunkards who have never been in prison at all. These are much more difficult to get at, but I am much more interested in them than the others.

1615. Would you be inclined to make any distinction between habitual drunkards having regard to the fact that in one case, although he was four times convicted for drunkenness in a year, it could be shown and proven in Court that he maintained a family and a respectable home; and in the other hand another individual who had been convicted the same number of times had no settled home, was engaged in no settled work; and was in short a waster—would you make no distinction between these classes?—Certainly the better case is the one you should deal with preferentially.

1616. Therefore you depart from your rigid definition?—Yes; I am referring simply to the fact that if a man has been four times a year in prison for drunkenness it gives the State a right to interfere with his liberty. He would require to prove that he is not a habitual drunkard; but I admit at the same time that there are many people who never, from one end of the year to the other, find their way to prison, who are in a worse sense habitual drunkards than those who do get into prison. Some of the drunkards I know only have an outbreak three or four times a year, and they may sustain themselves in a state of sobriety for three or four months at a time; while there are other men that I know, in the ship-building trade more especially, who get drunk almost every pay-day.

1617. But suppose they were put under a curator—suppose the employer was appointed curator?—The employer generally refuses to act as such.

1618. A missionary might take up the position?—Well, they don't care about it.

1619. But if the law appointed some one to look after his earnings on behalf of his dependants, would he not be likely to act?—Yes, I suppose so.

1620. Have you any suggestions to make as to restrictions on pawnbrokers and the vendors of liquor who continued to take body and bad clothing in pawn, or supply drink to persons certified in open Court to be habitual drunkards?—I was going to bring before the Commission in that connection two important statements which I have here. 'The Committee of the British Medical Association, who were appointed to report on legislation for inebriates, draw attention to a Bill which has just been passed in the Legislative Assembly of Natal, and which deals with the compulsory care and treatment of inebriates. The Bill provides that the Governor and Council shall have power to establish and maintain a Retreat; that a judge or a resident magistrate may commit to a Retreat for a term of not less than six months, or more than two years, any person convicted several times before him of drunkenness, or anyone proven to be an inebriate, on the application of a relative, friend, or constable. The committee further express the opinion that were the Home Secretary to include those provisions in his promised Bill, a substantial improvement would be effected in the existing procedure.' There is another statement which I may read,—'A correspondent writing from New Zealand says the police in that colony have the power, if they think a man is injuring his own health or neglecting his family as the result of habitual drinking, to take him before a magistrate and get his drink stopped for 12 months within a radius of 20 miles. After that, any hotel-keeper supplying such a man with drink, and any person privately giving him drink is liable to a fine; and if a prohibited man is found the worse for drink, he is to be arrested at once, and sent to jail for three months hard labour.'

1621. You would impose the same pains and penalties on the pawnbroker who took clothing or furniture from the drunkard—that is a certified drunkard?—It is rather difficult to tell how to deal with that matter, especially when the money is not applied for drink.

1622. But assume that so-and-so is certified, and the pawnbroker like the liquor seller has an intimation of that fact by advertisement and notification?—Yes; if he got a formal intimation then I think he might be punished fairly. I think notification as to any person who has been certified to be an habitual drunkard should be binding on pawnbrokers and publicans.

1623. (By Miss Stevenson.) Referring to the system of providing clothing for poor children by the Charity Organisation, through the agency of the police, do you think that is an encouragement to parents at all to neglect their children, and to make them less likely to be self-denying in the matter of drink?—I can only speak in connection with our free breakfasts. I am a director of the Evangelistic Association, and I have sometimes heard the statement made that a good number of the people who come to get a free breakfast have been spending their money in the public-house on a Saturday night. I have no doubt there is a good deal of truth in that, and the same thing happens in the case of all charity which is administered indiscriminately. I remember when I was minister in the Wynd Church in one of the very worst districts in our city. I found there that the people who came up asking for money generally turned out badly; I have always declined to give money to people on that account in connection with evangelistic work. I do not care about associating philanthropy with such work.

1624. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have told us that you are very familiar with the lower classes of Glasgow, and I suppose of Govan?—I have been 34 years in my ministry in this city and Govan, first in the Wynd Church, then in the neighbourhood of it; and the last 22 years in Govan; and I know the two places.

1625. There is a very interesting fact in regard to the apprehensions for breaches of the peace and disorder in Glasgow and Govan. The number per thousand apprehended is 60 in Glasgow, and in Govan it is only 28. I wish to ask you if you can tell us how there is such a difference of those percentages of apprehensions, and if there is any observable difference in the condition of the people in the streets?—I was very much startled when I saw these figures, because I was not prepared for any difference such as that between Govan and Glasgow. I think Govan is just about as bad as Glasgow. I can only account for it in the different arrangement in connection with apprehensions. There must be greater strictness in Glasgow in apprehending people, and I am afraid Govan cannot present such a clean record by contrast with Glasgow as these figures would indicate; although we must take into account that a part of Govan consists of villas and better-class houses, and we have not the same proportion of apprehensions there, but I know that in some of the streets within the territorial district wrought by my congregation the number of people addicted to drunkenness is very great.

1626. But do you find there is twice the amount of disorder in Govan as there is in Glasgow: are we to believe that the apprehensions are so few in Govan that drunken people go about making the place noisy, while in Glasgow they are all locked up?—I do not know. I would not feel warranted in bringing any charge of remissness against as fine a police force as there is in the kingdom. Captain Hamilton is in my judgment one of the finest specimens of a man at the head of a police force. I know he often does his best by dealing with people in the Police Office, and I know this as a fact. The late Lieutenant Anderson told me himself during his last illness that he had often taken drunkards aside and remonstrated with them, and sent them home instead of locking them up; and that may partly account for the different numbers, but so far as you observe the streets, there is no difference in walking about the two towns.

1627. You are quite familiar with them, and you think there is no greater disorder in Govan than in Glasgow?—I should say there is very much the same, taking them as an average. I daresay that on the pay-days in Govan we are worse than in Glasgow. It becomes cumulative at the pay-time in Govan, but it is more distributed over the whole week in Glasgow, especially in districts such as the Wynd.

1628. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You mentioned a law that had been passed in New Zealand as regards forbidding publicans to supply liquor to habitual drunkards—do you think such a law would be practicable here? In New Zealand the public-houses and the population are very scattered, and every man is more or less known, but here it is different. What is your opinion upon that point?—I am not sure that it is possible. I am only speaking of an admirable arrangement, if it could be carried out.

1629. (By the Chairman.) Have you anything further to say?—No, but I wish to put in a statement by the Rev. Hugh Ross, of St. Stephen's Church. [The witness then withdrew.]

EX-BAILIE DAVID MORRIN, Glasgow, called in and examined.

David
Morris.

16 Nov. 1894.

1630. (By the Chairman.) You are a magistrate of the City of Glasgow?—I was up till the beginning of this month.

1631. How long were you a magistrate?—I was one year a river magistrate and five years a city magistrate.

1632. And during that time you had much experience of habitual and petty offenders?—Yes, during the five years as a burgh magistrate.

1633. And in connection with that experience would you say that a very large proportion of the crime is connected with drunkenness?—I think I am quite right in saying that fully 90 per cent. is attributable to that cause.

1634. Would that apply to petty offenders also?—Not so much to petty offenders as to disorderlies and cases of that kind such as wife-beating and other assaults.

1635. And in connection with the cases of female prisoners brought before you, do you consider that drunkenness has much to do with the charges for solicitation?—Yes; to a very large extent drink is the cause among the female prisoners.

1636. There is no rule I understand among the magistrates as to the sentences imposed in connection with cases of drunkenness?—The magistrates on various occasions have talked the matter over, but they have not come to any definite finding as to the amount of the fines that should be imposed or the days of imprisonment. Of course, 14 days is the highest.

1637. There is so far uniformity that a given number of shillings is held to be equivalent to a given number of days?—As a general rule.

1638. But even that varies at the discretion of the magistrate?—Yes.

1639. Some magistrates give comparatively high sentences and others are very lenient in drunken cases?—I presume as a general rule the fines are 5s. and 7s. 6d. for drunkenness, but some are as low as 2s. 6d., and some cases are dismissed altogether.

1640. Some magistrates dismiss a very large proportion of the cases do they not?—Yes.

1641. The magistrates go about from Court to Court, so that the sentences passed on the prisoners depend very much on the chance of what magistrate deals with the cases?—As a general rule the magistrates have a uniform system.

1642. You are sure of that, are you; can you tell us then what would be the uniform sentence?—Well, I am sure from about 5s. and three days for drunkenness, unless they are habitual drunkards, and then the fine is higher. My own method of proceeding with females is, that if they are repeatedly before the Court I give them the highest number of days I can. That is 14 days.

1643. For being drunk?—Drunk and incapable.

1644. And if it is a case of assault, and drunk and disorderly?—It then depends altogether on the nature of the assault. If it is one of great violence I, as a general rule, give them 60 days.

1645. We were told that a large number of simple drunks are converted into cases of assault, through the fact that the incapable man recovered himself sufficiently to kick the constable on the way to the Police Station?—There are a good many characters of that kind.

1646. And how are they dealt with?—If there are no bruises about the policeman's legs, I have not usually given them more than 21s. and 14 or 15 days, and sometimes I have given them a lighter sentence.

1647. In these cases you speak of in which you gave 60 days, have you found such cases come back before you, or has it been a deterrent sentence?—The moving about from Court to Court makes it difficult to tell whether the same individuals come back again, so that I could not specifically say as to whether these cases in any number have come before the Court or not.

1648. Under the police system evidence was given before a Departmental Committee, the Blue Book of which has been referred to us, to the effect that the English law prescribes a certain punishment for the first offence, and increases it for the second, and increases it still further for the third. There is nothing of that sort I understand in Scotch law. Is there anything like it in Scottish practice?—Our Procurator Fiscal in the Central Court will not give a magistrate information about previous convictions. He holds that it is contrary to the law to give a magistrate any information about a prisoner as to whether he has been before the Court or not.

1649. You are aware that it is a general principle laid down by a recent Act that in no case can evidence of previous convictions be brought forward before the verdict of guilty or not guilty has been pronounced; but that in the case of serious crime previous convictions can then be brought forward before sentence is pronounced. Do you think such a thing would be possible in connection with cases of drunkenness?—I think it is quite within the range of possibility.

1650. Is it feasible in Glasgow, where a large number of drunks are never brought before the magistrate at all, but are dismissed on leaving pledges. —The difficulty our Chief Constable has had in that department is the many aliases they assume. They give different names in going to different Courts, but the habitual people are generally found out, and the police come to know that they are the same parties although they give different names. I think there would not be much difficulty in finding out in a sure enough way who come habitually before the Court, although they give different names.

1651. The suggestion has been made that the status of an habitual drunkard should be constituted to a certain extent in this and in connection with other matters by the frequency of his arrests or convictions for drunkenness. Do you think that would be done in a big town like Glasgow?—I think so, to a large extent.

1652. Do you see any difficulty by having a man connected with the police whose duty it would be to go from Police Office to Police Office and get the returns. Do you see any difficulty in such a man getting a pretty general knowledge of the names and identity of the prisoners?—I do not see any difficulty at all.

1654. Do you believe that any good would be effected by keeping a register of convictions, so that a man might perhaps, as was suggested, not be punished at all for the first offence, but dismissed and registered, and treated possibly on the second occasion in the same way but registered again, and then on the third appearance dealt with more seriously and after a certain number of convictions be liable to be dealt with by the police as an habitual drunkard; that is to say instead of being brought before the magistrate and dealt with simply, being brought on a charge of habitual drunkenness, and remitted by the magistrate to the sheriff to have the case investigated?—You at once introduce the question as to what an habitual drunkard is, and there is a possibility that I may have a different opinion from some magistrates as to what an habitual drunkard is.

1655. Our proposal was that after a certain number of convictions, you as a magistrate, in dealing with a great many drunks would not have time to go elaborately into the case, which might be a serious matter, but that the evidence of a certain number of convictions should be given to you, and that you should remit the case to the sheriff who would decide whether he is or is not an habitual drunkard?—It would depend again altogether on circumstances. For instance if I found a workman who got drunk and was brought before the Court, but who all the rest of the time wrought and kept his house and family, even although that man was brought before me six times in the year, I would not be disposed to send him on to the sheriff to be dealt with in a severe manner.

1656. The suggestion made to us is that he should be sent on to the sheriff on the charge of being an habitual drunkard. Of course it would be for the sheriff to ascertain whether he complied with the definition of an habitual drunkard or not, and I wish to know if you approve of that suggestion, which has been made by several witnesses. I am glad that we have an objection and that we may hear other views?—I would not be disposed to send on a case except of this nature. When a man or woman drinks to excess, their system is soon overpowered with alcohol, so that they simply cannot stop drinking until they pawn everything they can lay their hands on. These cases are well-known. I would be disposed to call a man or woman like that an habitual drunkard, and the sheriff might deal with that case; but the workman who only gets drunk occasionally when he gets his pay, even if it goes the length of six times a year, it would be rather severe to send a man like that to the sheriff.

1657. But how would these coincident circumstances come under your notice. There is no crime in a man pawning his own goods. How would the circumstances come before the magistrates?—A man of that kind as a general rule is not living with his wife and family. He is so given over to drinking habits that he has thrown the reins of Government, both as regards his own conduct and his family completely aside; and I think these are the class of cases I would be disposed to get the sheriff to deal with.

1658. You spoke about pawning and so forth. How would such circumstances come under your notice?—

The policemen know every one of these cases by name and conduct. They know them individually.

1659. Take the case of a man who is living with his wife, and who when he was drunk thrashed her, and did so frequently on pay nights?—These are the very cases I have in my mind just now. I have met with a good many of them, and I have often thought the sentence magistrates were capable of giving them was not sufficient.

1660. I suppose you find it very difficult getting evidence from the wives?—In some cases the wives do not care about going before the Court, but when it becomes habitual, the wives are often only too glad to get rid of them.

1661. There is some provision in English Law which enables the magistrate to give judicial separation in cases where the wives are brutally treated?—I am not aware that we have any power of that kind in Scotland.

1662. We have heard a great deal about 'finish' drinks. Have you anything to say about them?—These cases as a rule are also well-known to the police. They are found more amongst females than the males. I have had cases repeatedly before me in which the policeman ventured the remark that this was a party who was in the habit of drinking methylated spirits or 'finish.'

1663. Where did they get that?—In the apothecary's and other shops. You buy as much for about a penny as will make a five-gill bottle.

1664. Do you see any way of checking the sale of these intoxicants, by means of any amendment of the Licensing Laws, for instance?—I understand that all poisons sold by druggists are bound to have a label on them.

1665. But this would be asked for I presume as 'finish' for the purpose of polishing furniture?—Yes, I understand that is the method of procedure that is adopted in order to deceive the chemist.

1666. Sometime ago in the north of Ireland there was a great deal of attention directed to the subject of drunkenness through ether drinking. Is there anything of that kind here?—I have never heard of anything but 'finish'; that is the regular thing that is taken here.

1667. Have you any suggestions to make in connection with the treatment of habitual offenders, and especially habitual offenders whose case is due to drink?—My impression is that habitual drunkards should be confined in some place for a period perhaps of three or six months, as the case may be.

1668. About the definition of an habitual drunkard. Here is the definition under the Act of 1879:—'Habitual drunkard means a person, who not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy is notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking 'of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself 'or herself or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself, and his or her affairs?—These are cases that I think should be sent to a Home or Retreat, or you may select a poorhouse, as I understand there is plenty room in the poorhouses where they might be sent to.

1669. In the case of a magistrate remitting a man after repeated cases of drunkenness to a sheriff it would fall to the sheriff to decide whether he came within that description or not. He would have to decide whether by reason of intoxicating liquors he was at times dangerous to himself and others, and incapable of managing himself and his affairs?—I do not think there would be any difficulty in producing evidence to prove that.

1670. Would that obviate your objection to sending a man to be dealt with by the sheriff?—Oh yes, if evidence of that kind were to be taken.

1671. Do you think the sentence for drunkenness permitted by the law at present should be increased in such cases as the sheriff held that, while the man had a great number of convictions against himself, he did not consider him an habitual drunkard, and could not send him to a Retreat. Do you think the sheriffs should have any longer powers of sentence?—I think the sheriff should have the power in cases of that kind of going the length of 60 days.

Morris.

16 Nov. 1894.

1672. You speak about sending these men to certain institutions, have you any suggestion to make as to how these institutions should be supported?—I think they should be supported by the Government.

1673. You would not go in for any support out of the local rates?—Well the Government at present pays the expenses of their being kept in prison.

1674. Yes, but a good number of them oscillate between the prison and the poorhouse, and the latter is supported by local rates?—In the latter case then their cost would fall on the local rates.

1675. The locality pays for the poorhouse?—Habitual drunkards are offenders against the nation and society.

1676. That is true but we want to allocate the cost of their maintenance?—The cost at present could easily be ascertained; and my impression is that all offenders within the municipality might have the expense incurred in connection with them paid by the municipality.

1677. That is not the case at present?—No.

1678. And that would impose an additional tax on the municipality?—But the Government would relieve us of the tax in other ways, because the Government would tax the people for their upkeep.

1679. Yes, but that would hardly do, because the Government taxes the whole people, and in this case you would have Glasgow taxed for a large portion of the expenses that at present fall on Barmine, and which is defrayed out of the national resources?—Those cases that you have referred to come under the cognisance of the Local Authorities, the expenses connected with them could easily be borne by the Local Government.

1680. By what Local Government?—Glasgow.

1680a. By the municipality?—Yes.

1681. And by the County Council?—Yes as representing the counties.

1682. But you have not thought out any definite scheme?—In regard to Retraites I think Government should make it a national tax.

1683. Chancellors of the Exchequer are not very fond of making national taxes?—As a general rule they do it nevertheless.

1684. Have you come across any case of habitual drunkenness that you think should be dealt with that does not come under the category of quasi criminals?—In a private capacity?

1685. Yes?—No, our police as a rule find the man who gets drunk on the street.

1686. We have found that there is an enormous excess of arrests in Glasgow over Govan and the rest of the Kingdom. Can you explain why that is?—Well, in regard to the question of prostitution for instance in Glasgow compared with any large English town, I think that the law in Scotland is administered on the whole in a general way over the country, but as compared with England it is very much different. Prostitution in English towns the police authorities pay little or no attention to, but in Glasgow the police are very vigilant, and our streets are comparatively free.

1687. That was a matter of considerable discussion—there was a great outcry about the streets of Glasgow—some time ago, and there has been an enormous improvement of late years?—A remarkable improvement.

1688. But there is an extraordinary discrepancy between the arrests in Glasgow and in Govan. In Govan there are only 28 per thousand, whereas in Glasgow there are 60?—I understand that the method of procedure in Govan with a great many cases is that when a policeman finds a drunk man near to his home he endeavours to get that man home, rather than take him to the Police Office, while I am afraid very much that in Glasgow there is not much of that kind of thing done at all. I am afraid that nearly all those who are apprehended on our pavements, our closes, or streets, even though they may be near their own homes, are taken by the policeman to the Police Office.

1689. Which system do you approve of?—It would depend to a certain extent upon the nature of the individual.

1690. I mean for the treatment of a big community?—If, for instance, the policeman know these people, and if they are not of a violent nature while under the influence of drink, I think it is much better to take them to their homes.

1691. But I suppose there cannot be a very great difference between drunkenness in Glasgow and Govan?—No, but there are some men who are very violent, and others who are prayerful, and others again who sing songs. I have often thought that it would be much more humane if the police, when they found a drunk man perhaps about the close-mouth where he lives, and knowing that, if they were simply to put him into his own house. A great many cases of that kind have been found where the people were got to their own homes.

1692. If he were sufficiently drunk that might be good, but if he happened to be in a quarrelsome state?—That is just the danger, where the wife and family might be brutally used if a man in that condition was taken into his own house.

1693. But I suppose the system of Glasgow commands the approval of the Glasgow magistrates, and that the Glasgow magistrates are responsible for the condition of the orders under which the policemen act?—Yes.

1694. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Are you aware that Sir Charles Cameron has just drawn a comparison between Glasgow and Govan, but that Glasgow is an exceptional place, not only as compared with England but as compared with the rest of Scotland?—Glasgow, I know, is worse than either the rest of Scotland or England for apprehensions.

1695. And worse, not by 5 or 10, but by 30 per cent.?—In the apprehensions we have an enormous number of them for very trivial matters. We have boys brought up in great numbers for kicking pieces of paper on the street in the form of a ball, and any number of lads who are perhaps found standing at the street corner and obstructing the free passage of the people. We get such cases brought up in great quantities. The apprehensions with regard to football-playing on the streets are enormous in the football season, and it is a difficult matter for the magistrate to know how to deal with them—and I speak all their minds—because if it happens to be a damp day and the ball flies up and goes against the passengers the ladies get their dresses soiled, or the passengers get their ankles kicked. As I say, there is an enormous number of little boys from 6 to 12 years brought up for such offences as these.

1696. Then how does Govan do when the ladies get their dresses soiled?—I do not know how Govan does as a general rule, but I know I have found very great difficulty in knowing how to deal with them. As a general rule, unless the offenders have been before the Court once or so before, I send them home.

1697. But they are locked up all night?—If their parents are known they cite them to appear.

1698. Without requiring any pledge?—No pledge.

1699. And do you think, on the whole, that the police of Glasgow are not more officious than they should be? Do you think it is expedient to carry out their orders to such an extreme?—I have gone along the streets of Glasgow during the time of my magistracy when I was not known, just to see how they act on the streets. In cases where there was a row occurring, and I have repeatedly seen the police trying to get people to go away without taking them in charge.

1700. (By the Chairman.) Drunken people?—Disorderly people.

1701. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You might explain?—Well, two men who might wish to fight, and I have repeatedly seen the police, instead of apprehending these people, advising them to go home. I have seen them do that two or three times before they would apprehend them, and I have been very much gratified to see that, especially when I was not known to the crowd.

David
Morris.

16 Nov. 1894.

1702. But there the fact remains, and it is a very peculiar one, of the difference of practice between two places which are practically one place!—That is the only explanation I am capable of giving. Govan is a comparatively small place compared with Glasgow, and my impression is that the police know the people individually, and that when they find them near their homes they take them there instead of taking them to the Police Office.

1703. You have talked about giving the sheriff authority to shut up habitual drunkards for two or three months, do you think there is reason to hope that at the end of two or three months' seclusion the habitual drunkard would be brought round to a right physical life!—Well, it would give him an opportunity for a new start in life, which otherwise he does not get, and I would be very hopeful that in a great many cases that would be the result.

1704. And you would think two or three months would be enough!—I think six months would be enough, because the alcohol would be entirely out of his system, and he would be able to start life afresh.

1705. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Have the police in Govan got the same powers as those in Glasgow?—Yes; exactly the same.

1706. To what do you ascribe the greater zeal of the Glasgow police over the Govan police?—I would not be disposed to say that the Glasgow police are more vigilant in endeavouring to keep our streets in good order than the Govan police are. But Govan being a comparatively small place compared with Glasgow, and the individuals there known to the police, out of humanity, I presume—and there is nothing against it in law—they take them home instead of taking them to the Police Office.

1707. Are the police more numerous in Glasgow in proportion to the population, than they are in Govan?—I think so. In Glasgow they are one to every 550 of the population.

1708. Are the police in Glasgow kept to the same beats, or are they moved about?—They keep to the same beats for a considerable length of time, unless the Chief Constable thinks it advisable that they should be moved from one beat to another.

1709. Well, then, the Glasgow police would know the people by headmark as well as the Govan police?—Yes, they know a good many; but in Glasgow you have a population of a migratory character, and a great many strangers come in from the country. In the Central Court, in my own experience, I have found a great many cases which were in from the country, people having been found drunk in the centre of the town.

1710. Do you think the police are more vigilant in Glasgow? Would you say they were kept more strictly up to the mark by the magistrates?—If I were to say they were kept more strictly up to the mark than the Govan police it would be a reflection on the Govan police, and I would not care to say that.

1711. You have told us a great proportion of the crime is caused through drink?—Above 90 per cent.

1712. Do you think the drink and the crime absolutely stand to one another in the light of cause and effect?—Yes.

1713. Might it not be a coincidence that a man might happen to have some drink at the time he commits the crime?—I believe in the large majority of cases the crime would not be committed except for drink.

1714. Do you go as far as to say that if drink were abolished we should have no crime?—Oh no; you have human nature to contend with. But to a very large extent you would escape the thefts and crimes that are committed in this country if drink were abolished.

1715. But do you think crime would still go on if drink were abolished?—You might have theft, for instance, but I do not think you would have very many of those street brawls, and fights, and cases of disorderly conduct. These would to a large extent cease.

1716. And crimes of violence?—Yes.

1717. You don't approve of the working man who takes occasional bouts of drinking being brought before the sheriff, as the sheriff's inquiry, being an open one, might damage his character?—Well, the man would have been detained for some time before he would be dealt with by the sheriff. I speak of a man who would be working and keeping his family, although he gets drunk when he gets his pay. He sleeps it off notwithstanding, and when he does that he is able to start and work again for another fortnight. I do not consider that class should be regarded as habitual drunkards at all.

1718. It is his form of amusement—Oh, well!

1719. I think you told us your definition of the habitual drunkard was different from the common definition. How does it differ?—I have come to the conclusion, with my practical experience in the Police Courts, that I would define an habitual drunkard to be this:—When a man drinks to excess, his system is so overpowered with alcohol that he simply throws aside absolutely the reins of government, either for himself or his wife and family, and who continues to drink as long as he can get a single farthing in any way whatever. Those are men who are a disgrace to themselves and to their families, and a nuisance to society.

1720. Do you think that class is increasing in Glasgow?—I do not know if it is. I think it is increasing among the females.

1721. Do you think that six months would be long enough to reclaim a man?—I think so.

1722. Don't you think that when you have got the alcohol out of the tissues that a new craving would set in afterwards?—Don't you think six months too short?—Perhaps a medical authority would be better able to give an opinion than I am, but I think six months for a man who was a healthy man would do. His whole system would be completely regenerated by that time, and his mental powers would be in exercise in a way different from what they were when he was first placed in detention. His will power would be stronger.

1723. You don't believe in short sentences?—No.

1724. Do you think they have a deterrent effect on people who are just beginning to drink?—No, I do not think so.

1725. Don't you think they pull up a man who is afraid of the disgrace of appearing before the sheriff?—No.

1726. As to drinking finish, I suppose people drink it because it is cheap?—They can get as much for a penny as will make a five gill bottle.

1727. Is the drunkenness produced by the finish worse than ordinary drunkenness?—Yes, the finish is much more deleterious to the system than ordinary drink, and on that account makes people more outrageous.

1728. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have said that in the majority of cases drink is the cause of the petty offences?—Yes.

1729. In your experience have you not found that in petty thefts, more particularly in the case of women, that petty thefts of a pair of old boots or some trivial thing like that, are almost invariably associated with drink, either by the offender having taken a small amount of drink and wanting to get more, or wishing simply to have a drink?—My experience is that thefts of the kind you have referred to are thefts for the purpose of pawing the goods and getting drink.

1730. And it would be perfectly right, therefore, to consider that a very large proportion of the offences which are entered as thefts, are really thefts in connection with drink?—A great many of them.

1731. With the petty offenders a large proportion?—Yes.

1732. Why does the custom maintain, do you know, of paying workmen every 14 days instead of weekly? Or is it amongst a certain number of trades or occupations that that prevails?—There has been an agitation amongst the men themselves who are paid by the fortnight for weekly wages, and I think a very large

David
Morris.

Morris.

16 Nov. 1894.

number of firms have adopted the system of paying weekly wages. But I cannot speak regarding the proportion of the one and the other.

1733. Is it the custom in different trades, or how is it?—There are a great many trades which pay weekly.

1734. Is it special trades which pay only fortnightly?—I cannot say about that. I think our large public works, for instance, such as the Caledonian Railway Company and others, perhaps find it more convenient. But I would myself prefer weekly payments.

1735. You have said a large number of habitual offenders are essentially drunkards, but there are cases of habitual offenders who are not drunkards—silly people and so on?—Not many.

1736. But there are such?—Their silliness arises, perhaps, in consequence of their drinking.

1737. But don't you think there are cases of slight mental weakness, without alcohol entering into the question?—I have come across a case of that kind occasionally, but as a general rule I have been able to discover it by the appearance of the person brought before me, and have called in a doctor to discover as to their mental condition.

1738. I mean in cases of malicious mischief?—Sometimes; not very many.

1739. What would you do in a case like this—where a weak-minded woman or man gets troublesome to the police?—The asylum I think is the place.

1740. But they might not be bad enough to say they were insane? There are a large number on the margin between sanity and insanity.—You will find many cases of that kind that are perfectly quiet and harmless. As long as they are in a position like that I would let them remain at home.

1741. But if they become a trouble to the community?—Then I should say the community should remove them to some Home of some kind, where they could be taken charge of.

1742. The treatment they would receive in a prison would hardly be suitable for them?—Not in my opinion.

1743. They would want a milder form of restraint?—More like a Home.

1744. You say you would have these offenders locked up in Retreats for some time?—Certainly.

1745. You would try to make the institution, so far as it could be, self-sustaining, so as to remove the burden from the community?—Yes.

1746. And therefore you would not hesitate to introduce such employment as would really pay?—I think that would be imperative.

1747. To have really a paying occupation?—I think to put them in a Home without work would be to manufacture lunatics.

1748. You would not occupy them in teasing oakum?—I think you might put them to a more remunerative or useful occupation than that. If they were tradesmen I would put them to their trade.

1749. And in fact you would work to produce the best reformatory effect upon the man and the best financial result to the establishment?—Yes.

1750. Why, when you thought that there was no practical good in short sentences to these unfortunate people, did you impose them?—Well, if people got it into their heads that they could get drunk, to appear on our streets, and to be found lying on our pavements and in our closes, and they were taken to a Court and the magistrate simply dismissed them, my impression is that they might in that way be encouraged instead of deterred from drinking.

1751. And you do think, then, that some convivially disposed man, or two or three men and women who meet in a public-house, consider before the drinking begins what the end or result may be?—I am afraid they do not sufficiently, but if the sentences were heavy there is a possibility they would.

1752. You think that a man with the drink craving would really be checked by beginning to think, in the process of drinking, what the end of it might be?—The man who has the drink craving I do not believe would consider either one thing or another. He would simply drink, and he would not consider what the consequences would be at all.

1753. Then the committing for even the short sentences that you have imposed has had in your opinion the effect of reducing the possible spread of drunkenness?—Not to any great extent.

1754. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the case of boys who are taken up by the police for petty disturbances, are those cases included in the returns which we have here, making up the total apprehensions for petty assaults, breaches of peace, and drunk and disorderlies?—The Chief Constable has included them all, I think, in his list of apprehensions.

1755. Are the cases of boys taken up by the police for petty offences included in the returns which we have had given us of the apprehensions in the city?—I do not know what returns you have got, but I believe they are included in the apprehensions in the return given to the magistrates.

1756. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Might I state that these offences are excluded from the returns supplied to the Committee by the Chief Constable?—But not from the return supplied to the magistrates.

1757. (By Miss Stevenson.) In regard to the sentences which you say you are in the habit of imposing upon persons for drunkenness, I understood you to say, especially in the case of women, you were in the habit of giving the longest period of detention that you could—why do you make the distinction between men and women?—Because I find that the class of women to which I refer are just the very class that I would be glad to give 60 days to, instead of 14, if I had the power. They are a nuisance to themselves, to society, and to every person they come in contact with.

1758. Are the men not equally a nuisance?—No. The men have to work for their wives and families, and the women have not.

1759. Then is it simply because the men are the bread-winners?—My impression is that the females who drink sink lower into the gutter than men do. That is my experience. They become more depraved than the men do.

1760. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What object would you have in sending drunk women to prison for 60 days?—The object I would have in view would be to try and redeem the woman if possible from the conduct that she has been pursuing for some time.

1761. Then it is not so much to punish her that you send her to prison as to redeem her?—Yes.

1762. And do you think the prison is the best place for the redemption of fallen or drunken woman?—No; I do not think so.

1763. Then would you consider a punitive sentence of 60 days excessive for the offence of drunkenness?—Certainly.

1764. That is, were it contrasted with the sentences passed for indictable offences such as serious assaults, &c.?—Yes.

1765. Would you tell the Committee why section 14 of the Public House Act, 1862, is not enforced in regard to supplying drink to intoxicated people, and drunk people being seen coming out of public-houses in a beastly state of intoxication?—That is a question that has engaged the attention of the magistrates repeatedly, and the Chief Constable's attention has been repeatedly called to that phase of the question at meetings of the magistrates. His difficulty is this, that while a man may be seen coming out of a public-house under the influence of drink, they have no proof that the parties thus seen coming out of the public-house were supplied with drink while in that house. That is the difficulty that I know the Chief Constable has to contend with. I have on many occasions had cases of this kind before me—men brought up for creating a disturbance in a public-house simply because the publican or assistant would not supply them with drink, and they became violent in consequence of this refusal to supply them with drink.

1766. Is a policeman in uniform the best man to ascertain whether a publican has supplied drink to a drunk person, or sent persons who entered sober, drunk out of his premises?—I think the policeman who would not be in uniform, and would thus not be known, would be the best man. He would find out the facts much easier than the policeman in uniform.

1767. Is it not within your experience that under the Further Powers (Glasgow) Bill policemen in plain clothes have been much more successful in clearing the streets of a certain class than formerly?—Yes.

1768. Would not the same thing be likely to take place with the abuses falling under section 14 of the Public Houses Act?—I would be hopeful that the same good results would follow.

1769. And if a person were certified say by the sheriff or two Justices of the Peace to be an habitual drunkard, would you be inclined to place further restrictions on the pawnbroker and liquor-seller?—I think that when a man has been convicted before the sheriff of being an habitual drunkard, that both the pawnbroker and the publican should be certified to that extent, and if they were found supplying them with drink, after being certified to that effect, I would make that an offence.

1770. For the pawnbroker taking furniture or clothing?—Yes.

1771. You speak of giving remunerative and instructive work—have you considered the attitude of the Trades Unions, in regard to work done in prisons?—The Trades' Unions, in my opinion, can raise no objection to this work being done in prison, when that work is not sold by the prison authorities under the prices that are being charged for work done under Trades Union rate of wages.

1772. (By the Chairman.) In connection with these boys you referred to—that are brought up for playing football on the streets and such like—you said that you would not sentence a boy unless he had been frequently up?—I think it is a general rule for the first offence simply to admonish them.

1773. Say the second offence, what sort of sentence would you give?—For playing football I have admonished them for a single offence, but in order to prevent them from continuing it I have sometimes felt it to be my duty to fine them a ls. with no alternative of imprisonment.

1774. Which means that the parents had to pay the fine?—Yes.

1775. Do you know of any cases in which boys have been sent to prison?—Not unless they were habitual offenders.

1776. Well then if they were habitual offenders they come under our remit in a double way, and I should like to know what would be done in the case of a boy brought up say for playing football in the street?—I have not made any special inquiry regarding whether the parents paid the fines or not, but my impression is that they usually do so.

1777. You do not know then of boys being sent to prison for these offences?—I know of boys being sent to prison for obstructing the streets and sometimes they are guilty of obscene language and cursing and swearing, but these are bigger lads.

1778. What is the youngest boy you can recall that you have imposed a sentence of imprisonment upon?—I have been very careful about imposing sentences of imprisonment upon little boys at all. I have felt it to be my duty to break them down and get them to feel their position. I have sometimes sent them down into the cell, and after the Court was over have gone down to them and tried to get them to feel their position, and when they showed that they did so I have sent them off.

1779. Do you know of any cases, or has your attention been called to any cases of boys being sent to prison for thefts?—I have not hesitated when I found boys were several times before the Police Court for thieving to send them to be whipped. I prefer that to sending them to prison.

1780. Have the police magistrates power to inflict corporal punishment?—Yes.

1781. To what extent?—You can sentence a boy to receive ten stripes.

1782. Is that the general practice among the Glasgow magistrates?—No; I do not think so.

1783. They prefer sending them to prison?—Well, David Morrin. it is my feeling that they rather do.

1784. You cannot give any definite information?—No, I cannot.

16 Nov. 1894.

1785. I have some returns in my hand from Duke Street Prison, showing the admissions of unfortunates for the last two weeks in September 1891 as compared with 1894. The figures also classify all the prisoners in Duke Street, on one day in September 1891, and one day in September 1894, and on Saturday the 27th October in 1894; and I find that on the day in September 1891, there were 65 cases of women imprisoned for importuning, and that on the day in September 1894, there were 80 cases of women for importuning, and on the 27th October 1894, there were no fewer than 145 cases of women in for importuning. Would that indicate that any special orders had been given by the Chief Constable or by the magistrates for a raid on that class of offenders?—I do not think so. I am not aware of any raid on that day.

1786. Nor could there have been a raid on the 27th October?—No.

1787. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) That is the number of female prisoners in custody?—The Chairman gives the figures as 145 on 27th October 1894, and 65 on a given day in 1891, I cannot explain the difference. I do not know of any reason why that should be the case.

1788. (By the Chairman.) The magistrates take fortnightly turns of duty?—Yes.

1789. And do you think it might depend upon the sitting magistrate?—To a certain extent.

1790. Do some magistrates deal more severely with that class of offenders than others?—I believe there are some magistrates who are more lenient than others, in regard to importuning.

1791. Is there any other point you would like to bring before the Committee?—Well, about importuning, I have a very interesting case which I might give you as a sample. A girl was brought before me the last time I was in the Central Court, and I could see by her youth and her whole appearance that she was simply beginning this system of life. Before I passed sentence upon her, I tried in every way I could to find out where she belonged to. She would give me her name, but not the name of her father, or where he lived, and in order to try and be successful in my inquiry, I sentenced her to a fine of £2, with the alternative of 30 days' imprisonment. Immediately at the close of the Court, I instructed Superintendent Orr to bring that girl into the magistrates' room. He did so, and I had a private conversation with her. I showed her the fearful life that she was commencing to live, and that in all probability she would not live very many years if she continued that course of life. I said 'Now, I have sentenced you to 30 days' imprisonment, but I do not wish you to go to prison at all, if you will give me the name of your father and your father's address. And if I find them to be correct, and if he is willing to take you home, I shall have you liberated at once.' After some serious conversation with her she agreed to give me the name and address of her father. I called in Superintendent Orr, who took down the name and address of her parent in Aberdeenshire, and he communicated with the police authorities in Aberdeenshire at once, and in two or three days we had a reply back to the effect that the address was correct, that the father was anxious that she should go home, and that if we would make arrangements to send her to Aberdeen, they would refund all expenses; and that some of her friends would be at the station to meet her. I at once got authority and had a document written out for her liberation.

1792. You got authority for her liberation?—Yes, two magistrates can give that, the magistrate who sent her and another magistrate. We sent her home and the Chief Constable of Aberdeenshire writes within the last week in reply to a letter from our Chief Constable, stating that this girl is doing remarkably well. She is staying with a sister, and she is going into a situation during the winter. When she has been in the situation for some time the Chief Constable of Aberdeenshire has promised again to correspond with our Chief Constable here. I have been remarkably gratified with this case. I have done that repeatedly, but that is one case that I have been greatly pleased with.

1793. What age was she?—Eighteen.

1794. Have you any other point you wish to bring up?—No; I give you that case, because I think if something of that kind were tried, such as the communicating with their parents or sending them to some institution, it would be much better than sending them to prison.

Miss J. F.
Miller.

Miss J. F. MILLER, Matron of Glasgow Prison, called in and examined.

David Morrin.

16 Nov. 1894.

1795. But is there not a great deal of importuning carried on by elderly women?—Yes, but you cannot redeem them.

1796. (By Col. M'Hardy.) There is nothing that prevents you taking the course you have described in any case you like?—No.

1797. (By the Chairman.) Can you give us a reference as to where you get that power?—It is in the Glasgow Police Act of 1866.

1798. Will you please fill in the section which gives two magistrates the power to do this?—Yes, Section 126 of Glasgow Police Act, 1866. [Witness then withdrew.]

Miss J. F.
Miller.

1799. (By the Chairman.) You have been 32 years in prison service?—Yes.

1800. And you have passed 12½ years in the General Prison in Perth, and 19½ as the Matron of Glasgow Prison?—Yes.

1801. Glasgow is the largest female prison in Scotland?—Yes.

1802. Would you mention its daily population, and the percentage it affords of the entire prison population?—Its daily female population is 375, or 58 per cent. of the whole of Scotland.

1803. What is the number of female commitments?—10,769 for the year, or 60 per cent. of all Scotland.

1804. There are besides females a few untried male prisoners in Glasgow Prison?—Yes.

1805. The evidence you propose to give relates to females?—Yes.

1806. You have prepared tables relating to 411 women in prison on the 26th September 1894, and showing the number of female prisoners committed during the two last weeks in September 1891, and the two last weeks in September 1894, including an analysis of their ages, offences, sentences, and occupations?—Yes; I hand these in. (See Appendix.)

1807. What generally are the conclusions to which these tables point in your view?—They point to the very short sentences and to the number of young persons coming in. Out of that 442 there are only six committed for 60 days at the first period, and three at the other time.

1808. And these were the longest sentences you had?—Yes, for these two weeks. There were only six prisoners in the two weeks of 1891, and for the same period of 1894, there were only three prisoners, with 60 days. The others were under that.

1809. What other suggestions occur to you from the consideration of these tables?—They suggest the great number of short sentences.

1810. The commitments average about 10,000 a year?—Yes.

1811. They have slightly increased from 1885 as compared with 1893?—Yes, in the first year they numbered 9959; and in the latter 10,769.

1812. Do you attribute that to the closing of prisons in Lanark and neighbouring counties?—Not much, but to a slight extent it explains the increase.

1813. The 10,000 commitments do not at all represent 10,000 individuals?—Oh no, the same individuals are in so often. The individuals make about 3300.

1814. That is only a third of the total?—Yes, about that.

1815. And of the 3300 individuals there are a considerable number who are habitual offenders?—I consider that about 350 are habituals. That is a rough calculation.

1816. What is your view as to the method of dealing with female prisoners. Do you think short sentences and frequent imprisonment has a good or a bad effect?—I consider they have a bad effect.

1817. In fact you do not think these short sentences are feared?—No, they are rather welcomed.

1818. And your opinion is that these brief rests in prison are of not much value as a deterrent, but that they seem to serve to prepare them for renewed periods of drunkenness?—Yes.

1819. You state that any suggestions that you have in the way of treating them with a view to their reclamation are founded upon close and intimate observation of these women through many years, and that many types of temperament and disposition are to be found among the class who fill the prisons. You think that one hard and fast line of treatment over all would not be a success, and therefore you propose some classification of them?—Yes.

1820. Would you just give us that classification?—My classification is:—(1) aged; (2) the docile and easily managed; (3) the undisciplined who are well behaved under strict discipline and cellular confinement; and (4) the refractory or incorrigible, who, in whatever kind of institution they are placed, require firm handling. The period of detention should be a long one and the institutions graded—for the first class fewest in number, perhaps four per cent. of the whole, the power to detain in the poorhouse is desirable. These women as a rule have no settled home, and follow no occupation after they have entered upon a career of dissipation.

1821. As to the next class, the docile and easily managed, that is the class I presume with whom you come in contact in your capacity as a member of the Committee of the Houses of Shelter in Hill Street and Whitevale Street?—Yes.

1822. Do you think that much could be done by training them to useful work in such institutions?—Yes.

1823. And that is how you propose to deal with your second class?—Yes.

1824. You don't give any details of what you would do with the third class, the undisciplined who are well behaved under strict discipline and cellular confinement?—No.

1825. You don't see what could be done with them I suppose?—Not at once; but perhaps they could be passed on through time to a Home.

1826. Aged are only about three or four per cent. of the whole?—Yes.

1827. The docile and easily managed; what percentage would they constitute?—Well they are in a minority.

1828. Would you say there would be a third?—There might be about that.

1829. You have got a good lot in Whitevale and Hill Street?—Whitevale 70, and 50 in Hill Street.

1830. Are these the habituals you are talking about—the 350 you have classified?—Some of them are habituals, but the larger proportion are of the docile and well-behaved and more hopeful lot.

1831. You told us there were 350 habituals—it is with regard to these that you are making your suggestions, is it not?—Yes.

1832. Well you have 120 of these in the Homes as a rule?—We have some, but they are first offenders usually.

1833. Well then, the 350, they are chiefly among your third and fourth classes?—Yes.

1834. You can make no suggestion about them?—Nothing further than that the prison does them no good.

1835. And these are particularly the classes that we should like to see our way to deal with—habitual offenders?—Detention in a suitable place for a long time,

Miss J. F.
Miller.

18 Nov. 1894.

Miss J. F.
Miller.

18 Nov. 1894.

and healthy outdoor employment would be a good thing, laundry work would suit.

1836. Take the 350, they are generally for very short periods?—Yes.

1837. You give here a table which you will hand in of female prisoners in custody on the 26th September 1894, including liberations and admissions 411—and giving the number of times which they have been in your charge. It shows that 47 of the 411 were in for the first time, 37 for the second time, 30 for the third, 31 for the fourth, 25 for the fifth, 67 from the sixth to the tenth, 62 from the eleventh to the nineteenth, 23 from the twentieth to the forty-ninth, 23 from the fiftieth to the ninety-ninth, and 26 for the hundredth time and upwards?—Yes.

1838. Do these figures make any suggestion to your mind?—Yes; I think the sentences should be longer.

1839. These 26 women who are in upwards of 100 times, what sort of women are they, or what are they in for?—Chiefly for being drunk and disorderly. They are just useless women.

1840. Many of them silly?—Many of them half-silly; useless in prison.

1841. These are the women who go between the prison and the poorhouse?—Yes.

1842. It has been suggested there should be powers given to the poorhouse authorities to detain women of that class?—It would be very desirable. We get so many of that class, and they can do nothing in prison. They are not able for any work.

1843. Then you tabulate the prisoners' ages and show that you have 1 of 15 years of age; 1 of 16; 53 of 17 to 21; 180 of 22 to 30; 98 of 31 to 40; 50 from 41 to 49; and 28 of 50 and upwards?—Yes.

1844. That would show that your women are a very short-lived class, if you have so few of 50 and upwards, does it not?—We have had them 74 years of age, but the proportion of those above 50 is small and suggests short lives.

1845. What would that old lady be in for?—We had one in very lately for the first time. The woman came in aged 74, seven days for begging for the first time. She took ill on the Saturday morning and died on the same day, the 16th October, in prison. That was a case which should have gone to the poorhouse.

1846. Did she give you any story of how she began to beg?—Yes, she was in the poorhouse, but said she did not get any tea and therefore she left it.

1847. Then when she was not in the house what was she doing?—For weeks she had been sleeping on stairs and such like. Her clothing was fairly good, but very dirty, and she was covered with vermin.

1848. Where had she been sentenced?—I forget; but I could easily find out.

1849. It was a Glasgow case?—Yes.

1850. Do you get many women in for begging?—Yes, a good number. They are always very old—women about 70 years of age.

1851. Many of them in repeatedly or mostly for the first time?—Usually first or second times.

1852. And what are the sentences?—Seven days usually, and some 30.

1853. Thirty days for the first time?—No, the second time for begging, usually 30 days.

1854. Where do you think these should be put?—In the poorhouse. They can do no kind of work.

1855. Which poorhouse was this old woman in whose case you have told us about?—I could not say.

1856. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is that a frequent sort of case?—They are very unwilling to go into the poorhouse. When I say to them that they should be there they say they do not like it.

1857. Did that old woman tell you anything about her former history?—Yes. Her husband was a sailor, and he was taken away by the press-gang, some 40 or 50 years ago.

1858. How had she lived since then?—I forget now if she told me about it.

1859. Have you many young persons?—I do not think we have very many just now.

1860. Have you had in the course of, say, the last year or two?—Yes. We have had a number of young girls, about 15 or 16 years of age.

1861. Have you any other cases like that old woman in your recollection, and if you have, would you give us them?—No; but I have another one marked down 3 days for being drunk—79 years of age.

1862. First offence?—I think so; at least she told me that.

1863. Had you ever seen her before?—No.

1864. Did she appear a decent person?—I am not sure. I did not ask particularly, but these are just the old women that they put in prison who, I think, should be put in the poorhouse.

1865. Well, you give us the list of the occupations of your prisoners on the 26th September, which shows 78 cleaners—these are persons who clean, doing char work and washing stairs; 51 hawkers; 82 house-keepers; what are these last?—These are married women.

1866. (By Col. McHardy.) There is a very suspicious class covered under that, I think?—Yes.

1867. (By the Chairman.) Landresses 35; rag-pickers 22; servants 36—these are the chief occupations? But you have handed us in the details?—Yes. (See Appendix L.)

1868. You have here the lowest age as 14 I see?—No; 15.

1869. There is one girl of 14?—No; one of 15 and one of 16.

1870. (Dr. Sutherland.) The one of 14 refers to another return?—Yes.

1871. (The Chairman.) We need not go into that case. I understand we shall see the younger prisoners.

1872. (By Dr. Sutherland.) The Chairman questioned you regarding the 350 who may be looked upon as habitual offenders; what proportion of these do you think are under the strict discipline of prison refractory and incorrigible?—About 20 or so.

1873. That is, of the 350 there are 20 really incorrigible, even when in prison?—Yes.

1874. Then the great bulk of these women, as you know, are fairly well behaved in prison?—Yes; under the discipline.

1875. And I suppose a good many would be well behaved even though they were not under that strict discipline you speak of?—A number of them would, but a great many of them are well-behaved just because they know they are under the strict discipline.

1876. And vice versa, although there was no strict discipline, a good number, judging from their dispositions, would be well-behaved?—A number of them would.

1877. A return has been got from Glasgow Prison in which it is stated there are 537 women who are responsible for 3400 or 33 per cent. of the commitments to prison, that is to say, if these women were dealt with your commitments would fall from 10,000 to 6,600. Isn't that so?—That is so.

1878. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the case of those women whom you recommend when they leave the prison to go to one or other of the 'Shelters,' and in whose cases admission has been given to them, do you find that many of them come back to prison again?—Well, a good many come from the Whitevale Mission Laundry, but not so many from the Hill Street Home. To the Hill Street Home we send girls convicted only for the first or second time; the first chiefly.

1879. Can you give us any idea if they come back more than once?—Yes; they do.

1880. Then, do you think it is desirable that they should be admitted to that 'Shelter' after a second time?—No; I do not. Of course there is this difference that they only keep them in there for six months, and when they get their money and go out they drink it, and again get landed in prison.

1881. They are paid wages, I understand, before they leave?—Yes; but they have now altered the term there to 12 months, the same as at Hill Street. We were finding it very difficult to get them to go to Hill Street. They preferred to go to Whitevale where they were kept only six months; and I had to bring that matter before the Committee.

Miss J. F.
Miller.

1882. What inducement have these girls to stay even for six months in the Whitevale Shelter?—Well, they are washing there, and, of course, they have the prospect of getting the money they earn at the end of six months.

1883. Is it the prospect of the wages for the work they have done that retains them there?—Yes.

1884. The Committee have no power to retain them forcibly?—No; not in any of the Homes.

1885. (By Col. M'Hardy.) When the habitual inebriate arrives in prison would you just tell us in what state she generally is?—Well, she is just what one would say in a muddled state for two or three days.

1886. When the sentence expires she has just got about into a proper state of body?—Yes. About the end of seven days, when she has to go out, she is quite ready to begin her dissipation again.

1887. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) As to these unruly ones, your idea is that it would be better that the drunkards should be kept for a longer time is it not?—Yes.

1888. What do you think is the minimum they should be kept?—I do not think it would do any good unless they were kept for a year—Even those who come into prison for the first time addicted to drink, because they have in all probability been drinking for a long time before that. Good results have been got at the Shelter after a year's residence.

1889. In this Retreat where you would put them, would you employ them?—Yes; laundry-work, sewing, knitting, and light out-door labour.

1890. In this sort of Home you would lock them up for a year at least?—Yes.

1891. What sort of discipline would you have; not so strict as in prison?—I would not like to have much discipline there at all. If discipline were required I would have it in prison.

1892. But you say there is a very considerable percentage of these women who are really unruly; would you put them into these Retreats?—No.

1893. What are you going to do with them? You cannot keep them for some years in prison. Do you think that they are incorrigible and that, if they were put into a Retreat, they would not come round?—Yes; I think they would if they were kept away from the liquor.

1894. What unruliness do they show?—They are restless and excitable. If they have any out-door occupation they are better.

1895. Do you give them employment?—Yes; but they are kept separate in different rooms when not at work. With those who are outside the prison cells such as cooks, laundresses, and pass-workers, we have no difficulty, because it is a privilege to get out and to have a little freedom.

1896. Have you many of whom you would say that it is more their misfortune than their fault that they are there?—Yes; a great many—the result of their upbringing, bad parents and bad homes.

1897. Are they intellectually weak and silly?—Yes; intellectually weak.

1898. And I suppose they have children some of them?—Yes; and when they go out they have no occupation, no work to go to, and no proper home, and then they just drift away and get drunk and come back again. [Witness then withdrew.]

SIXTH DAY.

Edinburgh, Tuesday, November 20th, 1894.

PRESENT:—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart. M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Sir COLIN SCOTT MONCRIEFF, R.E.

Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

Sir JAMES ALEXANDER RUSSELL, M.A., M.B., B.Sc., LL.D., called in and examined.

Sir James
Alexander
Russell.

20 Nov. 1894.

1899. (By the Chairman.) You have just completed the term of office of Lord Provost of the city?—Yes.

1900. You are a Doctor of Medicine and LL.D.?—Yes.

1901. You have been for a long time a magistrate of the city?—I was for six years one of the bailies of Edinburgh before becoming Lord Provost. I have also served on the School Board of the city, and was Chairman of the Public Health Committee for many years, and I am at this moment, and have been all along Chairman of the Edinburgh Association for Improving the Dwellings of the Poor, Limited.

1902. And you have in that way had brought under your notice a number of facts relating to the subjects of this inquiry?—Yes; and I have been much interested in this class of habitual offenders, and in the drunken and broken-down class of the population, including tramps and tinkers.

1903. We have here a diagram showing the ratio of apprehensions per thousand of population for breaches of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly in various towns in the country. That shows that while the number of arrests under these heads amounted in Glasgow to 60 per thousand, they only amounted to 24 per thousand in Edinburgh. Can you give any explanation of that extraordinary discrepancy?—There are several explanations. I would only accept this diagram as putting the truth rather approximately. It is quite evident that several factors enter into the construction of a diagram like this. For instance, the habits of the police differ in different towns.

1904. What is the difference in the habits of the police in Edinburgh and Glasgow?—I have been informed that there are differences of activity in different towns. There is, for instance, the census of tramps. In Edinburgh, I am informed by the Chief Constable that by his method he gets at every tramp in town, which is not done in Glasgow.

1905. Is there any question as to the accuracy of these figures?—I admit that the number of apprehensions is correct, but the meaning of it I imagine is affected by the idiosyncrasy of the police in the different towns.

1906. Would you admit that the condition of Edinburgh as regards order and freedom from vagrants,

Sir James
Alexander
Russell.

drunkenness, and assaults, was inferior to Glasgow?—I would not be prepared to admit that, but this diagram requires to be taken with some latitude.

1907. There is a difference between the two towns of close upon 66 per cent., and the point I wish to get at is whether, in consequence of your fewer arrests here, the condition of Edinburgh is worse than that of Glasgow?—I think not. You must also take another modifying circumstance. The class of population in Edinburgh is different, taken as a whole, from that of Glasgow. Our valuation per head is much higher, and the percentage of the working-classes is smaller.

1908. What is the difference of the percentage of the working-classes?—I would not like to say, but it is obvious to the most casual inspector. Our valuation tells it. We have a valuation probably half that of Glasgow without anything like half the population. One penny per £1 produces with us more than £8,000; and in Glasgow, before the extension of the city, it did not produce double that amount.

1909. Do you give any instructions to your police as to their conduct in respect to dealing with drunk and disorderly persons?—I do not remember what the law of Glasgow is in relation to the arrest of drunken persons, but I wish to point out that it is no crime to be drunk in the streets of Edinburgh. The crime consists in being drunk and incapable, and not under the care of a competent person.

1910. You are not aware of any difference in the law of Edinburgh and Glasgow on that point?—The indictment in Edinburgh says 'drunk and incapable and not under the care of a suitable person.'

1911. Under what circumstances is he arrested in Edinburgh?—If the person is simply drunk, and in charge of a man seeing him home, he is not arrested.

1912. Would you arrest a man lying in the gutter, or able to stagger home?—That would be left to the discretion of the individual policemen. If he did not molest anybody, I think he would require to be incapable of finding his way home before he would be arrested.

1913. In inquiring into the circumstances of other places, we have been told that in some towns it is the habit of the police, when they find a drunk man, to try and help him home, but in Glasgow, when a drunk and incapable is found, he is simply 'run in.' Have your police any instructions in that respect?—It is the duty of the police to help the man, and if he will go quietly home they do not arrest him. But the word 'incapable' comes in, and if he can stagger home he cannot be called incapable.

1914. If he could tell where he lives?—He might be able to tell where he lives, and yet not be able to walk home.

1915. You have only one Police Court in Edinburgh?—Yes.

1916. Presided over by police magistrates entirely?—No, presided over alternately by a sheriff and by bailies. When the sheriff sits he takes a month on the bench, then a bailie succeeds him for a fortnight, and another bailie follows, then a sheriff comes back.

1917. That should tend rather to ensure uniformity of practice?—Naturally the sheriff sets the practice though the bailies often differ from him. I have often found that there were great differences in the sentences passed by different individuals on the bench, and especially for particular crimes—one magistrate being more lenient on drunks, and another harder on cases of importuning. It is a well-known thing in our Police Courts that prostitutes arrested on a certain day of the week would always plead not guilty because the sheriff who sat on that day was severe, and by delaying the case till another Court day they hoped to get a magistrate who would be less severe.

1918. Take the case of the drunks—is any cognisance taken of the number of previous convictions in dealing with them?—Generally not. Sheriff Rutherford, who practically sets the standard here, does not take that into consideration.

1919. Does he allow himself to be informed of the number of previous convictions?—Yes; he is always informed of the number.

1920. After or before the prisoner is convicted?—I cannot remember, but the magistrate is always told by the prosecutor.

1921. Under Lord Kingsburgh's Act, in the more serious offences, previous convictions cannot be brought into the case until after the conviction. Can you recall whether you were told of these previous convictions before or after the conviction?—I think it was after the conviction.

1922. I suppose you would have a record of cases in which the man was simply fined?—Unless in exceptional cases, the drunks had nothing but fines. The usual routine when I was on the bench was that a whole row of people were brought in and asked if they were drunk, and they answered yes, and were fined 2/6d. or 5s., with the alternative of one or two days' imprisonment.

1923. Have you a scale of days of imprisonment?—Yes. That of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881.

1924. Is the term limited?—It generally runs from one to three days for drunk cases, but the judge can go up to 60 days.

1925. We were told in Glasgow that a number of cases of drunkenness were converted into assaults or drunk and disorderly in consequence of the person arrested commencing to fight with the police?—A very small number of such cases occur here.

1926. How is street walking and importuning dealt with?—Sheriff Rutherford never gives more than 5s. of fine, with the alternative of from one to three days. The bailies generally give a little more. I have gone further when they were contumacious or had been up often before.

1927. To what extent have you gone?—I do not think I have ever gone beyond 14 days' imprisonment.

1928. Do you find these penalties sufficient to keep the streets right?—No, I do not. But I have given it up in despair. I have had young girls taken out of the Court to the judge's room, and have suspended the case, and have advised them to go to a Home, but I never had a single case of satisfaction. They went to the Home to avoid imprisonment, and then returned to their old life.

1929. We were told in Glasgow of cases where the girls were sent to a Home in charge of a policeman and the magistrate ordered them to come up for sentence when called upon. Have you tried that?—Yes, I have suspended punishment, but they were arrested again and came before another magistrate who paid no attention to my threats.

1930. Have you any reason to believe, from the reports of the Police Authorities or otherwise, that the state of Edinburgh in consequence of this method of dealing with that crime is worse than Glasgow, where the punishment is from 14 to 30 days?—I would rather leave that to the Chief Constable to answer, but my impression is that figures are not much worth, because our police have been extremely active in breaking up shebeens and other houses where these people consort.

1931. What are these women arrested for?—Importuning and soliciting men on the streets.

1932. Do the police in their arrests confine themselves strictly to cases where importuning has occurred?—Yes, I had never any other experience.

1933. We have been informed that frequent arrests have been made of notorious characters without importuning?—The policeman in these cases incurs a great amount of risk, and he requires to be careful that he does not make a false arrest. Quite recently one of our policemen was instantly dismissed from the force for arresting a lady.

1934. Have you policemen in plain clothes?—Yes.

1935. Especially for that duty?—No, not specially. A good number of the arrests were made by the ordinary policemen on the beat.

1936. Referring to the census of tramps, you are aware that there is a great difficulty in dealing with the tramp question. Have you any provision for dealing with tramps?—Yes, we have two institutions. One is the Night Asylum, where they get a night's lodging and food, and the other is the House of Refuge.

Alexander
Russell.

1937. Have you any Municipal or Poor Law institutions provided from the public funds?—No, unless they go into the poorhouse as paupers.

1938. We were told that in Glasgow some 5000 poor people sought shelter in the Police Office during the year. Have you any such experience?—We have a very few cases of people asking to get into a cell for the night, when the outside institutions are full, but that is very rare.

1939. Those other institutions are maintained by philanthropic benevolence?—Yes.

1940. How do they work?—The Night Asylum takes in people who come in the evening, including a great number of those tramps and others who are homeless. They are lodged for the night, and get some food, and go away next morning.

1941. Is there any equivalent given in the shape of labour?—I think not.

1942. Is there any method for checking the encouragement which that might give to worthless characters?—I do not think there is much. There is a certain inspection by a committee who work it, but I am not familiar with it.

1943. You have seen it in its working order?—Yes.

1944. Have you seen the House of Refuge?—Yes, during the day, but not at night.

1945. With regard to drunkenness, you have a large number of cases of persons repeatedly brought up, and you know the proposals that have been made for the treatment of habitual drunkards—what have you to say regarding that?—We have so many different classes of these people. A great number of the habitual offenders are at times arrested for drunkenness, disorder, and a mixture of the two. I have before me the names of half-a-dozen or more famous specimens which I selected from those who appeared before myself. Here is a man taken up for begging. He is 35 years of age, and has been 35 times convicted of begging alone, from 1884 to 1891. His sentences varied from an admonition to 60 days. Latterly he always got 60 days, and he left Edinburgh.

1946. Did you trace him afterwards?—I was told by the Chief Constable that he was afterwards arrested in Carlisle, but the interest of our police then ceased. His name was James Smith, and he was an American. Another man was John King, 32 years of age, who was convicted 62 times between 1870 and 1894. He had been five years in a Reformatory in addition. He was convicted of all sorts of offences, but generally for being drunk, disorderly, or violent. The first time I saw him was when he came before me for offering a student a tract, which was refused, and he then butted the student violently on the stomach, knocked him down, and kicked him. He was a very muscular man, and I believe had been turned out of the army. George Muir, 45 years of age, was 66 times convicted from 1867 to 1894. He suffered all sorts of sentences, from admonitions to nine months' imprisonment. Martin Pentland, 60 years of age, was 197 times convicted, from 1861 to 1891, and his sentences ranged up to 60 days. I find that the women are even worse than the men. Alice Sharp, 30 years of age, was 116 times convicted from 1885 to 1894, and her sentences were from an admonition to 30 days, chiefly for drinking and prostitution. Janet Ferguson, 27 years of age, was 72 times convicted from 1884 to 1894, her highest sentence being 60 days. Margaret Boswell, 41 years of age, was 143 times convicted from 1866 to 1894, her sentences being from an admonition to 60 days. Janet Lovey or Kirk, 46 years of age, had been 350 times convicted for drunkenness and prostitution. Margaret Fannon was 297 times convicted; and Helen Morrison, at the age of 33, was 198 times convicted.

1947. Do you see any way of dealing with these cases?—You have to consider, first of all, what are the causes.

1948. Have you many beggars in Edinburgh?—Not a very large number.

1949. It has been suggested to me that the majority of these habitual beggars might be effectually dealt with by being relegated to the Parochial Boards with powers of detention. Have you anything to say to that?—Yes, I think that would be very good.

1950. Take the case of offences, of which drunkenness forms a large part—would you treat them in the same way as habitual drunkards?—My impression is that a large number of these people have some slight mental defect. I should not call them lunatics, but I would almost say that they were semi-lunatics, and unless you bear that in mind you cannot have effective treatment. There are some of these people who, under compulsory treatment, would do moderately well.

1951. How do you propose to deal with them?—I think you would require something of the nature of an adult reformatory, in which some of them might have to be confined for life. They might behave there, but would not do so outside.

1952. Confining for life is rather a strong order?—You confine a lunatic for life. I was shown in a large Lunatic Asylum the other day a number of patients who were practically well, and who paid no board on account of their services to the institution, and who were yet aware that they were there for life and could not be trusted outside. Perhaps 'weak-minded' is rather a strong word to apply to those drunkards. They are morally sane so long as under supervision. A number of them are recognised as being weak-minded in the ordinary sense, but there are many who would not be so recognised, but who are yet quite incapable of withstanding temptation.

1953. Do you think public opinion in Scotland would bear you out in the commitment for long terms of such persons to Reformatories?—I think the word Reformatory might be liable to misinterpretation. I have no desire to make this detention penal. I would make it forcible detention, but give every liberty. I look upon it as an analogy to a Lunatic Asylum—detain them, but give them an opportunity of earning their livelihood.

1954. How would you bear the expenses of such institutions?—They will never pay their own way. It is impossible they can earn their own living, for if they have to bear the expense of a watcher and other things they cannot fairly compete with other labour. The public funds would have to bear a portion of the expense, but I would point out that at present these people are largely supported by the public, for they are largely parasites on the working-classes. Whenever there is a want of employment these people are thrown on public charity. Besides that voluntary charity, they form already a serious tax on the public in respect of police, prisons, and the poor law, so that it would be as broad as it is long.

1955. The prisons are supported out of one fund, the police out of another, and the poorhouses out of a third?—But the same people pay for them all.

1956. Yes, but in different proportions. Would you propose that each of these bodies—the Imperial Government, the Police Commissioners, and the Poor Law Authorities, should all contribute towards these institutions?—I hope to live to see in Edinburgh one tax collector for all these bodies, and then the people will not care what body administers them. At present it is largely a case of jealousy among officials.

1957. You have not formulated any further idea than that these people should be supported out of the public funds?—No. There is one point, however, which has not been referred to, and that is the prevention of this evil at its source. I do not see that we would gain a great deal, though we were to remove the whole of these, if we allow a new crop to grow up to take their place.

1958. Where does that new crop come from?—I believe it arises largely from want of means to deal by Reformatories with lads and girls of over 16 years of age. I think a very lenient sentence at the beginning in such cases is often a mistake. I think if such young people are to be dealt with at all, they should get a fright at the beginning.

1959. We have heard of cases of boys being sent to

Sir James
Alexander
Russell.
20 Nov.

prison for kicking a muddy football and making a noise on the streets?—There does not seem to be any proper punishment for such offences, and you must either send the youths to prison, or let them off to become a nuisance on the streets.

1960. Can you order whippings?—Yes, but you will arouse public opinion against you if you do. I once ordered a boy to be whipped for theft, and I was assailed by numerous letters in the newspapers. There is really a want of proper punishment for such cases. It is clearly not a case in which to send children to prison, and yet, if let alone, they would render the streets impassable.

1961. What is your own opinion with regard to whipping?—I do not think a judicial whipping is a sufficiently mild punishment for kicking a football. It is not a crime, and I would not have the lads in the Police Court at all for such freaks.

1962. Have you found that young people from the almshouses sent to prison for a short time are frightened and deterred?—It is difficult to answer that. The Police Court in Edinburgh makes a great distinction between the calls attached to the Police Office and the prison, and instead of sending a boy to jail he is locked up in the cell for some hours or for the night. These cells are certified as a prison where any one can be detained for a period not exceeding three days, and confinement there is not looked upon in the same sense as being sent to prison.

1963. Is that a peculiarity of Edinburgh?—Yes.

1964. Is the system much availed of?—Yes; it is taken advantage of a good deal in the case of juveniles, who are locked up for the night to give them a fright. They do not associate with the ordinary prisoners.

1965. Have you the power of the magistrates of Glasgow to liberate prisoners before the period of their sentence has expired?—I have heard of a sentence being altered the same day after it had been pronounced, but I never did so myself.

1966. What would you propose to prevent the fresh crop of offenders coming up?—One of the things I would suggest is that the age at which children can be committed to Reformatories should be raised, and that instead of sending a boy or girl of 16 to jail, when it is clearly a case of bad surroundings or bad family, they should be sent to a Reformatory.

1967. To what age would you keep them there?—I think girls can be kept there till 19 just now. The Dairy House of Refuge is an institution of the kind, and I know that among the present subscribers to that institution are some of the former inmates.

1968. If you sent a boy of 16 to the Reformatory, how long would you detain him?—Till he was 20; but you would require a Reformatory where his work would be useful, and where he would be earning a great part of his own support.

1969. Would that not exercise a bad influence on the younger lads?—I think classification would prevent that.

1970. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) What is the youngest age at which you would send a child to prison?—Unfortunately there is no remedy but the prison for juveniles.

1971. What would you recommend in the way of punishment for these petty outbursts of childish spirits?—If one was left to the light of human nature one would say the policeman ought to cuff the boy there and then and be done with it, but he would run a serious risk in doing that. Often they do take the boys home and tell their parents to deal with them. Girls who sell newspapers on the streets are often brought up for cursing and swearing and making a noise. I sent a newspaper girl to a Reformatory for such an offence, and she had been nine times in prison before that for cursing and swearing. She was a Roman Catholic, and I sent for the priest, and he gave his opinion that unless she was sent to a Reformatory she would be ruined. On his advice I did so, till she was 19 years of age, although her parents were very angry. The officials of the Court thought it was an exceedingly strong measure to send a girl to a Reformatory for a mere breach of the peace, but the priest told me that Sir James her elder sister was on the streets, and I saw it was her. Alexander Russell.

1972. You would be in favour of broadening the doors of the Reformatory, and sending children there for offences for which they are not now sent to the Reformatory?—It was not the offence of the girl that made me send her to the Reformatory, but a purview of her surroundings and the character of her family.

1973. Does the law permit the magistrates to do that on their own judgment?—I thought the statute gave me the power, but it is certainly not the custom.

1974. It does not require legislation to enable you to do so?—I do not think so.

1975. I understand that you never send juveniles to prison for any ordinary offences?—Certainly not. I often admonished.

1976. You would confine habitual drunkards for a long period?—Yes.

1977. As a medical man, what would be the minimum period of confinement for which you would give power?—I do not think that anything less than two years would be of any avail for the class of people of whom I have been speaking.

1978. Have you known cases of habitual drunkards who have become reformed and have recovered?—Yes, a few in all classes of society.

1979. We have had instances brought before us in Glasgow of labouring men who have worked honestly enough and were sober until they got their fortnight's wages, when they had a drinking bout and became a curse to their families and the neighbourhood. They go back to their work on the Monday morning and are all right till next pay-day. What would you do with these cases?—There are exceedingly difficult cases. I had a labourer myself who could not stand more than a limited wage without giving way to drink.

1980. Would you have an order for these men's wages to be given to their wives as trustees?—I think that would be an excellent thing where the wife was trustworthy.

1981. Might there not be a legal trustee appointed?—I am afraid the expense would make it impracticable. It is one of the most difficult cases, and I don't think we would be justified in seizing these people's wages.

1982. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You have only known a few cases of recovery?—Yes.

1983. Is that because you disbelieve in the chances, or because the existing machinery is deficient?—I was referring to instances that had come under my own personal knowledge.

1984. But suppose we had a period of two years' detention, would you be confident of success?—It would enable the man's physical constitution to recover its tone, and would give him a fresh start. His nervous system would not be under the disadvantage of being trained to drink.

1985. Do you think that there would be structural changes in the nervous system that would make it very difficult for a man to recover after a long period of soaking in drink?—Yes.

1986. Have you gone into the experience of other countries?—I have read one or two books on the question, but I would not like to give evidence on that point.

1987. Have you been impressed or the reverse by the experience of America?—Yes, I think it shows that a certain proportion can recover by detention.

1988. What do you think of the Retreats in our own country?—The recovery has not been so satisfactory, and I think the reason is that the periods of detention have not been long enough. If you can prevent a man rushing off to drink when he takes the craving he may keep himself straight for the next month or two.

1989. Would you say compulsion was an essential element in the treatment of these cases?—In many of them. In some persuasion and moral sympathy might be enough, but in others compulsion is required.

1990. Some medical men hold that these cases are closely allied to insanity. What is your opinion?—I believe they are connected with a defective nervous system. I have known men who had constitutionally such a craving for drink as to indicate a different nervous system from other people, and yet on becoming teetotallers they made good citizens, and did well.

1991. Would a rearrangement of our Lunacy Laws meet these cases?—I do not think you can class them as lunatics. I think something might be done by the French system of calling a family council with a Justice of the Peace and ordering certain restraints.

1992. Do you think it better that these people should be treated by means of new machinery and new institutions?—Yes, but I have not worked out the details in my own mind, and I give this evidence with much diffidence.

1993. As to those boys who play football on the streets, would it not be better to give them a whipping and let them go?—Yes, rather than send them to jail.

1994. With reference to whipping, is it the physical or moral effect that produces good results?—I think sending them to prison is worse, not only from a moral point of view for the boy, but also for the public purse.

1995. With regard to prostitution, is prostitution per se an offence against the law?—Not in Edinburgh, unless when combined with importuning.

1996. What is the evidence to convict—the man's?—No, he generally does not like to come to the Police Court. We take the evidence of two policemen as eye-witnesses of the importuning.

1997. But the conversation might be on a different subject?—When a woman who is a convicted prostitute is seen to stop three or four men in succession on the street and speak to them, even when they have not had a conversation, that would be held by most of the magistrates as sufficient evidence.

1998. Was the lady to whom you formerly referred as being wrongly arrested, found under suspicious circumstances?—No, she had been locked out of the house where she was staying, and was waiting on the street for a lady friend who had gone for a key.

1999. Would you favour a system of compulsorily shutting up those prostitutes in asylums?—Yes, certainly. I am not going to pledge myself to the present method and discipline of Reformatories as the most suitable in all these cases. I would prefer an institution where forcible detention was combined with industrial occupations, and one not worked from a penal point of view.

2000. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You know that there is a large class of habitual drunkards who do not come before the police?—Undoubtedly.

2001. And they probably produce more distress and discomfort than the class habitually before the Police Courts?—Those habitually before the Police Courts have wrecked their families and are past hope.

2002. I refer to the class of cases where one of the parents may thrash the children, or the husband attack the wife, or the wife the husband, and produce a continuous series of domestic brawls, which are not brought before the police?—There are a certain number of such cases.

2003. Is there not a large number?—Yes; a large number who do it off and on, but not to the extent of annoying their neighbours and bringing the police on the scene.

2004. Is there any institution in this city for dealing with such cases?—There is the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

2005. Have you acted on the Board of that Society?—No; I have not been a member of the Board.

2006. Is there a large number of cases dealt with by them?—Yes, a considerable number. Our police have been enforcing the statute for the protection of children very heartily indeed.

2007. What is the present procedure in connection with this Society?—The children are taken to the Police Office, and then sent down to a Shelter in the High Street, where they are kept for some days until the case is cleared up in its legal aspect; and then there is a Home at Corstorphine, about four miles away, where the children are kept. The parents are prosecuted in a great many cases, and the Chief Constable deals with a number of them privately. The Chief Constable does a great deal in that way with petty offenders among children.

2008. Do you believe that in Edinburgh the action of the police and of this Society for the Protection of Children is a sufficient means of becoming acquainted with all these cases and dealing with them? Is anything more required?—I do not think so at present, especially as our police are associated with the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor.

2009. (By the Chairman.) What is this Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor?—It is a voluntary philanthropic association which tries to help people out of work and enable them to make their own way. It has workrooms in the Grassmarket, and provides employment for destitute people out of work, gives them pecuniary and other aid, and enforces to a certain extent a labour test, and assists in the clothing of destitute children. The police have been taking an active part in helping this clothing scheme, both in getting donations, and finding out the children requiring help, and the circumstances of their families.

2010. (By Col. M'Hardy.) With reference to the support of any institution that might be devised for dealing with habitual offenders, would you think it best that the practical supervision and working of these institutions should be in the hands of Local rather than Imperial Authorities?—I like the present constitution of the governing bodies of the Reformatories. I think it is a good thing to interest local people. The Reformatories are managed by a Local Committee and are yet subject to Government inspection and control, and I think that is a good combination.

2011. That being the case, it is only reasonable that such institutions should, to some extent, be supported from local funds?—Undoubtedly.

2012. You referred to the cells attached to the Police Court in Edinburgh, and said they were certified under a special Act as a place of detention. Are they the only cells of the kind in Scotland?—I believe so.

2013. But there are certain towns in which cells are certified under the Prisons Act of 1877 for the detention of short sentence prisoners?—Yes, I know that these exist.

2014. I suppose the expenses in connection with the police cells in Edinburgh are borne by the Police Rate of the city?—Yes; they are part of the police establishment.

2015. (By Miss Stevenson.) With regard to the instructions given to the police in dealing with persons found drunk on the streets, I understood you to say that they were instructed to take those persons to their own homes?—No, the police do not go with them to their homes, but they send them on.

2016. I had experience of a woman found drunk on the streets, and beginning to take off her clothes, and I asked a policeman to take her home. He said all he could do would be to follow her, and keep the crowd of boys off her, but he could not take her home. Would that be according to his instructions?—He could not be allowed to leave his beat and go home with her. In fact, she was an incapable person if she was unable to find her way home.

2017. Would he have been guilty of a dereliction of duty if he had acceded to my request and gone home with the woman?—I think so.

2018. In Glasgow we were told that they had a system of taking money pledges from drunk persons, which were forfeited in many cases. Does that system also prevail here?—Yes. The 'drunks' at the Police Court on Monday mornings are divided into two categories—those who have left pledges and gone away when sober, and those who have stayed in the cells since their apprehension.

2019. Is there any minimum pledge of money?—I think it is 5s., but I am not quite certain. If the fine was 5s., those who were out on bail were always able to pay, because that amount of money was in hand.

2020. You said that, under the Society for the

Alexander
Russell.

Prevention of Cruelty to Children, children were taken to a Home at Corstorphine. Is there any machinery by which the parents can be made responsible for the expense of that child's maintenance in that Home?—I am not aware of it, and my experience is that you can never get money out of these people, the expense being more than the gain. That is the experience with regard to Industrial Schools.

2021. Is it not desirable, as far as possible, that the parents should be made responsible?—Undoubtedly, as a means of discipline, but it is very difficult to enforce discipline that costs money.

2022. Do you not think the moral effect on the parent is worth the expense?—I am afraid the rate-payers would not think so.

2023. You spoke of the scheme for providing clothing for the children. On what principle do the police select the children?—I think it is left a good deal to the discretion of the policeman on the beat.

2024. (Py Dr. Sutherland.) In answer to the Chairman, you said we had in Glasgow more of the working-classes in proportion to the population than in Edinburgh. When I tell you that in Edinburgh you have 184 individuals convicted five times and upwards for the offences with which we are dealing, and that in Glasgow the number is about 500, does not that indicate that the ratio is about the same for both cities?—If I am right in assuming that a large proportion of these habitual offenders are people with a mental twist or defect of some kind, I think the proportion in regard to population would be about the same in both towns.

2025. That is to say, that the worst class of offenders are about the same in both towns, and the difference in the number of arrests is accounted for in Glasgow by the method of dealing with the casuals?—No. Where you have a large working-class population you will get a large number of arrests for drunkenness among men who get drunk on pay-days, but who are not habituals. I draw a great distinction between a man who cannot resist the temptation to drink, and one who attends to his work and gets occasionally drunk.

2026. You agree that the proportion of habitual offenders is about the same in Edinburgh as Glasgow?—Yes, on the figures you give me.

2027. If 184 persons were returned by the Edinburgh Chief Constable as having been convicted five times and upwards for the offences we are dealing with, and the number in Glasgow was 500, does not that show that, in proportion to population, the number in both towns is the same?—It is simply a question of arithmetic.

2028. I observe from the returns of your Chief Constable that you only convicted one prostitute in Edinburgh for every three in Glasgow. Can you explain this striking difference?—No, I cannot.

2029. You said in regard to the arrest of prostitutes that it was left very much to two policemen who might not have any knowledge of the conversation carried on?—Yes. I have rarely seen a person who had been importuned appear in the Police Court. He would look upon it as an aggravation of the injury done to him.

2030. You indicated that there was no difficulty in getting a conviction after a woman had been once branded as a prostitute. Might not the first conviction have the suspicion of doubt about it?—The first charge is always a contested case, and the inquiry is prolonged, for even the Fiscal recognises the importance of it to the woman, and in my experience submits evidence, even should the woman plead guilty.

2031. Does the woman cited ever plead not guilty and call the man importuned as a witness?—She often pleads not guilty, but I never in my experience saw the importuned person called. The first conviction is only obtained after a stiff fight, and it is usually proved that the woman frequents the streets and associates with prostitutes. Our late Fiscal, Mr Linton, who served many years, never held that one conviction for importuning apart from other circumstances entitled him to call a woman an habitual prostitute.

2032. Have you formulated any definition of the term 'habitual drunkard'?—No, I think it is largely a question of common sense.

2033. Would you consider two Justices of the Peace, sitting to investigate the case, sufficient to determine the point?—In cases supported by frequent convictions I do not think there need be much difficulty. I do not think the Police Court in Edinburgh would be the best tribunal to investigate such cases. In Edinburgh we have another Court, called the Burgh Court, which was founded by royal charter, and in which the bailies sit as depute sheriffs and deal with the cases that cannot be tried in the Police Court. If a man is twice convicted of theft he cannot be tried in the Police Court, and must be sent to the sheriff or Burgh Court. The same man who sits in the Police Court may also be the bailie in the Burgh Court, and try the case which he has just before remitted to himself. I think that Burgh Court, with two men on the bench, would be an excellent tribunal for the calm and deliberate trial of such cases of habitual drunkards.

2034. You think lenient sentences at first are a mistake?—If a man has got on the sliding-path to ruin, I think a sentence of three weeks or a month might be that man's salvation. In one case I broke through tradition and gave a man a heavy fine or 30 days for being drunk, and he told the cab inspector that it had been the saving of him.

2035. If you were to give three months' imprisonment for such an offence, even if repeated, would it not appear excessive?—What is wanted is an amount of imprisonment that will bring home a sense of discomfort and reflection to the man. I think a three days' sentence on many of the lower class of working people is no sentence at all. They are as happy in jail as elsewhere, and they are just given an opportunity for sleeping off the drink, only to begin again when they come out.

2036. Is it not the case that very many do not go back?—Very many.

2038. You say that public opinion is not up to the point of sanctioning whipping or birching?—That is my experience in Edinburgh.

2039. This system of whipping is carried on extensively in Govan, Greenock, and other towns in Scotland, and the only difficulty hitherto experienced, is to get a whipper. Have you found that difficulty?—No, we have had no difficulty in that respect.

2040. Why should Edinburgh be exceptional in its view of whipping?—I cannot give the reason, I believe in it much more than imprisonment as the proper remedy for children's offences.

2041. In speaking of those with a mental defect, you do not mean to classify them as lunatics?—No.

2042. I suppose that although they have in some measure lost self-control, they know right from wrong?—Yes.

2043. But you compare them to lunatics in so far as you would give them a long period of seclusion? Is it not the case that many of those lunatics in the asylum have no thought of or desire for liberty?—Some of those in the asylums are sane while in, but if tossed out into the world, they could not restrain themselves.

2044. Would you put a drunkard, with that desire for liberty lunatics never dream of, under the same conditions?—Undoubtedly. I think he would require to be put under more stringent conditions. Some of those who are now in an asylum could walk out if they liked, but they have sense enough to remain in.

2045. Would you administer the same kind and form of treatment for all these people?—No, I think they would have to be classified, and that is one of the difficulties which involves expense, supervision, and separate treatment. I do not think any uniform system of treatment would give the best results, and perhaps it would not give any results at all.

2046. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I suppose a good many of these women who are taken up for importing are known to the police?—Certainly.

2047. Are they liable to be pulled up without direct evidence on the part of the police?—I am afraid there have been cases. We have had unworthy men dismissed from the force from time to time, but on the whole I think the police are a respectable body, and act fairly.

2048. Is there any other class pulled up as being suspect?—Under our Edinburgh statute the police can seize a habit and repute thief very summarily. We have a clause in our Act which prevents a criminal when out of prison from enjoying the same liberties as another person. It is an offence for a card-sharper, once convicted, to have cards in his pocket. It is an offence for an habitual thief to frequent a street. I have sent a returned convict 30 days to prison for being twenty minutes in a crowd at the entrance to a theatre, where he had been watched by two detectives.

2049. (By Miss Stevenson.) There seems to me to have been evidence in all these cases, but I understand that many of those women are brought up simply because the police have seen them speaking to men without having heard what they had said?—But that is a habit and repute prostitute who has been convicted before.

2050. (By the Chairman.) You have spoken of the habitual thief, the habitual card-sharper, and the habitual prostitute. Can you give us a definition of habitual?—I can only give you our own Act.

2051. But it does not lay down a specified number of convictions?—No, it does not.

2052. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You have told us of the mental feebleness of a large number of the minor class of offenders, but there must be a minority with as good brains as we have to all appearance?—Yes.

2053. We saw some miserable cases in Glasgow the other day of people who had been taken up often, and yet we could not suppose that they were imbecile or mentally deficient. What would you do with them, with the women especially?—My impression is that when a woman of 27 has already been convicted 72 times, we don't require to hold any inquiry into her mental condition.

2054. Suppose her offence had not been drinking but solicitation?—That would go on and on.

2056. Do you believe in any sort of nostrum for curing the taste for drink?—I do not know of any except teetotalism.

2057. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you thought it desirable to place restrictions on the pawnbroker who advances money for the purchase of drink, the security for the amount being furniture, body or bed clothing, or on the vendor of drink, be he publican or licensed grocer, who supplies liquor to habitual drunkards?—It is illegal to supply a drunk man with drink, but we have the very greatest difficulty in getting convictions. There was a case the other day where the publican escaped, although he had been proved to have supplied drink to a drunken man. Any publican may supply a drunkard with liquor if he is not drunk at the time. The Edinburgh custom is, that a drunk man must be first refused by some other publican for being drunk, before the case can be made out against the second publican. There is not a conviction in half the cases that are tried.

2058. Is it your opinion that a certain class of public-houses is largely responsible for these wretched specimens of the habitual?—To some small extent, but I think a good deal too much is made of the bad whisky and the class of publican. I think they are, on the whole, as respectable as you could have them; and I believe that given enough of the best whisky you would have the same results.

2059. Have you any 'finish' drinking in Edinburgh?—Yes.

2060. Much?—I would not say much, but a certain amount. [Witness then withdrew.]

*Sir James
Alexander
Russell.*

20 Nov. 18

*William
Henderson.*

WILLIAM HENDERSON Chief Constable of Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Henderson.*

2061. (By the Chairman.) You are the Chief Constable of Edinburgh?—Yes.

2062. How long have you been here?—Nearly 17 years.

2063. Before that you were in Glasgow?—Before going to Leeds as Chief Constable, I was between eight and nine years in Manchester, and before that I was in Glasgow.

2064. When was that?—I joined the Glasgow force in 1864, and left it in 1867.

2066. Is there anything peculiar about the Edinburgh system as compared with other towns?—Each town I have been in has its peculiarities.

2067. There is one point on which we have been endeavouring to get some information, and that is what accounts for the fact that, whereas in Glasgow there are 60 per thousand of the population arrested each year for breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly, the number of arrests in Edinburgh for these offences are only 24 per thousand?—That arises from a variety of causes. Having graduated, so to speak, in Glasgow 30 years ago, I had then an opportunity of seeing the way in which police matters were managed there, and I have since had an opportunity of comparing the systems that I have been connected with, with that system.

2068. But what do you say that difference arises from?—As I have said, it arises from a variety of causes. First of all, you have to take the nature of the population very much into consideration. Secondly, you have to take into account the mode of administration of the police. When I speak of the population you have, of course, to keep in view the habits, customs, and practices that prevailed, and have prevailed for a great many years in the different places. One thing that has always struck me as a startling fact is that, coming as I did direct from Leeds to Edinburgh, Leeds being about one half as big again in point of population—and with a very rough working population engaged in the roughest work—the iron trade, the leather trade, and a lot of very heavy trades, with little refinement surrounding them—I came to a city at least one-third less in population, and I found that the arrests for drunkenness were more than twice the number in Leeds.

2069. What is your explanation of that?—First of all, that a great deal of it is to be attributed to the more sober habits of the Leeds population. They drink beer, they feed well, and do not run riot over their cups, get mad, and have to be locked up.

2070. You have rather under-rated the disparity between Leeds and Edinburgh. There are only seven arrests per thousand in Leeds as compared with 24 per thousand in Edinburgh?—That may be so, but when I came here I remember I was struck by the fact that there were more than twice the number of drunk people arrested.

2071. Were the police acting under different instructions in Leeds to what you found in Edinburgh, or were they practically the same?—I cannot say what my predecessors instructions were, but I know what my instructions have been since I came here, and they were practically the same as in Leeds. I had different laws to deal with, however, and a different tribunal for the offenders.

2072. What were they?—First of all, there is a very important difference in the law as regards the permission of drunkenness. It is an offence in England for a license-holder to permit drunkenness on his licensed premises. It was quite sufficient in Leeds to prove, in order to get a conviction against the publican, that he had on his premises drunken people, and was taking no means to get rid of them. Here in Edinburgh, we are not only obliged to prove that, but also to prove that the publican supplied the man with the drink that made him drunk, and some of the Judges of Police go the length of holding that however drunk a man may be, and however obvious his drunkenness may be to any one else, it is necessary to prove that he, the publican, knew that the man was drunk before he supplied him.

2073. Can you give us a reference to the English Act?—It is the general Act of the country. The Licensing Act of 1872. I submit a copy of the section relating to the permission of drunkenness. One of the conditions of the license in England is that the holder shall not permit drunkenness.

2074. Would you get us a copy of this license?—Yes, and I will hand it in. I have felt many a time that if we had a power of that kind in Scotland, or anything like the consistent way in which the power is put in force, we would have a very great diminution of drunkenness.

2075. How is it put in force?—A policeman in Leeds going along his district might see a couple of drunken men staggering into a public-house. He would see whether the publican expelled them, as it was his duty to do, and as was done in every case. The result was that you scarcely ever saw a drunken person inside a public-house.

2076. Had you often occasion to prosecute publicans for permitting drunkenness?—Yes.

2078. It was explained by a previous witness here that you required to have evidence of a man having been expelled from one public-house and then refused at another?—That is not so, nor is it a general thing, but it has often occurred. A policeman sees a man expelled from a public-house, and, knowing the man, his curiosity leads him to follow him, and he sees him running amok of every public-house, until he is supplied. Then there is an information lodged, and the other publican who refused him is called as a witness against the publican who supplied him.

2079. Is he a willing witness?—Not as a rule; but he is obliged to tell the truth.

2080. We were informed in Glasgow that there was great difficulty in proving this offence under the Scotch law, and that unless the policeman saw the drink supplied, the defence could be, that the man had been refused drink, and had kicked up a row?—That is very often the case.

2081. Even in a case such as you refer to, it is quite possible that a man may have been drunk while in one public-house, and sobered down in another?—Quite. I need scarcely say that every one of these cases—and any magistrate of experience will agree with this—is most difficult to deal with. You have a batch of witnesses swearing one thing, and another batch on the other swearing the opposite, and it requires a very experienced man to say which is telling the truth.

2082. Do you employ men in plain clothes to go into public-houses in Edinburgh?—Yes.

2083. To the same extent as in Leeds?—Yes.

2084. Was there any difference in the readiness of the magistrates to convict in public-house cases in Leeds and in Edinburgh?—A very great difference. In Leeds we had a strong sound stipendiary magistrate who balanced the evidence, and picked out the salient points, who was a trained lawyer and distinguished the quality of the evidence of different witnesses.

2085. Did all these public-house cases go before the stipendiary?—Yes.

2086. Is he still there?—I have heard of his death recently.

2087. Have you not the advantage in Edinburgh of a trained lawyer in the shape of a sheriff?—I would rather not express any opinion on that point.

2088. Is there more than one sheriff?—There are three.

2089. The difference in population is rather against Leeds than Edinburgh?—Yes.

2090. Before you went to Leeds you were in Manchester, and there the present number of arrests for drunkenness is 17 per thousand, as against Edinburgh's 24 and Glasgow's 60. Does the same thing hold good as to the difference of laws regulating drunkenness in public-houses?—Anyone who has lived any time in Manchester and Leeds must be struck with the great difference in the characteristics of the two places. Manchester is a cosmopolitan town. Leeds, although a very different place, has so to speak, many of the characteristics of an overgrown village, keeping up the old habits of the county towns; while Manchester is a sort of small London.

2091. How are these public-house cases dealt with in Manchester?—By the stipendiary as a rule.

2092. Was the law strictly administered as to the harbouring of drunkenness?—Yes, but not nearly so strictly as in Leeds.

2094. Were the instructions in Manchester different from those in Leeds?—They were practically the same—to carry out the law.

2096. Is there any difference in the real definition of a drunk and incapable in England and Scotland?—I am not aware of any.

2097. Is the same mode of dealing with drunk and incapables followed out in Manchester, Leeds, and Edinburgh?—No, I do not think so, because summoning is a very much more common form of process in England than in Scotland.

2098. Can you give any idea of the proportion of cases?—Not off-hand.

2099. What is the process in England?—Take the case of Leeds. If a man got tipsy and a policeman saw him he would get one of his neighbours and send him home, and he would serve him with a summons in the beginning of the week that he was found drunk and incapable, and had become amenable to the law, but in Glasgow he would be arrested right off, and his case would count as a drunk and incapable.

2100. And in Edinburgh?—We do much the same as in Leeds, only in Edinburgh instead of being summoned the person is in many cases allowed to go on his word to appear at court. I do not believe in arrests, unless they cannot be avoided, and we summon very largely.

2101. Can you give us an idea of the number?—I have furnished it in my return to the Secretary.

2102. How far will this system of summoning which appears to be pursued in Edinburgh, but not in Glasgow, account for the difference in the number of drunks?—That I cannot say, because a different system is pursued in Glasgow.

William
Henderson.

20 Nov. 1894.

William
Henderson.

20 Nov. 1894.

2103. In what percentage of cases are you able to pursue the system of summoning in Edinburgh?—In a small proportion. One of my instructions to my men is that an arrest is not to be made unless for one of three reasons. First of all, that the offence is of such a very serious description as to necessitate an immediate arrest; secondly, that a person committing the offence is a non-law-abiding person, and one who, unless arrested, would not be made answerable for the crime; and thirdly, that he was in such a condition that, unless arrested at the time, the breach of the peace would be likely to continue.

2104. We are told that a man is not drunk and incapable if he has some one in charge of him?—The police are not entitled to arrest him in these circumstances.

2105. If one of your men found a drunkard lying in the gutter, and knew that he lived in a place not far off, what would he do?—Take him to the Police Office as incapable.

2106. There would be no talk of summoning in that case?—No.

2107. In what circumstances would you summon?—If, as you say, a man was found in the gutter and conveyed part of the way by a policeman, and some of his friends turned up and said 'that is so and so; we will take him home,' the policeman would let them do so, but he would take him first to the nearest Police Station, and there he would be allowed to go on his giving an undertaking to appear and answer to the charge of being drunk and incapable. I find in my report for last year that the only instances of persons being cited for drunkenness were men who were drunk while in charge of horses or vehicles.

2108. How many were there?—There were only four returned for that year. There is a certain amount of trouble involved in the citations, and, as a rule, when a man is taken to the station they get his friends to take him away, and they take his own obligation to appear in Court next morning. That case would appear in my return as an apprehension.

2109. Does he leave a pledge?—In many cases we just take his word, telling him he has to appear next morning.

2110. What I want to get at is how far this system of summonses or citations affects the number of cases?—Not much.

2111. How many cases of drunk and disorderly did you arrest last year?—There were 2,206 persons arrested for being drunk and incapable, and 3,094 for breaches of the peace, which include drunk and disorderly cases.

2112. I suppose that in a great many of these cases pledges are given?—Yes.

2113. Is there any rule as to the pledge to be exacted?—One consideration is to make sure that the person will appear in answer to the charge.

2114. But the lieutenant in charge will have some rule to go by. What would he consider sufficient for a simple drunk?—I should say 5s.

2115. Does any large proportion of these people let out on a pledge appear?—Generally speaking, almost every one of them appears.

2116. That is exactly the reverse of the evidence we got in Glasgow?—I am aware of that.

2117. Will you give us definite information on that point?—I will procure it and hand it in, but speaking from memory I should say there are not 100 in the course of the year who fail to appear. The law in Glasgow is very different. There they are content with the pledge being forfeited, and that is looked upon as sufficient punishment for the offence. In Edinburgh we act quite differently. The law here is that a person who has been arrested must appear and answer to the charge made against him. If he fails to appear a warrant is issued for his arrest. He is not supposed to have purged his offence by simply forfeiting the pledge.

2118. What means do you take to ascertain whether a person has given his correct name and address?—If we have the slightest doubt, we telephone to the nearest district station to ascertain if the person lives at the address given, but in the great majority of the cases something is found in the pocket of the individual to identify him.

2119. But you take trouble to ascertain that the information is genuine?—Yes.

2120. Has the lieutenant instructions to see that all precautions are taken not to liberate a man about whom he has doubts as to his identity?—Yes. It is a very different state of matters altogether in Edinburgh from Glasgow. When I was in Glasgow the law was that a man had practically purged his offence when he had lodged a pledge and forfeited it, and there was never a thought of putting any warrant in operation.

2121. Is there any uniformity in the sentences for drunk and incapable?—Well, there is a uniformity and there is not—5s. or 24 hours, 10s. or 24 hours, according to the whim of the magistrate.

2122. Is there any legal equivalent of so many shillings or so many days?—The maximum is stated in the Act both as regards Fine and Imprisonment.

2123. Where is it enacted?—In the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act of 1879.

2124. Why is it not adopted?—Because the Judge of Police does not, except in very aggravated cases, inflict the highest penalty in his power.

2125. Yes; but we were told in Glasgow that there was a regular scale of corresponding penalties in time and money?—The Act of Parliament for Edinburgh lays down a maximum penalty for certain offences.

2126. But does it lay down so many days as the equivalent to so much money?—This is laid down in the Summary Procedure Act. The non-payment of fines of certain amounts involves imprisonment to an extent limited by the amount of the Fine. There is a difference in the law of England and that of Scotland as to cumulative penalties. In England it is prescribed that the penalty for the first offence shall not exceed so much; for the second so much; and for the third so much. Is it so in Edinburgh?—In England they do very much as in various parts of Scotland. They have local statutes which regulate particular districts, but I am not aware that there is a uniform scale in England for dealing with these cases.

2127. There is the evidence of Sir John Bridge, a stipendiary magistrate in London, who says that the twelfth section of the Intoxicating Liquor Act is not adopted. There are three terms of punishment under that Act for a man found drunk—the first being a fine of 10s., the second 20s., and the third 40s. Sir John says that is the law in England?—It is so long ago since I left England that I really forget exactly how the law stood.

2128. Is there anything corresponding to that in Edinburgh?—Not that I am aware of.

2129. If a person is brought up for drunkenness, do you give any evidence to the magistrate as to previous convictions, and if so, whether before or after conviction?—When a man is brought to the bar he is asked whether he is guilty or not guilty. If he says he is not guilty, the case is adjourned till the following day. The case then goes to proof, and part of that proof may be previous convictions, but the evidence of the previous conviction is not led until the prisoner has been found guilty. The accused is charged with being drunk and incapable on such a day, and that offence is aggravated by previous convictions committed on such another day within 12 months.

2130. Is that under a local statute?—Yes; they are all charged under the 1879 Act.

2131. Will you give us the section of that Act under which it is done?—I will supply it.

2132. As to vagrancy in Edinburgh, we have been told that there is no public provision for the housing of vagrants, such as exists in England in the casual wards, but in Glasgow we were informed that a very considerable number of persons went to the Police Office and begged to be taken in for the night. Have you anything of that in Edinburgh?—They go to Glasgow as they come to us here, and they ask for protection. My lieutenants have instructions that in all cases where a man has not a place to lay his head, and asks shelter, he should be put into the most comfortable cell available, rather than be allowed to walk the streets all night.

Henderson.

2133. We were told that in Glasgow upwards of 5,000 people applied in that way. Have you any statistics on that point regarding Edinburgh?—I have no statistics, but we have nothing like that number.

2134. Could your lieutenant give us the record, say for 12 months?—Yes, he will furnish it.

2135. We are told that you manage to take a census of vagrants more completely than in other places. It gives 863 for Edinburgh against 591 for Glasgow. What is the difference in your mode of taking that census?—I do not think you can draw an analogy between Edinburgh and Glasgow, the circumstances of the two places being so very different. In Glasgow they have a very large number of what are called 'small houses'—that is to say, houses which are inspected by the sanitary officers and which are registered under the sanitary department. We have, comparatively speaking, nothing of the kind here, and almost everyone of the tramp or vagrant class is to be found inside a properly registered common lodging-house. We register a great many places as common lodging-houses which would be treated in Glasgow as 'small houses.' Our lodging-houses are visited every night by the police officers, and that enables us to see our migratory population in a very different way from Glasgow.

2136. Do you suffer much in Edinburgh from vagrants?—Very seriously.

2137. In what way?—First of all, in consequence of a change in the administration of the prisons, we have great numbers of these people brought in from the south and east of Scotland, to serve their term in the prison here.

2138. And they are let loose in Edinburgh?—Yes. They are certainly furnished with tickets on their liberation from prison, which entitle them to go to the station, and get a ticket to the place from which they have come; but I am aware that a large proportion of them do not take advantage of that, except to go to the booking office and take out a ticket, and wait about to see if they can get a chance of selling it, and then they get drunk, and are locked up.

2139. Do they increase your number of drunks?—I am certain they do.

2140. Are you troubled with many beggars?—A very large number.

2141. How many have you in Edinburgh?—There were 174 apprehensions for begging last year.

2142. Would these discharged vagrant prisoners contribute largely to that number?—They do.

2143. As to the instructions which you issue with regard to prostitution, and your method of dealing with that offence—under your Police Act, what constitutes the crime—solicitation, or simply street-walking?—Solicitation.

2144. And it is no crime for a woman to loiter without solicitation?—It is an offence to loiter, but it is not a part of the instructions to the police to arrest for that.

2145. To loiter would apply to both sexes?—No.

2146. Then how do you deal with crowds of men hanging about street corners?—That has nothing to do with prostitution.

2147. No, but is that loitering an offence that can be committed by men as well as women?—It is only an offence in the sense of being committed for the purpose of prostitution, and the police have strict orders not to arrest unless the women have been found soliciting, and even then, not to arrest unless the women have been first warned. The lieutenant has very precise instructions not to entertain any case brought in by a police officer unless the woman was first warned. I submit copies of my General Orders to the Force on the subject. They are marked W.H.

2148. Do you employ men in plain clothes in connection with these offences?—Yes.

2149. In the case of women having previous convictions against them, are the police equally careful?—I hope so. My instructions are equally explicit.

2150. What is the number of your arrests for William Henderson importuning passengers for the purpose of prostitution?—351 last year.

2151. I observe that the ratio per thousand of arrests for solicitation in Glasgow is 3·6 against 1·3 in Edinburgh. Assuming that it is an undesirable thing to arrest any person whom you can avoid arresting, without injuring the morality and the amenity of the streets, do you find that your streets are as decently or as well regulated at night as in Glasgow?—I have very little experience of Glasgow, for I have not been there over-night for some years. I have had no experience of Glasgow under the new laws.

2153. What is the sort of sentence given for solicitation?—We have one of the sheriffs who for some reason does not, in any circumstances, give more than 5s. or 24 hours to any prostitute. The result is that while that sheriff is on the bench, in those districts of the city frequented by those women—many of them occupied by respectable citizens—I am inundated with complaints. I take the policemen to task, and they say that the women simply snap their fingers at them, and say, 'what do I care for 5s. or 24 hours.'

2154. As regards the other magistrates?—Some of them have begun to follow suit.

2155. Is 5s. or 24 hours the general punishment in Edinburgh?—It is the predominating punishment.

2156. And still you find that the condition of the streets is as good as Glasgow?—I cannot say; but in some districts they are not at all satisfactory or creditable.

2157. What was the case in Leeds with regard to prostitution?—If they were persistent, and a source of annoyance to the neighbourhood, the stipendiary gave a cumulative punishment, and I have known him go the length of committing the person as incorrigible to the Quarter Sessions.

2158. But what was the usual sentence?—I cannot be altogether sure at this time of day, but I think the punishment varied very much according to the circumstances.

2159. Were the streets of Leeds in the central portion, well or better regulated than in Edinburgh?—I would say they were not quite so well regulated, for there was a larger supply. The law for regulating brothels was not so strictly applied as here.

2160. But do you not find that the suppression of brothels rather increased the number of women on the street?—Certainly not.

2161. Nor the suppression of houses in which they would find accommodation?—Certainly not.

2163. And concomitantly with that there has been a decrease in the number of prostitutes on the streets?—In 1879, the year in which the Act came into operation, the number of prostitutes dealt with by the Police Court was about 1,500, and that number has gone down, I think, to 350. Before the Act you could see five women on the streets for every one you see to-day.

2164. In Leeds last year there were only five women apprehended for prostitution altogether?—If some magistrates lay down the rule that they will not convict unless the person importuned appears, as has been done by a London magistrate, I can quite understand that the apprehensions will come to nil. I do not know whether such a course has been adopted in Leeds. It is nearly 17 years since I left it, but if only five women were arrested in a year for prostitution I should say that it arose from some such cause, or in consequence of some special instruction not to make arrests.

2165. In Edinburgh the convictions are due to the policemen who see the women importuning?—That is so.

2166. And they give evidence that they saw them

William
Henderson.

20 Nov. 1894.

importuning?—And that they had warned them before arrest.

2167. Have you any statistics of the number of persons imprisoned in the cells in the Police Office?—I furnish them to the Prison Commissioners every year.

2169. Supposing a person was convicted before a magistrate three, four, or five times, and at the end of that period he is passed on to another Court, before whom do you think should the inquiry as to his being an habitual offender take place? Would you be satisfied with two magistrates or two Justices of the Peace?—In Edinburgh there are a lot of anomalies in that way, which are utterly ridiculous. For instance, a person is brought up for an offence which the local Act says it is not competent to try in the Police Court, and the magistrate remits the prisoner from himself in a lower tribunal, and walks across the street and tries him in a higher tribunal.

2170. Have your magistrates the time to make the necessary inquiry before certifying a person to be an habitual offender?—I do not see why they could not. You have a large staff to fall back upon to make the inquiry.

2171. Have your magistrates ample time to dispose of cases of this kind, necessitating before certification an inquiry into his habits of life, his social surroundings, &c.?—I would suggest that, supposing a person who had been several times convicted, and was suspected of being an habitual offender, were brought before a magistrate, his case should be adjourned till the following day, and a full report of it prepared and submitted to the magistrate.

2172. That might suit you as the Public Prosecutor, but would that be quite fair to the defendant?—I think so. If 24 hours were insufficient, let the adjournment be for 48 hours. We make such inquiries at present. If a prisoner makes a statement, the magistrate adjourns the case to know if it is true or not, and it is remitted to me, and I make the necessary inquiry and place the information before the magistrate on the following day.

2174. (By the Chairman.) In the case of persons not convicted on Saturday, are they kept over till Monday?—Yes.

2175. So that they may have three days in jail?—Yes, if they cannot find bail. The case which led to all cases being adjourned for at least 24 hours unless a plea of guilty was tendered was that of a woman who was arrested in Edinburgh three-quarters of an hour before she was put on her trial and convicted, and the Judges of the High Court considered that she had been surprised, so to speak, and had not had time to arrange her defence. An order was then made, without the full effect of it being seen, and ever since, when a prisoner pleads not guilty he is told to come back next morning.

2176. Is that an Act of Sederunt?—It is simply a regulation of the Police Court.

2177. Why was that regulation made?—With my English experience, I am opposed to any pleas being taken from prisoners. I think that the English form is the manly and straightforward one, and that the charge should come out of the mouth of the person making it, so that the accused should have an opportunity of telling him that he was not speaking the truth. In Edinburgh a man may be placed at the bar charged with being drunk and incapable. At first sight it might have appeared to the constable that he was, but it might be that he was not, and that he was ill. He is a working-man and is brought up next morning. He knows that if he pleads not guilty he will lose another day's work the following day, with the probability of being convicted after all, and he therefore pleads guilty. If that man had been in England the policeman who arrested him would have given evidence that at a certain hour he had been found lying drunk and incapable. The accused might then turn round and say that he was ill, and that he had told the officer so. That gives him an opportunity of getting his defence before the Court.

2180. Is that practice peculiar to Edinburgh?—I rather think it is; and it is the result of an order which was made at the time in the belief that it was in the interest of the liages.

2181. It is a convenience for the police?—It is; but I think it leads to great injustice.

2183. Don't you think that 24 or 48 hours would be a rather short time for a man to get up a defence in order to prove that he was not an habitual drunkard?—I don't think so; but let him have a week if necessary.

2184. You make a clear distinction between the 'wasters' of society and the working-man, and other classes who occasionally make a mistake?—Yes, I do.

2186. Have you ever thought about the length of time to seclude a person convicted of habitual drunkenness?—That must depend on the peculiar circumstances of each individual case. You have cases of men who never get over the score for perhaps 12 months or even longer, and you have them with recurring periods of a few months. Notice must be taken of the intervals between the commission of offences. I have always thought there was a defect in our prison system. Not from any fault of our prison officials. The police, who know the out-of-prison life of their customers, have nothing whatever to do with the man the moment sentence is passed upon him. He goes inside the prison walls and is handled by the prison officials, who know nothing whatever of his out-of-prison life.

2187. That arises from a want of classification?—I think it arises from the fact that there is not sufficient touch in matters of that kind between the prison administration and the police administration.

2188. But if you made that inquiry, would it not necessarily lead to a classification?—No doubt.

2189. The Inspector of Constabulary has a census of vagrants taken every year in the month of December.

William
Henderson.

William Henderson.

15 Nov. 1894.

20 Nov. 1894.

That gives a return of 853 for Edinburgh and 591 for Glasgow. Do you think this census is a fair indication of the amount of vagrancy in Scotland as a whole, or in particular districts?—I would answer that by saying that the circumstances of Edinburgh and Glasgow are entirely different, and therefore the figures are in that respect very misleading.

2190. Are you aware that up till 1890 the number of vagrants challenged in Scotland was given in this return as 100,000?—But that return represents perhaps the same man challenged 20 or 30 times in the course of the month. I would say that if the return for Glasgow was prepared on exactly the same footing as Edinburgh, you would, I believe, have four times the number of vagrants in Glasgow as in Edinburgh. The extraordinary diversity in the figures arises simply from the different systems of supervision.

2193. Can you suggest any change in the law by which, not only the victim of intemperance may be dealt with, but also the liquor seller and the pawnbroker, who to a large extent help to manufacture these drunken people and confirm the habit?—The only alteration that has occurred to me as practicable, although I see considerable difficulty in connection with it, is that in the case of a man who was duly certified, after proper care, as an habitual offender, it should be notified to him that he was not entitled to go into any place licensed for the sale of drink, and that the police should be instructed to notify to the holders of licenses that he had been so certified, and must not be supplied with any liquor.

2194. Would you make the same law with regard to the pawnbroker, so that he should not receive the furniture or clothing of such a person?—The pawnbroker is a very different subject. He is the poor man's banker, and I would not go the length of making such a law regarding him.

2195. Supposing I told you of a man who was no sooner out of prison, and refused 2s. 6d. for drink, than he took the blankets off the bed and pawned them straight away?—I know of hundreds of such cases, but knowing also what I do of the poor people I would not make such a law in regard to the pawnbroker.

2197. Where would you propose to send those people who were certified as habitual offenders?—The only practicable course that occurs to me is that every community when it reaches a certain stage, should have to provide something in the shape of a colony of labour—that it should acquire within a reasonable distance of the town some land that was worth nothing, and which wanted reclaiming. You would then have a colony of labour, where the wif could be employed in spreading the refuse of the city and reclaiming the land.

2199. Do very many of the little girls who have taken to selling newspapers on the streets, and in regard to whose employment there is no satisfactory regulation, ultimately become members of the unfortunate class of women?—Undoubtedly.

2200. Is there anything in the Police Acts giving power to prohibit or regulate that employment?—There is a power to prohibit children under ten years of age from being so employed.

2201. On what ground did the authorities object to ask Parliament for powers to control this employment in regard to girls over that age?—The authorities never objected to ask for such powers. On the contrary, they did ask for them. Fifteen years ago I spent months over this question, and prepared a code of regulations in connection with the Bill then before Parliament, and after all our trouble Lord Redesdale, the Chairman of Committees at the time, drew his pen through the whole lot, characterising it as grandmotherly legislation, and it was thrown aside. But I know our Local Authority was most anxious to have such powers. I go the length of saying, knowing the fruitful source of crime which this employment is, and its consequences, that no children should be allowed to sell on the street without being properly regulated, and that no female child should be allowed to sell on the street at all, the traffic being confined to males placed under proper control.

2202. In regard to this class of female offenders, the greater number of whom, I suppose, belong to the unfortunate class, do you find that the punishment inflicted by the police magistrate has a deterrent effect?—Speaking generally, I am sure that so called punishments are not punishments at all, in so far as being deterrents.

2203. Is it within your knowledge that girls sent to a Home, on condition that the penalty of the Court would not be inflicted, have remained there?—Yes; but a very large proportion of them do not remain.

2204. Would it have a good effect if power were given to the magistrate to order their detention in such a Home?—I question very much whether it would have any ultimate good effect; but my experience in connection with these Homes has been that, as a rule, the women sent to the Homes are not at all cut out for the kind of work they are put to there. They are put to a kind of work that sets their backs up immediately, and they fight against it, and get out of it as soon as they can. If you wish to bring about a reformation in women of that kind, I think there is great room for a change in the labour provided for them.

2205. You take great interest in the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—I do.

2207. How are they admitted there?—I am not on the management of that institution and have nothing to do with it.

2208. I understand it is for the reception of children treated by their parents with cruelty?—Yes.

2209. Does any one take proceedings against the parents of such children?—Hardly a week passes but proceedings are taken against the parents of such children, generally by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

2210. You are also interested in the scheme for providing clothing for poor children?—Yes.

2211. On what principle do the police select the cases for distributing that clothing?—They find a child in severe weather barefooted, and suffering from the effects of the weather, and insufficiently protected from it. They make inquiry, find out what the father is, and the circumstances of the family all through; and they then send in a report to the association, and the child is sent for and clothed. The parents, if they have done anything at all to bring them within the reach of the Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, are warned in the first place, and observation is kept upon them, and they are prosecuted if they do not pay attention to the warning. Every precaution is taken, by the indelible marking of all the clothing, to see that none of the articles can find their way to the pawnshop. Every possible precaution is taken to see that while the child is saved from suffering, the parents, if drunken people, are not benefited.

2212. I suppose your experience is that most of the children who suffer thus belong to drunken parents?—Very largely.

William
Henderson.

20 Nov. 1894.

2213. Have you any idea of the number of cases of parents prosecuted for neglecting children in this way, and who have been supplied with clothes by the association?—I could not exactly say, but there was a very considerable number during last year.

2214. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you consider that the present organisation of the Society for the Protection of Children affords sufficient knowledge of that class of children to the police to repress cruelty?—I do not suppose that every case is known; but I may say that, in the opinion of the Public Prosecutor, it is not sufficient to prove that a child is subjected to suffering in consequence of the drunken habits of its parents. You must go a great deal further before you can get the Public Prosecutor to take the case up, and must show, not only that these parents have been negligent and have caused their children suffering, but that the suffering is to such an extent as to produce marks on the body, or emaciation before the prosecutor will take up the case. Every year I have heard of scores of cases where it was impossible to get a prosecution because the children had been well-nourished in their bodies and showed no marks of violence. Some of these people are very fond of their children, and although they may get drunk every week, if you cannot show cruelty by injuries on the child's body or by starvation, the Prosecutor does not think himself justified in taking proceedings. I have often thought that the law might be extended very considerably to deal with people who get drunk week after week and neglect their children.

2215. In what direction would you extend the law?—Very much in the direction pointed out for dealing with habitual offenders. If I found the parents neglecting the children—if the father comes home with his wages on a Saturday, and is then out drinking with his wife till eleven o'clock at night, leaving the children neglected and crying, and an annoyance to the neighbours, I would make that an offence, but the Public Prosecutor would not take up such a case.

2216. (By the Chairman.) But cannot the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children act without the intervention of the Public Prosecutor?—No.

2217. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In your description of the English system for suppressing drunkenness, you say that the publican had not to permit drunkenness on the premises?—Yes.

2218. Was it customary to have a visitation of the police or some one to see if there was actual drunkenness on the premises?—Yes; the same as exists here. I have the public-houses regularly visited.

2220. I did not quite gather the bearing of your description between Manchester and Leeds. How does that bear on the difference in the number of convictions as shown in these tables?—The habits of the people are different all through. You cannot have an analogy between a cosmopolitan place on the one side and an over-grown village on the other.

2221. But how does that explain the difference between 17 and 7 per thousand of apprehensions for breaches of the peace and petty offences?—I used to ascribe a large part of the good behaviour of Leeds to the consistent and persistent way in which the stipendiary magistrate administered the law. I have often said he was as good as a force of 500 policemen.

2222. You have said that the numbers of petty offenders and beggars have been very largely increased in Edinburgh by the centralising of the prison system?—Yes.

2223. Can you produce any evidence of that?—Yes.

2224. Can you do so just now?—If you give me a week I will bring you witnesses to prove from their own observation, this system of liberated prisoners going to the booking-office, and getting their tickets, and selling them for half their value.

2225. Are you aware that within recent years the Prison Commissioners have taken action to prevent that?—Yes.

2226. Then you do not know that now the ticket is marked, not only for a certain train, but for a prisoner?—Yes, and I think I can show that that provision is over-ridden in the same way as I have mentioned.

2227. You are aware that the matter came under the notice of the Secretary for Scotland, and on inquiry it was found that the numbers were very small indeed?—It is very difficult to bring these matters home.

2228. At any rate, the inquiry did not bear out your statement that there were large numbers?—But it did not alter my opinion of the number of these men who were saddled upon us.

2229. The number of beggars for Edinburgh you state at 174, which is not an extremely large number. By what proportion do you suppose the number has been increased through the liberations from prison?—I had hoped that if we had not had these liberations I would have brought begging in Edinburgh down to next to nothing. I am very much against this system, believing that it perpetuates vagrancy and causes many evils, and when I see those batches turned out of the Calton every morning, my faith in an improvement is broken.

2230. You say you always warn a prostitute before you apprehend her?—Yes.

2231. Is that once in her life-time or once a year?—Every time.

2232. Without going into a definition of what a habitual offender is, have you formed any conception of the number of habitual offenders, who, if you could remove them from the city, would cause such an immense improvement?—I should say, speaking roughly, from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per thousand of the population, or about 600. I think that proportion would hold good in every large centre of population.

2233. You think that number represents the habitually disorderly class?—Yes.

2234. Do you think that the work which the police do in connection with the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor tends in any way to diminish the number of habitual offenders?—I believe that it will have that effect.

2236. I suppose the vagrancy population of Edinburgh varies considerably at different times of the year?—Yes.

2237. Are you aware that a large number of those who are vagrants in summer are residents in winter?—A considerable number are.

2238. Are there such things in Edinburgh as daily vagrants—those who leave the town during the day and return to sleep at night?—I have no doubt there will be a number of that floating population.

2239. A large city comes to be practically a sort of central station for the vagrant population?—That is so.

2240. There are very few of them moving about without a definite point to return to from time to time?—Yes, without a series of definite points. Edinburgh may be the definite point at one time of year, Glasgow at another, Dumfries at another, Dundee, Perth, Aberdeen, and Inverness for others.

2241. But there are a certain number who are continually coming back to Edinburgh, and have never any other place where they live?—No doubt a certain number do.

2242. Where do these people reside?—Mostly in the common lodging-houses.

2243. And they have therefore money to pay for a bed?—Yes; fourpence.

2245. Whisky is more likely to lead to violence?—Another reason is the kind of food taken.

2246. Do you think the climate has anything to do with it?—I have no doubt of it. But still, Leeds has a very humid atmosphere.

2247. Has housing anything to do with it?—A great deal.

2248. Do you think that the fact of many in Glasgow living in one-roomed houses has anything to do with it?—I should say very much.

2249. Have you formed any opinion as to the number of convictions that would justify a man being dealt with as an habitual drunkard?—I would not advocate any hard or fast line. Everything must depend on the circumstances of individual cases.

2250. Do you think a certain number of persons should be treated as habitual drunkards who are never convicted at all?—I have no doubt of it.

2251. Do you think they should be treated in a curative and not in a punitive sense?—I see many cases every day which are as sad as those brought before the magistrates, but it is difficult to say whether in regard to them you should take such steps as is thought to be the outcome of this inquiry.

2252. Might not a man starve and injure his wife and family without assaulting them?—Yes; but if you attempt to deal with these people by a general rule, you will find tremendous difficulties, and you will very often find that the persons most aggrieved are the first, when the blow is over, to get all sorts of restrictions removed.

2253. Coming to the question of vagrancy, are those great armies of tramps who flood the rural districts in summer, accommodated in the towns in winter?—A great many of them.

2255. Can you suggest any means of getting rid of that nuisance of tramps?—I am afraid you will have the tramps to all time. I looked into this question some 12 months ago, when I wrote an article on the subject of tramps for one of the Encyclopædias, and I found that what existed in 1529 practically exists to-day. In 1529, Martin Luther wrote a book, and gave a description of 29 different kinds of tramps. If you make allowance for the electric telegraph, the railways, and other facilities of locomotion, you have practically the same 29 kinds of vagabonds to-day.

2257. How do you find out what the loitering is for? It may be for a legitimate purpose?—That is for the magistrate to decide. But in consequence of the view expressed by many of the magistrates I go on the line that the police are not to make arrests for mere loitering, but must be able to prove solicitation, and that the accused person had been warned. Some of the women are very persistent, and practically set the police at defiance.

2258. (By the Chairman.) Where are the prostitutes sent to?—The bulk of them to the cells for 24 hours.

2259. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You require evidence of previous conviction before they can be taken up for importuning. How do you get the first conviction?—The first element is that the woman is found out late on the streets, keeping company with women who are known as prostitutes, or found in brothels with men.

2260. Your labour colony would be something like that of the Salvation Army?—Yes; the only difference is that any labour colony such as suggested would be regulated on proper business principles by the State, and not abused in any way.

2261. It could not be made self-supporting?—I do not think it could. It would have to be supported by the State, but it might contribute very largely to its own support.

2262. Do you think agricultural labour is suited to many people, such as clerks and others who are not accustomed to it?—But there would not be so many of that class. It would suit the corner men and loafers about the city.

2263. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You mentioned that since 1879 the number of houses of ill-fame and of prostitutes in Edinburgh had both been reduced. Do you find that vice has been very much lessened in the city?—There is no doubt about it. I have always held that every brothel that was allowed to be carried on openly was, so to speak, a kind of social cancer. It is impossible to suppress the thing altogether, but it is an evil of the kind that wants cauterising. The keeper of a house of that kind ought to be made to feel that it is not a profitable business for anyone, but keeping in view, what we must all admit, that whenever the population runs into hundreds of thousands it is a matter we must face and deal with in a firm and determined way. So far as the police are concerned, their duty should be defined. It is not part of your duty to prevent men and women who want to have to do with each other having it, but it is a very important part of your duty to prevent those who do not want it from having it thrust upon them, and having disorder, annoyance, and crime created. A great many allegations were made against the Act at the time it came into force, but the information in our hands at the time of the passing of the Act and now shows clearly enough that all the evils predicted as likely to arise from the passing of the Act have not arisen. It was said that illegitimacy, venereal disease, and prostitution itself would increase, but everything has turned out the other way.

2264. With regard to the work given to those women in Homes, is there any other kind of work you can suggest?—Almost the only industry in those places is laundry work and sewing. I have spoken to many of those girls, and they all dislike the work. I think there might be occupations which would make the place a little more attractive for them.

2265. Are you aware that the east end of London statistics are to the effect that the public-house has not got the power it once had, and that there are respectable and disreputable public-house keepers?—Yes.

2266. Do you find that in Edinburgh there are respectable and disreputable public-houses?—Yes.

2267. Can you place a mark of distinction on them?—Yes.

2268. Do you think greater strictness should be exercised with the holders of disreputable houses?—We only do so when anything can be proved against the license-holder. I am generally asked for my views in the Licensing Court, but I have to be very careful. I have often thought, both as regards new and old licenses, that, instead of having opinions expressed and memorials produced with hundreds of signatures, it should be made a matter of evidence, where persons could be subjected to examination.

2270. Can you give statistics?—I said I could produce some of the witnesses sent down to observe the state of matters at the station two years ago; but Col. M'Hardy says things are different now. I wish to make one or two suggestions for the consideration of the Committee. First of all, in connection with the rising generation. I felt, when I was sent for to come here, that in dealing simply with those who had become habitual criminals, you were not preventing the crop growing up again.

2271. (By the Chairman.) How do you propose to deal with them?—I was going to suggest that a good deal more might be done at the School Board than is done at present.

L

William
Henderson.

2272. In what way?—Well, the Education Act has now been in force for 23 years, and Edinburgh has increased in juvenile delinquency during that time, or since I came here, fully 200 per cent. That points to something wrong in the training of the rising generation.

2273. Or it might possibly be due to the offences constituted under the new Police Acts?—I do not think these have made an appreciable difference, for the offences are those which existed before.

2274. How do you propose to deal with it?—I think that in the education as carried on at present there is a want in the moral training of the child. I do not wish to say that it is immoral, but I will go the length of saying that the training in the School Board schools at the present day is non-moral.

Alexander
Peddie.

DR. ALEXANDER PEDDIE, M.D., F.R.C.S., Edinburgh, called in and examined.

William
Henderson.

20 Nov. 1894.

2275. I do not think that comes under our remit?—I was going to suggest a curriculum or standard of conduct that might be added to the standards in use in the Board Schools. When a child leaves school, say at 14, it drifts on to the street, and anything that could be done to prevent that would stop the supply.

2276. What have you to suggest on that point?—The only thing of a practical nature I could suggest is that some sort of Bureau of Labour should be created and regulated by the State, where, when a child leaves school, information could be supplied to the parents and the child as to what kind of employment was available, where it could be got, and how to secure it. That would not only be useful to the parents and the children, but also to employers. [Witness then withdrew].

Alexander
Peddie.

2277. (By the Chairman.) You have long taken an interest in the question of the treatment of inebriates?—Yes.

2278. You gave evidence before the Dalrymple Committee?—Yes, in 1872.

2279. And you are the author of a pamphlet entitled 'Suggestions for Legislation in Scotland for Habitual Drunkards'?—Yes.

2280. Do you consider that the Acts for dealing with inebriates are quite inadequate?—Quite so.

2281. Inasmuch as they do not deal compulsorily with that class?—Yes.

2282. Do you consider that habitual drunkenness is a form of insanity?—I do.

2283. Would you have it dealt with by the same authority that deals with lunatics?—No; certainly not. It is only a form of or allied to insanity, but not coming under the Lunacy Law; and I would keep it distinct.

2284. You know that the Inebriates Acts have not been adopted at all in Scotland?—Yes.

2285. You have a class of quasi voluntary cases who can be committed on their own voluntary submission?—Yes.

2286. It has been suggested that people ought to be able to be committed on the suggestion of friends who would pay for them. Do you approve of that?—Yes. Of course the certification would require to be very credible, and after careful investigation.

2287. In Scotland would you propose to have the investigation before the sheriff?—I do not think it necessary to go before a civil functionary at all, if certificates by medical authorities and friends were satisfactory.

2288. But as regards lunacy, a great safeguard against malpractices is that the evidence has to be brought before the sheriff?—Yes, but I would not have the habitual drunkard or dipsomaniac brought before any one, although I would have the complete evidence submitted; in lunacy personal appearance is not required.

2289. As to the provision of Homes for the labouring and pauper classes, and Reformatories for the criminal class of inebriates, what is your suggestion?—I would have Homes for the labouring classes to which drunkards could be admitted either voluntarily or on certification, and the same for the pauper classes, and also for the worst type of the habitual drunkard in the criminal classes. I would have that done after repeated conviction for the criminal classes; and the persons either sent direct to the Reformatory, or confined for a short time in prison and then transferred to a Reformatory. And, it should be in the power of the magistrate to extend the period of confinement on the evidence of the superintendent and the medical officer.

2290. How are you going to support these habitual offenders?—That is a difficult matter. I think, in the first instance, there should be an application to Government for a grant to establish a few Homes in large centres of the country, such as Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen; and if that cannot be got from the Government I think it should be raised by general taxation, or local taxation in Scotland in the large industrial centres.

2291. Do you think Scotland is riper for some reform of the kind you indicate than England?—I have no doubt of it. I think the medical profession is quite unanimous that something ought to be done; and that as it is a form of insanity it requires to be controlled.

2292. In your precis you give a description of the ways and means for carrying out the scheme which you sketch. You propose that for the labouring classes there should be three Homes, tentatively, in the meantime, and of an inexpensive character—the number and size to be increased if need be; and that they should be situated in the three chief centres—Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. For the pauper classes you think there should be several houses connected with the present poorhouses, and under parochial management; and for the criminal classes that there should be several houses near the chief prisons in the country, but distinct from them, while under the direction and inspection and support of the Prison Board; and that in all the Homes careful provision should be made for the separation of the sexes, and for remunerative and useful work?—Yes.

2293. You have not yet quite made up your mind as to the source of the ways and means, for you say the ways and means for carrying out the scheme will require careful calculation and consideration?—Yes.

2294. You have not definitely made up your mind?—Not definitely.

2295. Did you draw up a sketch Bill in your pamphlet for the Dalrymple Committee?—I made suggestions for legislation for all the different classes of drunkards, and the report was accepted by the Committee, and placed in the Appendix of its Report.

2296. In those houses which you propose to erect you calculate the number to be accommodated under your scheme at from 50 to 100 in each?—Yes, because I consider that in a scheme like that there should not be too much done at first, but that the houses should be enlarged as the Act was found to work.

2297. You think the outlay for such buildings might be roughly put at about £30,000?—That was a rough guess of £5,000 for each of the six buildings I propose.

2298. And you suggest that this sum, if not obtainable by a Government grant, might be raised by general or local taxation?—Yes.

2299. As to the up-keep of the Home for the labouring class, you think that might be met by the friends of the inmates, by work in the institution; and by charitable contributions?—Yes. I lay great stress on the work that could be done in those institutions; and not only that there should be compulsory power to admit and retain in these places, but power to compel labour.

2300. As to the pauper institutions, they would be supported by the Parochial Boards; and the criminal class would fall upon the Prison Board?—Yes; but I think the ways and means might be met a very long way by contributions, and sums paid for the admission of individuals, and by the work done. The whole subject of the scheme must be looked at, and a grasp taken of it in a serious philanthropic spirit, and in a business-like light, keeping in view the enormous amount of human misery affecting individuals and families, and the utterly useless expenditure entailed on the nation by the habitual inebriates of all classes. I am sanguine enough to believe that if the scheme now sketched were carefully carried out the result would be that the financial account between it and the nation would show a balance on the credit side of the latter, while the benefits in private and social life would be incalculable.

2301. (By Dr. Farquharson.) How many years have you taken an interest in this subject?—I published my first paper on it in 1858. My attention was very early given to diseases arising from drink, and to insane drunkards. I wrote a pamphlet on delirium tremens; and in 1855 the Commissioners of Lunacy having drawn attention to the necessity of prolonged control in cases of insanity arising from intoxication, I wrote first on dipsomania. Since then I have written six or seven different papers on the subject, and these have been read before different societies, including the British Association, and the National Social Science Congress.

2302. Do you think that the necessity for legislation is as great now as when you began to investigate the subject?—I think so. If anything, I think it is greater.

2303. Do you think the present means of coping with those evils by voluntary Homes are of much value?—I think they do very little good; but considering the difficulties in which they are placed, from the want of compulsory powers, the success is remarkable. It has been well-established by the Dalrymple Home that 30 per cent. are curable. American writers place the percentage of curables at 35.

2304. Are you hopeful of curing a large number of these cases?—I think that fully 30 per cent. may be cured.

2305. You think it worth while trying this experiment, even at some cost?—I think so.

2306. Do you think the medical profession would like this new responsibility put upon them?—I don't think they would object.

2307. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You suggest four different Retreats or Homes—one for the rich, one for the labouring class, one for the paupers, and another for the criminal class?—I do not suggest anything for the well-to-do class, because I believe if there was a compulsory law the upper classes might be left to voluntary adventure for Homes, which I think would be quite sufficient to meet their wants. As regards the other classes there is a necessity for Government to interfere.

2308. But is there a necessity to make this distinct separation of the three other classes, and increase the number of these establishments so largely?—I think so. To mix up the working-class with paupers, vagrants, and beggars, would be impolitic.

2309. Could you not grade them in the same place?—Not very well.

2310. (By Miss Stevenson.) Would you propose that the voluntary Homes for the richer classes should be licensed and under supervision, so that the managers could compulsorily detain the inmates?—Most assuredly.

2311. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is there any reason why the dipsomaniac should not have the option of a public inquiry, even though certified by two medical men?—I have no objection whatever to that, I think everything should be done to protect the liberty of the subject, and if he desires a public inquiry he should get it.

2312. You would not insist on a public inquiry where the person desired to have it conducted in camera?—No.

2313. You would leave it to the dipsomaniac himself or herself to have the option of a public or private inquiry?—Yes. [Witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

SEVENTH DAY.

Edinburgh, 21st November 1894.

PRESENT :—

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bt., M.P. (Chairman).
COL. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
SIR COLIN SCOTT MONCRIEFF, R.E.
DR. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

PROFESSOR DOVE WILSON.
DR. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
MISS FLORA C. STEVENSON.

JOHN WALCOT, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

2314. (By the Chairman.) You are a magistrate of the city of Edinburgh?—I have been a magistrate of the city of Edinburgh until the beginning of the present month.

2315. Since when?—Since 1885.

2316. You have had a long experience on the bench?—I have.

2317. You have been struck I believe by the frequency with which certain persons appeared before you?—I was very much impressed with that the first month I sat on the bench.

2318. You have, I believe, brought the matter before the public at different times?—I brought it before the Convention of Burghs first of all. I brought it up two or three times in successive years before the same body.

2319. Would you tell us what action the Convention of Burghs took in the matter?—Their first action was to remit it to a general committee, and that committee met and determined that they would send out a number of questions to Chief Constables and Governors of Prisons and Reformatories and other similar institutions throughout Scotland.

2320. You received many replies?—We received a large number of replies, I do not know whether you have seen the paper or not. I brought a copy with me in case you have not got it.

2321. The replies were very diverse?—They were diverse. There were some who thought that we had sufficient power at present to prevent the evil of habitual offence if we did but use it.

2322. What power do you refer to?—The power to fine 40s. or give 60 days according to discretion, that is in our Edinburgh Police Court. In addition to that we have power, if we think proper to exercise it, to John Walcot. impose a caution or an additional number of days' imprisonment.

21 Nov. 1894. 2323. That is in effect an equivalent to the English surety for good behaviour?—That is so.

2324. Is that course ever adopted?—It is adopted here frequently.

2325. With what results?—I think with good results. I have been induced to adopt it mainly from my experience of the First Offenders Act; I do not think any Act has been passed by the British Parliament so wise and so useful as that Act for First Offenders.

2326. Does not the high security involve the risk of a man being imprisoned for want of it?—No, I do not think so. Under the ordinary Police Law it would involve that. But under the First Offenders Act we take the name as a pledge that they will reappear when called upon.

2327. And you accept his own security?—Yes.

2328. In every case?—Possibly not in a bad case.

2329. In bad cases what sort of security would you ask?—I have sometimes asked as high as £2.

2330. From whom?—From an ordinary offender if it was a bad case.

2331. You take a deposit of the money?—Yes.

2332. Is that allowed?—Yes. We cannot keep it more than 12 months. At the end of 12 months if the conduct warrants it the money is returned.

2333. You find that this lien of £2 over a man had a good effect?—I have found it so.

2334. You can either use that power instead of the ordinary sentence or in addition to the ordinary sentence?—That is so.

2335. Do the other magistrates have recourse to that also?—I think so, but I cannot say to what extent.

2336. Among other suggestions sent into the Royal Burghs Convention I see it says that a few advocated long terms of imprisonment?—Yes. The number doing so was very small.

2337. You say one advocated whipping?—Yes.

2338. That was for habitual offenders?—Yes.

2339. Did you make any inquiry into the effect of whipping upon juvenile offenders?—The inquiry in regard to juvenile offences was under the general care of ex-Provost Clark of Paisley.

2340. You have not got a copy of that?—No. It was a distinct thing.

2341. Do you happen to remember whether there were any suggestions as to whipping?—I know that many people have great faith in the whip. Personally I have never sentenced anyone to be whipped. I have been sorely tempted to do it sometimes, especially with incorrigible boys. I saw that last week Sheriff Rutherford sentenced a boy to six stripes.

2342. Do they often come back after being birched?—I had a case before me about a month ago where a boy who had been sentenced to six stripes reappeared in Court about a month after. It was referred to in Court as a very unusual case for a boy who had been sentenced to whipping to appear. Whipping seemed to be regarded as a deterrent.

2343. Is six stripes the usual allowance?—Yes; I think that is the outside number given to boys.

2344. (By Dr. Farquharson.) That is with a birch-rod?—Yes.

2345. I suppose the phrase 'birch-rod' is a conventional one?—Oh no, it is prescribed. It must be made of a certain number of twigs.

2346. (By the Chairman.) I see you say further—that the 'great majority of persons' to whom you addressed yourselves are agreed that the present system of short sentences is mischievous; that accumulative sentences are right, and that Reformatories if properly managed would be productive of much benefit?—There was a wonderful consensus of opinion on all these three points. I don't quite follow the second one myself, I have rather altered my views in regard to the accumulative sentences.

2347. What do you mean by the phrase 'Reformatories if properly managed would be attended with 'much benefit.' Do you refer to existing Reformatories?—Not at all.

2348. You mean Reformatories that might be established?—Certainly. There is no reflection at all implied on existing Reformatories, because in many respects some of them are models alike in respect to careful superintendence and successful work.

2349. You don't refer to them?—No.

2350. In your precis you say—'Recent experience in the Police Court has convinced me that there is no diminution in the number of habitual offenders?—I have been strongly impressed with that. There is rather an increase than a decrease. Since I left the Court at the end of October, I have had prepared an analysis of the charge sheets on two Police Court days, during the months of August and October. That return strikingly reveals the elements of habitual offence, with which the magistrates have to deal. The experience there set forth is a very common one.

2351. You have only one Police Court in Edinburgh?—One Police Court; but we have also the Burgh Court. In the Police Court we can only convict twice for theft, and twice for assault. Everything beyond that passes to the Burgh Court.

2352. Do these convictions take into account convictions in other Courts?—No, they refer to the number of convictions in the same Court.

2353. Here is a person convicted 99 times—that would be in all the Courts of Scotland?—No, in the Edinburgh Court, 99 is not what I should call a very large number. I am sorry to say that we have people brought before us, who have been convicted 300 or 400 times. As we go on, you will constantly meet with the same thing on the same day. One is perplexed to know really what to do with them.

2354. If a person in Edinburgh pleads guilty to a charge of being drunk, are previous convictions brought forward as an aggravation?—Not in the same formal way as it would be if the case went to proof.

2355. As there is only one Court in Edinburgh, I suppose the bailies sitting there know who have been previously convicted?—We know them all by head mark pretty well. When a man is brought up incapable, it is useless for him to plead not guilty. In the first place if he did, he has to remain in the cells till next day, and give us an opportunity of getting witnesses, and to give himself an opportunity of bringing witnesses.

2356. If he pleads not guilty on Saturday, has he to remain in the cells until Monday morning?—Yes, that is so.

2357. What is the usual sentence for drunk and incapables?—That depends on who is on the bench; and it depends on the view taken of the offence, and whether or not it has been aggravated by repetition.

2358. But the punishment cannot be increased?—We have a discretion from 1 day to 60 days.

2359. We were informed yesterday that when certain magistrates were not on the bench, a certain class of offenders invariably pleaded not guilty in order to be remanded till the next day, when there was a chance of a more lenient magistrate. Do you know anything of that?—I don't think that is the case as regards drunk and incapables. It is rather with those who loiter and importune. I remember one day, it was the 31st of the month, and I had two persons before me for loitering and importuning. Both looked up full of life and spirit, and said, 'Not guilty, your honour,' and went away with a smile. It so happened that I had a letter that night from Sheriff Rutherford, who should have been on the bench next day, asking if I would continue for a day longer. I did so. When these two persons saw me again on the bench, they at once said 'Guilty, your honour,' and the sentence was seven-days.

2360. Your severity consisted in giving them seven days?—Generally without the option of a fine.

2361. What is the option?—It would be 10s.

2362. If your severity consisted in seven days, what leniency did they expect by pleading not guilty, and getting the case continued for a day?—Five shillings or 24 hours. One or two do hold the view that that is the way to deal with it. Probably you will hear of it before you leave. There may be something in it, that an offence is nothing but an offence, whether it is committed for the first time or the 100th time.

2363. Under the Act passed by Lord Kingsburgh, it is provided that in cases against the ordinary common law of Scotland, no evidence or previous convictions can be brought in until the jury has returned a verdict, the mind of the jury must not be influenced by the fact of previous convictions. We have been informed that in Glasgow it has been considered improper to bring forward evidence of previous convictions, although there are many magistrates and many Courts the chance of recognising former offenders is not so great as in a city with only one Court. We were however informed by a witness yesterday that in Edinburgh, evidence of previous convictions in cases where the prisoners had pleaded not guilty, was, as a matter of course, brought forward in proof before the verdict had been pronounced, is that so?—I think Lord Kingsburgh's Act referred to the higher Courts.

2364. I ask as a matter of fact whether it is the case that such evidence is led at the point I have mentioned. I have no doubt the procedure is represented by the Police Act. Under the Police Act is it the fact that evidence of previous convictions in the Edinburgh Police Court is brought forward as a matter of proof?—Undoubtedly it is always in cases of trial and especially in cases in the Burgh Court where the bailies can act as sheriff deputes.

2365. Then in both Courts you have this exceptional provision?—In the case of theft or assault chiefly we would have sworn evidence that the person had been convicted of certain offences or certain crimes previously.

2366. And for drunkenness?—Not so much. It is very seldom done in drunken cases unless there has been assault connected with them.

2367. Then you think that the results of the administration of the law as it stands as regards habitual offences is a failure. You put it pretty strongly. 'Magistrates cease to be a terror; respect for law vanishes; punishment often becomes an attraction rather than a fear; reformation is not effected, and the police work, outside the Court and within it, is increased and rendered more difficult'?—I say these things specially with reference to habitual offenders. It is quite clear that so far as our action in the Court is concerned we are doing nothing to check them, and others are not deterred by it.

2368. Then we come to the question 'how may habitual offenders be reclaimed to sobriety, obedience, and self-respect.' Let us have your opinion on that?—I attach very great importance to the first part of that. It does seem to me that we require very carefully to consider whether or not we cannot do something to prevent the man who has taken to offending becoming an habitual offender. Prevention is better than cure.

2369. Well, of course, we have heard that before, but what do you suggest?—It is extremely difficult to know what is the best thing. Here I may say that it does seem to me that the adoption of a system of accumulative sentences would rather lead us on, and would lead the offender on, by a sort of sliding process, to push the offender into the habitual offender class.

2370. I see you make some suggestions for prevention. I will read them over, and then we can take them up one by one. (1) Some means of branding drunkenness as a disgrace. (2) Sharp sentences in an early stage of offending. (3) Withholding temporarily the rights and privileges of citizenship. (4) Heavy recognisances. Let us have the first?—In regard to the first I remember once talking to Lord Kingsburgh in reference to the question of cumulative sentences, and he very strongly asserted the opinion that severity to be preventative should come at an early stage.

2371. Then you say there should be some means for branding drunkenness as a disgrace. Have you any practical means to do that?—I have thought of a great many; but I confess it is extremely difficult to fix upon any one that would satisfy myself. I believe that in Australia they go so far as to compel the wearing of a John Walcot badge. I don't think public opinion here would support that. I do not know whether public opinion would support the wearing of a red ribbon.—(Dr. Farquharson.)—Some people do wear a blue ribbon, but that is a sign of virtue.)

2372. (By the Chairman.) You suggest sharp sentences at an early stage of offending?—What do you consider an early stage?

2373. I think that after the 8th or the 10th time, then would be the time for severity.

2374. You would go on till the 8th or 10th time?—Yes. That is very different from the 100th time.

2375. I simply wanted to know your idea?—I would say any time from the 5th to the 10th would become an early stage in offending.

2376. What would you give for drunkenness at the 8th or 10th time?—I should give 30 days.

2377. And what for a first offence?—I always admonish for a first offence. At the same time I frequently felt when looking at the persons so charged that they had been up before in some other Court.

2378. Then at the 8th or 10th time you would give them a severe sentence?—I would be guided by circumstances.

2379. But you think it should be 30 or 60 days?—I think 30 days; but you must exercise discretion.

2380. Here is the provision existing in the Burgh Police Scotland Act, 1892 (from which Edinburgh is exempted), Section 382. 'It may be charged as an aggravation when the accused person has within the 12 previous months been three times previously convicted of that offence.'—Yes, I know the Act, I had a great deal to do with it.

2381. Is that sufficient or insufficient?—Well, I hardly would like to say.

2382. You have much greater power under your own Police Act?—Yes; we can give up to 60 days.

2383. But under the General Act he gets 14 days, which in many places he would get without any aggravation?—In looking at the law I think there is a weakness in it, because I might be dealing with a person convicted three times in 12 months, and who, over a number of years, may have been convicted 100 times.

2384. Then you say you would withhold temporarily the rights and privileges of citizenship?—I do not know how far that would be tolerated.

2385. I suppose a good number of the habitual clients of the Police Court have got no very valuable rights of citizenship?—Many of them have the right of voting, and that is a very valuable responsibility. I do not see how a person who is an habitual drunkard is capable of exercising that right properly.

2386. Is there any disability attaching to petty offences?—No, I think not.

2387. Has a convict any rights?—I should not think so.—(Dr. Farquharson.)—But when he comes out he can resume them.)

2388. (By the Chairman.) You mention also heavy recognisances. Do you think £2 is sufficient?—No, I do not think it is.

2389. To what extent would you like power?—Something like £5 or £10 in certain cases. You must exercise discretion.

2390. Do you think it would be possible to get sureties of that amount for cases of habitual drunkards or petty offenders?—It is astonishing how these people manage to get help.

2391. But would not these people who helped be likely to be left in the lurch?—I think they would unless there was sufficient power in the large sum to deter.

2392. Suppose a brother or sister-in-law were bound in a security of £3 or £4 for the good behaviour of the husband of one of them. Do you think his interest in their welfare and his sense of honour would make him consider their interests, and make him forbear from taking any step that might tend to the forfeit of the money?—I think a certain percentage of them might; and I think those who became security would take John Walcot. special means to endeavour to prevent a repetition of the offence.

21 Nov. 1894. 2393. Now we come to proposals as to Reformatory Institutions. What is it exactly you propose?—My idea first of all is, that any institution to be effective must really be under Government control.

2394. To this Reformatory would you relegate habitual petty offenders, drunkards, prostitutes, and all other classes; or would you treat separately drunkards in one institution, and other habitual petty offenders in another?—Of course there must be distinction between male and female to begin with. I think there would be considerable advantage if you could separate cases. But I think separation would be an extremely difficult process. One sees this that in drunkenness idiosyncrasies of character come out. You may have a person up a great number of times for drunkenness who has been also a great number of times up for loitering and importuning. A woman named Jane Lovey or Kirk, who had been before the Police Court nearly 500 times, was for something like two years entered in the police books for loitering and importuning. Then the charge became 'D. and I.' drunk and incapable, or drunk and committing a breach of the peace. That came about mainly in this way—that after she was almost compelled to give up her evil courses on the streets she fell into habits of drunkenness, and so continually came up for that. I think Miss Stevenson knows the case of this woman. I feel extremely the difficulty of separating the cases.

2395. Where does Jane Lovey reside when she is out of prison—in the poorhouse?—She is in the North of Scotland now.

2396. How did you get rid of her?—She went to Aberdeen. But I have not heard of her for some time.

2397. What did you tell us about her?—Well, I had the woman before me many times, and I gave her 10, 14, 30, and 60 days, but all to no purpose. At last I thought I would like to make an experiment with one of the worst cases in the Court. One gentleman who saw about it in the papers sent me £10; another whose name I do not know sent me £5, and with that I got to work. I gave her a sentence first of 14 days, and made arrangements that when she came out she was to go into the poorhouse in order to give me time to get a place for her in the North of Scotland.

2398. You sent her first to prison for 14 days?—Yes. When she came out, I had great difficulty in getting her to go to the poorhouse. It was only on showing the poorhouse authorities that porridge for her was injurious, and that tea was necessary, that she went. I found that this poor creature had all the strong feelings of motherhood in her. The first night she went there a poor woman came in drunched to the skin with a sickly half-fed child, and Jane Lovey took care of that child with all the tenderness and care that any mother could exercise. I took care that the place selected at Old Deer for her to go to, should be a croft house where there was a child, and she went and took charge of the child. She wrote every week to my daughter and all went well for six months. But it came on towards the end of the year, and the thought of Hogmanay seemed to have been too much for her. I had no power to retain her. I am perfectly sure that if I had had power to retain her Jane Lovey would have been reclaimed. Some people were foolish enough to give her 2s. 6d., and she ran about six miles till she could get drink. Next day she got to Aberdeen and began her acquaintance with the police.

2399. Have you heard of her since?—No, nothing for the last four or five months. The superintendent of police in Aberdeen was extremely kind and took charge of her. I gave him carte blanche, and he watched over her with all care.

2400. That is an experiment which is creditable to you but it is not one that could be undertaken by the State. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not give carte blanche for such cases?—Oh no, I know that! I say all this to bring out what I think is an absolute necessity if we are to do any good—and that is power to retain.

2401. Most of the members of the Committee have shared the feeling of surprise that I have experienced, at the readiness with which women, who have been drunken and bad characters, remain voluntarily for very long periods in Retreats where there is no person to legally keep them. You did not think of sending Jane Lovey into one of these places?—I had that before me. She was too bad to go there. The class of women in such Retreats would not have allowed her to come amongst them.

2402. Your ideas about Reformatories are that they should be under Government control; that Reformation should be their avowed and deliberate aim; that every inmate and every official should be made to understand this, and every arrangement made, should have regard to it; that the power of retaining till this result was gained must be possessed; that authority and discipline should be imbued with the spirit of kindness and sympathy, the religious influence should also be employed, and that the character and administrative power of the governor should be worthy of full confidence?—Yes, I feel that if anything really is to be done with these people there must be strict attention paid to their physical health. It is no good to send them to mere houses in the country, where, perhaps, the sanitation is not good, and where there is hardly power to exercise that constant cleanliness and discipline that is needed.

2403. You mention that they should be Government Institutions—under Government control—what is your idea of the ways and means of their support?—I think it would almost be economy to employ money to maintain such Reformatories.

2404. Is it your idea that the municipalities should also assist in the support of these Reformatories?—I think there could be no harm in the municipalities being requested or required to give assistance to defray a certain proportion of the expenses of the place. There is no compulsion at present to give to Reformatories. I think we give £75 a year to the Wellington Reformatory.

2405. How is Edinburgh situated in regard to institutions of that kind. Have you anything analogous to the Juvenile Delinquency Act.—(Miss Stevenson.)—The School Board now have the power to contribute to Industrial Schools under the Day Industrial Schools Act, 1893.)

2406. (By the Chairman.) There is no provision for the levying of a rate for the purpose of sustaining a Reformatory?—No, it must come out of the common good or the police rates.

2407. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Have you power to give out of the rates for such a purpose?—I think not.

2408. (By the Chairman.) What do you do with juvenile delinquents?—They are sent to Industrial Schools if they are eligible. If they are incorrigible boys we send them to the 'Mars.' We think that the discipline of the 'Mars' is likely to reform them quicker than the discipline of the school. I believe the report of the 'Mars' is to the effect that the discipline is extremely useful in reforming a boy, and I can quite conceive it must be because the discipline is sufficiently strict.

2409. What about the girls?—We do send them to Industrial Schools and Reformatories.

2410. Have you many Institutions of the kind?—We have a number for lost women. We have one to which we can send women at an early stage. Our great difficulty is to induce girls to go to them. I am sorry to say there is nothing more difficult than to induce these girls to go to a Reformatory. They say 'send me anywhere but to a Home.' I have made it part of my duty as a magistrate, very frequently to go to the calls after Court was over, and see with the assistance of a lady who came to Court, to see if it was possible to do something for these poor girls by getting them into Homes—where they would be cared for. But I think if this movement is to be effective it will have to be under the control of Government.

2411. We were told yesterday that the number of John Walcott.

 1894. juvenile delinquents in Edinburgh had increased very extraordinarily?—That is my experience. What to do with the boys I do not know.

2412. Do you believe it has increased?—Yes, both in cases of boys and girls. The girls have been mostly the girls who have sold papers about the street.

2413. Can you give any reasons for this increase?—I cannot. I don't know how to account for it. I have written some schoolmasters about it, privately drawing their attention to it, and asking whether they were exercising the influence they should. Many of the boys that came before me were School Board boys.

2414. You have friends in other towns; have you ever talked the matter over with them, and seen whether the experience coincided with your own in regard to this increase of juvenile delinquency?—I do not know that I have. The gentleman whom I correspond with most is Sheriff Fraser, Hull.

2415. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) The girls, you say, dislike these Reformatories; what is the reason?—I should think it must be the restraint there.

2416. Yesterday we had some evidence to the effect that the work given to the women in these places was not very suitable to them considering the previous training of some of them. Do you think there is much in that? Of course to set a woman who has never done an honest or hard day's work in her life to wash clothes from morning to night cannot be very agreeable to her?—I have heard complaints of that kind, but I don't think there is very much in them. I think the work is distributed partly in the house and partly in the laundry.

2417. Do you think there is much reason in the dislike we heard of in that?—I do not think there is sufficient reason, if the girl herself is anxious to be restored.

2418. In many cases you sentence them to Reformatories?—We cannot sentence them to Reformatories. We give them that as an option.

2419. Is there nothing corresponding to boys' Reformatories for girls?—I think there is one or two in Glasgow.

2420. To which you can legally sentence girls for misdemeanour?—These are regular Government places.

2421. (By Dr. Farquharson, M.P.) What number of convictions do you think it necessary a person to have before being classed as an habitual drunkard?—I should be guided very much by the knowledge how near to each other these convictions were to each other rather than by a number of convictions running over several years. I should say that a man who had an occasional outbreak could scarcely be classified as an habitual drunkard. You must take that into account. But if in the course of a few months you find the same man breaking out again and again, notwithstanding repeated sentences, I say that is a man who is really on the highway to habitual drunkenness.

2422. Have you directed your attention to the class of men who are drinking quietly at home and yet are dangerous to society?—I have not. Fortunately I do not know many of that class.

2423. I mean working men?—I know there are a great many such, but my attention has not been drawn so much to those outside the Police Courts as to those who come inside them.

2424. Can you suggest any machinery for getting at them?—I think it would be an extremely difficult thing, and I should be almost afraid to suggest anything.

2425. What machinery would you suggest for the detention of the habitual drunkard? Would you place the responsibility on a medical man the same as in a lunacy inquiry, or would you put it on the sheriff?—I think I should be disposed to use every precaution, and that being so, I should like the inquiry to be medical as well as legal. There should be every precaution used before declaring a man an habitual drunkard, before sending him into confinement, just as there is before sending a man to an asylum.

2426. Would the legal part be a matter of routine, or appeal?—Well, if we go to the sheriff we must be prepared to give every facility to both sexes, if necessary John Walcott.

 to lead evidence, so that the sheriff may be convinced that the thing is right. 21 Nov, 1894.

2427. Do you not think that doctors would be annoyed at this additional responsibility being placed upon them?—I do not think they would if you paid them for it.

2428. (By the Chairman.) Don't you think it necessary before committing a person as an habitual drunkard that careful investigation should be made, and that proof should be taken as to his actual condition?—I think very careful attention should be exercised. I should not like the responsibility as a magistrate to sentence a man on my own account. There should be others consulted on such a matter.

2429. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) You said something about the sheriff requiring a good deal of evidence—do you suggest a sheriff requires more evidence than another magistrate?—Not at all. I spoke of the sheriff as of a man trained to judge of evidence. It would hardly do to find a man an habitual drunkard on the ipse dixit of any one.

2430. You think there should be a regular process of inquiry?—I think that would be proper.

2431. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think a medical man should support the judicial process?—I think the magistrate should have every support.

2432. Just as in the recent Lunacy legislation?—Yes.

2433. You prefer that the Reformatory of the future should be entirely under Government control?—That is my own impression.

2434. And the expenses borne entirely by Government?—I think it would be better if it were done in that way.

2435. You said you thought it would be a matter of economy; is that because you think those detained would earn their own living, or because of the indirect advantages?—Both. There would be a great saving at any rate in the Police Court.

2436. Do you think arguments of that kind would have influence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—I am afraid not. But I have never tried to influence his mind.

2437. (By Col. M'Hardy.) One of your suggestions was the intervention of what you called a sharp sentence at a particular stage of a man's career, and you suggested at least 30 days?—I suggested that.

2438. We have just seen from the Burgh Police Act that the maximum sentence is 14 days for habituale without fine?—That is the Police Act for Scotland, but the Edinburgh Act allows 60 days.

2439. But the Burgh Police Act is of course the latest opinion of Parliament upon the subject that we have got?—Yes. No doubt.

2440. And you are aware, I suppose, that that point was discussed at some length in the House of Commons?—I do.

2441. And that a longer period than 14 days was at first inserted in the Bill?—I think so.

2442. And that after a considerable debate it was reduced to 14 days?—It was.

2443. In the face of that do you think the Government would likely approve of any measure which would suggest a minimum sharp sentence of 80 days?—Unless you could convince the Government that a sharp sentence would be useful.

2444. But at any rate the most recent opinion of the House of Commons is that 14 days is the maximum?—Of course that Bill was pushed through Parliament. I happen to know a good deal about that.

2445. Do you think that in treating habitual offenders that different systems might be adopted in regard to different individuals?—I think so.

2446. Or would you have a cast iron system?—It would be advisable to adopt different systems, it might be for the same individual at different stages.

2447. With some people a very slight restraint might suffice?—Yes.

2448. You suggest in that paper that the security of a friend might suffice in some instances?—I have thought so. I have found in my own experience that it exercised a good influence.

John Walcot.
21 Nov. 1894.

2449. Do you think the principle or guardianship might work—where a relative or friend came forward and undertook guardianship without a money security. That would indicate that the person meant to take a special interest in the case of the offender. Do you think that would answer?—I think it would be much less effective without a security. We always insist upon that if possible. In the case of young children the guardian appears, and we enjoin upon them the oversight of the child, and get a pledge that they will undertake it.

2450. Do you think there might be a system in some cases of handing over a person to the guardianship of a relation or friend?—I should almost have more faith in the guardianship of a friend if he would undertake it. It would be rather difficult work.

2451. When you said you would prefer a Government establishment for the treatment of habitual offenders would you propose to eliminate the work of existing benevolent societies?—No; I would rather see them increased than lessened.

2452. Do you propose then to retain Homes and similar institutions now devoted to the reformation of certain classes of habitual offenders?—I would not interfere in any way with the action of these societies.

2453. You would develop them?—In so far as their physical influence was concerned. Certainly.

2454. These institutions would, I suppose, necessarily be under inspection?—Do you mean Government Reformatories?

2455. No! I am talking of institutions now existing such as Homes and Magdalene Asylums?—They would be under local control.

2456. You would not propose abolishing their present constitution and make them Government establishments?—I can hardly venture on a suggestion as to that. I think there is plenty of room for both.

2457. Would you not propose at least to develop them—those that are working satisfactorily at present. Would it not be a good thing to utilise that engine we already possess, and to develop it further?—I have not considered that question. It is rather a new phrase of the movement to me.

2458. If these institutions continue to exist—which I understand you think right—for habitual offenders, would you suppose it right that the Imperial funds should be taxed for their support, or would they be partially supported by either the funds of the Corporation or other local rates?—I should say that if the Government sends any one there, or any one under Government, then they ought to contribute something to their maintenance, just as we do at present to the Wellington Reformatory.

2459. You think that the Government should subscribe to some extent?—To some extent.

2460. But you would not be in favour of those places being maintained entirely out of the Imperial revenue?—I have not considered that question. I could conceive it possible that some of those places might be utilised by Government, and that those at present in charge of them might be called upon to hand them over, if they were assured that the principle of working them was likely to be more successful than the other.

2461. You would intend, I suppose, to carry out the reformation of those habitual offenders by some more or less personal contact with each individual, so that the personality of each individual dealt with, might as far as possible be maintained?—I think so.

2462. And you would, I presume, consider that some local benevolent people would be the better means for effecting that purpose, than a simple Government official?—I think it would be much more likely to secure a larger amount of that kindness and sympathy that would be necessary in the working of the system.

2463. Then in regard to the size of such institutions, do you think it would be wise to have a large establishment, or to have many small ones?—Many small ones would be much more effective for good than one large one. John Walcot.

2464. Do you think that a part of the poorhouses we have been told are vacant should be utilised for the detention of this class of people?—It might be, but I think the combination would not be a pleasant one, and if you could start something in the nature of a sanatorium, that would be rather attractive than otherwise.

2465. In your opinion, would it be improper at any rate to mix these habitual offenders, if treated in a vacant part of a poorhouse, with the old deserving poor?—There could be no objections to that at all—to let them associate. I do not know how far it would be absolutely necessary to keep them separate.

2466. What length of time have you thought it would be desirable to detain an habitual offender in these Retreats?—I do not think that less than 12 months would be of any use. In such a Home as the Dalrymple House, I think experience shows that a long period is necessary for successful treatment. In three or four months, when they go away, they get no good whatever. In many cases one year would not be enough.

2467. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Am I right in understanding that under the Edinburgh Police Act for a first offence of drunk and incapable, you can give 60 days' imprisonment?—I think you might do it. But a man would be very rash to do it.

2468. But is it competent under the Act?—The Act is perfectly clear—from one day to 60.

2469. In the Burgh Police Court?—Yes.

2470. Is there the option of a fine?—I should say in every case, but not necessarily. There are cases in which you may sentence without a fine.

2471. Might you sentence a man, who, for the first time, came up as a drunk and incapable, without a fine?—So far as the letter of the law is concerned you might.

2472. I want to know the letter of the law?—Of course a first case generally gets off with an admonition.

2473. Is the offence under your Act the same as under the general Act, viz., being drunk and incapable, and not under the care of some suitable person?—Our Burgh Court would not take cognisance of such cases as that. They could never come there.

2474. They would not go there?—No! only before the Police Court. We deal with drunken cabmen in charge of cabs, in the Burgh Court.

2475. When a person pleaded guilty in the Police Court of being drunk and incapable what means have you of knowing whether it is the first, or the seventh, or eighth offence?—Only the statement of the prosecutor.

2476. Now, do you really think that a sentence of 30 or 60 days' imprisonment is really of any use in the way of preventing a man, so inclined, from becoming an habitual drunkard?—Well, if that does not, I don't know anything that would. The only thing I can think of is severity exercised at an early stage.

2477. You have ample powers of severity apparently—have you ever tried them?—I never did at so early a stage as that. The reason perhaps for not doing so is to be found in this Commission. An habitual drunkard comes up for the fourth or fifth time, and you give him 30 days. The next case may be that of a thief, and you give him 7 days. Then you have a man who is a criminal, who has appropriated what does not belong to him, and you give him a smaller sentence than you gave to the other offender who has merely got drunk. I have always felt there would be an incongruity in that.

2478. Have you ever known a case where a severe sentence to an habitual drunkard has done any good?—Never! 60 days is absolutely useless, and that is perhaps the reason why magistrates do not adopt it.

2479. Do you find any connection between drunkenness and petty offences?—They are extremely common. It is one of the commonest excuses for a man to say that if he had been sober he would not have done so and so.

21 Nov. 1894.

2480. Supposing some special legislation was made for dealing with habitual offenders would you propose to put the carrying of it out into the hands of the sheriffs or the magistrates?—As the sheriffs are so intimately connected with the work of the Police Court, because they take half the work, and we take the other half, I think it would be well if they were conjoined. I think the sheriffs would welcome the presence of the magistrates as I am sure the magistrates would welcome the presence of the sheriffs.

2481. But in many Police Courts the sheriffs do not intervene at all—would you in those cases give the magistrates power?—I prefer, for the sake of the guarantee that the thing would be carefully considered, that it should be in the hands of the sheriff in addition.

2482. (By Miss Stevenson.) You stated that in your experience you have found that there is an increase in juvenile delinquency?—Yes.

2483. We had a statement made to us yesterday that since the passing of the Education Acts it had increased 200 per cent. Can you give us any idea of the nature of the offences for which children have been brought before the Police Court which has led to this increase?—Well, there are a good many cases of malicious mischief. One boy encourages another to do mischief, and a number get taken up for the same offence. Eight or ten boys were recently before me for damaging a tumble-down building, they were all respectable boys. Another frequent case is that of boys when they are out together in the outskirts of the town, destroying crops recklessly, and walking through fields. Sometimes they are brought up for teasing dogs or other domestic animals.

2484. (By the Chairman.) On what charge are they brought up?—Malicious mischief.

2485. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do you ever try in those cases to make them find security?—Yes. Invariably for the first offence.

2486. Does that stop it?—It does to a large extent.

2487. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is it not possible that under recent police legislation there may have been things created offences which previously were not offences?—I should think so.

2488. And that may be one cause of the apparent increase in the number of mischievous children?—I should think so.

2489. A statement was made yesterday that it was since the passing of the Education Acts that this increase had taken place. Is it within your knowledge that the parents of most of the boys who are brought before the Police Court for these petty offences have at one time or another been brought up before the School Board, for neglecting the education of their children, and in some cases sent before the sheriff to be dealt with under the Education Acts?—I know there are a good many of the parents of that class; but there are many others above suspicion whose children have been before the Police Court. Most respectable people who were distressed that their boys should have behaved in such a way. When we put such under caution I think we have accomplished a great deal of good.

2490. May it not be due to the neglect of parents as much as to the education in the public schools?—I should be disposed to say a great deal more.

2491. You say the number of juvenile delinquents has increased. Have you the same increase in regard to girls as in regard to boys?—I think not. So far as my experience has gone the increase is mainly among boys.

2492. Is it not a fact within your knowledge that in Dalry Reformatory for girls the number of commitments has decreased, and that it is often not half full?—That is quite true.

2493. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Why don't you apply the birch or tawse to juvenile offenders?—I was brought up with a prejudice against the birch, and I still entertain it.

2494. What do you do in the case of juvenile offenders if you have such a dislike to the tawse?—I try what caution will do. If it is a first offence I sometimes put the boys under caution to the extent John Walcott of £2.

2495. And if they cannot find the money do you send them to prison?—For a second offence probably I should sentence them to two or three days in the cells. I try the cells before sending them to prison.

2496. Do you really think that three days in the police cells, which to a child of tender years have very much the same stigma attaching to them as to a prison, is not a more serious punishment to a child than six strokes of the tawse?—I would not say that.

2497. It simply is a peculiarity of your own that you do not like the rod of connection?—It is a peculiarity I confess—a prejudice I have often been tempted to set aside.

2498. In answer to Col. M'Hardy you said you were in favour of classifying habitual offenders. You are probably aware of the classification carried out in Elmira, U. S. Would you have any objections to classify those habitual offenders by an educational, moral, and physical test?—I think not; I think America might teach us many lessons.

2499. That classification is one of which you would approve?—Yes.

2500. In answer to Col. M'Hardy you also said that there would be no objection to herding habitual offenders with the honest respectable poor in poorhouses—did you give that answer under the impression that there are in poorhouses portions which might be solely set apart for those habitual offenders?—Perhaps I hardly made my answer clear. So far as the poor are concerned, I think objection might be raised by them, and one might sympathise with it. I took the question rather to refer to the habituals themselves, and I said there would be no objections to them associating with the poor.

2500A. (Col. M'Hardy.) I was thinking of the other side as well. Witness.—I can quite suppose the poor would object to it.

2501. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you know that habitual drunkards as a rule are notoriously untruthful?—I know that well.

2502. You would not think of associating such people with the respectable honest poor?—Well, I do not know, we might associate them and use all the influence we can for their good. I should not feel it a disgrace to associate with a habitual if I could do him good.

2503. But those old and infirm poor people could not do them much good?—I think it is a questionable arrangement. I should prefer it did not exist.

2504. Suppose you had plenty of empty poorhouses without any honest poor in them—would you not be willing to utilise these for the classification of habitual offenders as far as possible?—I should utilise any place that could be made available, either a prison or a poorhouse, and give a new name to it.

2505. Have you any idea of the class of habitual offenders who go to those private Homes or Retreats in our large cities—are they the worst or the best specimens of their class?—Well, I have known some very bad specimens go, both men and women.

2506. Does the quasi criminal offender go to such institutions as Queensberry House?—As a rule it is the better class that go.

2507. Then for the worst class you would have institutions under Government control?—Yes.

2508. That would imply a severer form of discipline than they would have in private Retreats which the more respectable enter?—In certain cases they would have the power to retain them.

2509. You spoke of constituting a person an habitual drunkard after the eighth or tenth offence—over what period would these convictions extend?—I would never think of doing so unless the person had been convicted six or seven times in one year.

2510. Is there anything you can suggest as a protection to the working man and others who occasionally forget themselves, being put away, as it were, under a very strict rule like this? It might be quite right to apply it to the wastrels of society, but how are you to protect the casual, who occasionally indulges in a bout

John Walcott. of drinking?—No; I do not know that I could suggest any line of distinction.

2511. You would not remove from society for 12 months a man who maintained a home, and a wife and family, because he got occasionally drunk, in the same way as you would deal with a wastrel and idler who had no home?—I think every case would have to be judged on its own merits. If a working man falls under the Police Acts it becomes a question whether he is fit to carry on his work.

2512. In the Police Court, as at present constituted, it is said that the magistrates would have no time to conduct such inquiries as would be necessary to declare a person an habitual drunkard?—I think any magistrate interested in his work would make time.

2513. We have been told by several magistrates that, as a matter of fact, they would not have time to make the necessary inquiries, which would involve medical, as well as police and other evidence?—I only speak for myself, and I say that I should make it a matter of conscience to find time.

2514. Is there any reason why two police magistrates or two police judges should not sit themselves, and consider the case of each individual quite as well as the sheriff?—There is no special reason, except that I think having the sheriff would give additional security, and probably give more confidence to the public in the decision come to.

2514A. Did I understand you to say to Professor Dove Wilson that you would associate the sheriff with the police magistrate?—Yes. [Witness then withdrew.]

John Gulland.

BAILIE JOHN GULLAND, one of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, was called in and examined.

John Gulland.

2515. (By the Chairman.) How long have you been a magistrate?—Three years.

2516. You have had considerable experience in dealing with habitual offenders?—Yes.

2517. There is a good deal in the precis you have prepared of your evidence that has been pretty well threshed out before the Committee already, and I will not take you right through it. I will only deal with new points. I see you think that women are the principal habitual offenders?—Under your first head that has been my experience.

2518. That is habitual petty offenders?—Simply for being drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly.

2519. You think 'there is no plan more likely to produce good results than detention for a prolonged period in a place where they can be fully employed in some useful work, and, at the same time, be made to feel that some one is thinking kindly of them, and trying to help them out of the slough into which they have fallen'?—That is my view.

2520. You suggest a period of detention from six months to two years?—Yes.

2521. And you think that in these cases the ministrations of good women should be brought in to assist in the institutions?—Yes.

2522. You think that a mechanical severe routine would not do any good?—I advocate that if possible, any Reformatories to be established should not be under a Government Department, but should be under some local authority.

2523. Do you think that the up-keep of such establishments should be left to local taxes?—I am afraid that would not be fair, because my own impression is that this system of Reformatories would really tend to reduce the expense of prisons.

2524. In reference to breaches of the peace, you mention a case where a family was put in mortal terror from time to time by a son the moment he was let loose from prison?—Yes, I have taken a personal interest in the case, for I know the father. He was a baker; a most respectable man but now too old for work. The son gets drunk, goes to his father's house and threatens him, commits a breach of the peace, is sent to prison, and when he comes out the same thing is repeated.

2525. You are inclined to suggest that after a second offence of this nature—a son beating a father, or a husband beating a wife, the person should be dealt with as an habitual offender? I think you refer to some cases of wife assault?—The difficulty I have always had on the bench, both in the Police Court and in the Bench Court, is to get wives to give evidence against their husbands.

2526. That is a universal experience. You suggest that when a husband is convicted for habitual wife beating, and sent to prison, the proceeds of his labour in prison should go to parochial authorities for the support of his wife and children if he has any. Do you think the husband's work in prison would bring very much money?—It would always bring something.

2527. As to prostitution. You think that in cases of young girls just slipping into vice, a police magistrate can do a little to warn and deter; but that when women have contracted a liking for this degraded vice it seems hopeless to deal with them?—I think so.

2528. You say something about vagrants and beggars, and you speak of the night asylum, but we shall get evidence direct about that institution?—I am very strong in the subject of able-bodied beggars, they are a great nuisance in the city.

2529. What would you do with them?—Deal firmly and sharply with them.

2530. What do you mean by that?—Well, under our Edinburgh Police Act, we have considerable power to deal with beggars. I do not think the general law of Scotland takes hold of beggars as strongly as we do in Edinburgh. The General Police Act should be as strong as our Local Act.

2531. You can give them 60 days?—Yes.

2532. What sentences have you given in this class of cases?—I once gave the limit of 60 days. That was to a sturdy beggar who had followed a lady on the street, and had frightened her until he got money.

2533. You refer to the case of a widower with young children whose grandmother is a drunkard—what was that case?—It was the case of a man whose wife died, and left him with three little girls, one two years of age, and a little boy. The only house he could take them to was to that of their grandmother, who was a confirmed drunkard. He came to me in great distress, and fortunately we have been able to get the children into the Carse School for little girls. This is an instance of the straits to which a working man may be sometimes brought.

2534. I see you make an original suggestion that in the case of well-to-do habitual drunkards greater facility should be given to husband and wife to separate, and that the well behaved parent should get the custody of the children?—Yes. I have come across cases where such a thing would have been very desirable. Of course the trouble is to get a separation, for it is always an awkward thing to make a public exposure of private affairs. I know one case in which a lady gave way to drink where the child, a little girl, is really being ruined by the effect of the conduct of the mother. I should propose that in such cases there should be a simple means of separation between husband and wife.

2535. But there are many other sources of disagreement in families besides habitual drunkenness which would in many cases render separation desirable. Would you give them also the right to separate?—Drunkenness is on rather a different footing.

2536. You mean, I suppose, judicial separation with protection of the property against each other?—Certainly.

2537. You make that suggestion as to well-to-do habitual drunkards; do you think it would not be more necessary for quasi criminal cases?—It would. There is no question about that.

2538. You think that it would be practical for a magistrate in dealing with quasi criminal habitual drunkards for him to make a judicial separation order

John Gulland. as they do in England in cases of cruelty?—Something of that kind.

2539. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You mean that in cases like this, either party should have the power to insist upon separation?—Yes, and the well-behaved to have the care of the children.

2540. (By the Chairman.) Then you would be inclined to amend this proposition of yours to the effect that similar powers of separation and protection of the property to the spouses should be capable of being granted by magistrates in cases of habitual drunkards as are at present in England granted in certain cases of assault?—What is good for the rich is good for the poor.

2541. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you suggest that because in your opinion drunkenness produces more miser and domestic unhappiness in the home than any other cause?—Yes. It is worse than insanity. You can put a person in an asylum if he be insane; but you cannot do that to a habitual drunkard though his presence in a house may produce more domestic misery.

2542. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Supposing such a separation as you suggest between husband and wife was effected, and the man, say, in the course of a year or two, became a reformed character, what would be the position in society of that husband and wife?—They could come together again if they wished it. It is really very extraordinary how difficult it is to separate the marriage tie, even in cases where that might be thought very desirable. I have seen that often. [The witness then withdrew.]

CAPTAIN CHRISTIE, Governor of the Edinburgh Prison, called in and examined.

Captain Christie.

Captain Christie.

2543. (By the Chairman.) You are Governor of the Edinburgh Prison?—Yes.

2544. How long have you occupied that position?—Nineteen years.

2545. How many prisoners have you generally on your hands?—About 300 or 350.

2546. Have you any figures to give us of the number of previous convictions?—I have not except those in the commissioners' book. We do not tabulate any thing of that sort except for the commissioners.

2547. In your prison you have both male and female prisoners?—Yes.

2548. In what proportions?—The females generally number about one-fifth.

2549. In Edinburgh Prison you have not many of the class of petty offenders?—Not so many as in Glasgow.

2550. What is the minimum sentence that comes in?—One day.

2551. Where do you get them from for one day?—It is exceptional.

2552. But where do they come from?—Sometimes from Edinburgh; sometimes from Portobello and Musselburgh, and places of that sort. Sometimes we get them from Edinburgh if the police cells are crowded.

2553. Can you give us an example of a far away place from which you have got a one day case, and if you cannot charge your memory, will you fill it into your evidence?—Sometime ago a woman was sent in from Selkirk I think it was. She was sent in between two policemen in the morning, and we liberated her in the afternoon. She said 'Thank you sir, I have never seen Edinburgh before.' She went back in the same train with the police officials.

2554. Does that sort of case occur frequently?—Not frequently.

2555. Are there many cases of short sentence sent to you from places outside of Edinburgh?—Yes; a fair number.

2556. We have been informed that the majority of those cases of one day sentences come from Edinburgh?—We had 235 in 1893.

2557. Then you get them in from other towns?—Not so much.

2558. Where were you before you came to Edinburgh?—At Chatham, with convicts.

2559. Have you been in charge of any other prison in Scotland?—No; I have been in Edinburgh for 19 years. I was at Chatham for 3 years, and I had charge of a military prison in India.

2560. I suppose there is nothing in your Chatham experience that would lead you to suggest anything as a means of grappling with the problem we have before us—how best to deal with habitual petty offenders?—Well, of course, I have had a good deal to do with Homes of different kinds here.

2561. I am talking of your Chatham experience, for instance, there is the question of long sentences. Do you think that long sentences proved reformatory at Chatham?—Many of them.

2562. Do you think sentences here too short for reformation?—Much too short.

2563. What is your idea of increasing them?—I would be inclined to increase them, and after they had put in a certain amount of their time in prison I would send them to the country to farming or gardening work. I should insist in a labour test, and get them out of the town as the only practical means to their reformation.

2564. What hold would you have upon them in that case?—I should sentence them to so much prison and so much work at the reformatory or agricultural or horticultural school.

2565. It would be a simple reformatory whatever it was?—Yes.

2566. Is this proposal based on any experience you have had?—Well, I have corresponded regarding this matter with Lord Lothian, and he entertained it rather favourably. We used to do something of the same kind with troublesome soldiers in the Himalayas.

2567. Tell us about that?—Well, when they came out of the military prisons, besides their ordinary duty, we gave them plots to cultivate. Everybody at the time told us that it was impossible; that they would not work, but there was not a single one who did not. They all worked their plots in addition to attending to their military duty. The system spread very widely over the country. These men grew vegetables to provide for the army. But, as I say, at the time every one said it was impossible.

2568. Did they get the vegetables they grew in their own plots?—Yes; they sold them to the commissariat.

2569. Was not that rather giving a premium to these men to let them earn money in that way, as against the others who had not been in prison?—Oh, all the men had gardens. But it worked in this way that before they were in prison the bad characters would not work their plots. After they came out they liked them. Under prison compulsion they took to gardening, and when they came out they continued it of their own accord.

2570. But in Edinburgh you cannot teach them agricultural work?—You could send them out of it.

2571. Attached to the Edinburgh Prison you would like to see some such training?—Very much.

2572. Have you had any experience of labour colonies apart from what you have mentioned?—Yes, I have recommended several people to the Salvation Army, and they are now doing well. I consider these colonies about the greatest social improvement of the age.

2573. Have they any labour colonies here?—Not here. They have got what they call a metropole—a sort of model lodging house. Any people I have sent to the Army have done very well.

2574. You have not had any of them back again?—That is what I like about the Army. There is no getting back from it.

2575. We have been told that there is a great increase in the number of juvenile offenders in Edinburgh. Have you noticed anything of the sort in connection with your establishment. Have you had an increase in the number of young children?—Not noticeable on the whole. It will be quoted in the statistics.

*Captain
Christie.*

21 Nov. 1894.

2576. Do you get many young people in?—Yes.

2577. What age do you consider young?—Nine or ten.

2578. Have you had a prisoner of the age of nine?—I think so.

2579. Can you look up that case?—I will do so. George Garland, age 9 years, living in Queen Street, Leith, convicted at Leith Police Court, 8th September 1894. Malicious mischief. One shilling or 12 hours.

2580. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What is the longest period of imprisonment in your prison?—Two years.

2581. Do you find the health of the prisoners improve during the period of detention?—Always.

2582. Is that due to any particular cause?—Well, of course the regular diet, work, and habits must contribute to that; but the Calton is a very healthy situation.

2583. And all abstention from drink?—Undoubtedly that also.

2584. Is it your impression that after two years' detention those who had the drink craving have lost it when they get out?—Very few of them. It is a question with many of them, when they will get their next drink.

2585. Even after two years?—I think so.

2586. You think that if you had power to draft them to some labour colony, and keep them under continuous supervision, that the drink craving might be extinguished?—Decidedly. The cultivation of the soil is in my opinion the most reformatory process. It is wonderful the interest a man takes in what grows by the work of his own hands.

2587. More reformatory than any occupation indoors?—Decidedly.

2588. Do you think most of the habitual criminal class would be physically capable of working upon the land?—Yes, a very large proportion.

2589. Do you think there is not a certain number of people like clerks accustomed to indoor work who would not readily take to this out-door occupation?—There is no particular training required. Such work is easily learned, and of course you must not expect too much from them at first. Then there would be always a certain time occupied in repairs of clothing and such like.

2590. Do you think that a colony of that kind could be made nearly self-supporting?—I think it could; and in time some of the people might be able to stock small places of their own. I would not call it a prison, but I would treat it more like an agricultural school. You see the country is suffering at the present moment from the manner in which education is imparted in this country. The agricultural labourers should be taught to be better agricultural labourers, the gardeners, to be better gardeners, the farmers to be better farmers. If that were done the country would get on much better. Now every labourer's son is trained to be a minister, and every minister's son to be a Lord of Session; and as there are not many appointments of that kind vacant, their education is in good part wasted.

2591. Do you think one advantage of these colonies would be to induce people to remain on the land instead of drifting into towns?—I am sure of that. There are plenty of people who would be willing to go there if they were well fed and cared for and were learnt something. Of course the element of compulsion must be employed. You might for example have such colonies at Inchkeith, the Isle of May, Alloa and Tullibody Islands, and other islands.

2592. Would you work your colonies by reclaiming waste lands, or would you rather have them working agricultural land?—Working agricultural land would pay best.

2593. Even under the present conditions of agriculture?—Decidedly.

2594. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You mean market gardening I suppose?—Yes; at Bridge of Allan and Rothessay, for example, they grow roses for Glasgow in great abundance, and I was told that they could get as much as 4d. for a bloom. Working waste land is not such a paying business.

2595. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You are possibly thinking of Scilly Islands where they grow flowers for London?—Well, that is another case.

2596. (By Col. M'Hardy.) From what you have said you are clearly of opinion that the nature of the occupation given to a person has a very important bearing upon his reformation?—Decidedly.

2597. And you would consider that in any scheme for reforming habitual offenders it would be necessary to have free scope for attempting whatever might appear to be the best occupation for the purpose of reformation?—Decidedly.

2598. Without any restraint from outside trades organisations?—Exactly.

2599. You want to have a free hand?—Yes. There is no great measure of reformation in prison. I want to carry them somewhere else.

2600. Out of harms way?—Yes.

2601. What length of sentences would you suggest offenders should have—such persons as you would send to a labour colony?—For two years at the most. After the first, second, or third month in prison, if the person showed signs of reformation he might be sent to the labour colony for the rest of his term. In the case of an habitual offender who had been five or six times in prison before, the judge might sentence him in addition to his 60 days to two years' agricultural education.

2602. Two years would be your limit?—Yes.

2603. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you any suggestions to make for the case of women?—Very much the same—the country and market gardening.

2604. How do the women brought in for importing behave in prison?—Very well.

2605. Do you think they could go out to the fields in the way you suggest?—Certainly; those might do so who had not yet acquired a tremendous thirst for drink. The time that a woman is getting a liking for drink is the time to get her away out of the town and into the country.

2606. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What do you think should be the maximum sentence for drunkenness aggravated by three or four previous convictions?—I think it might run up to six months.

2607. In giving that answer have you considered the sentences now being passed by Sheriffs and by Justiciary Judges in the High Courts for grave criminal offences?—You mean how they would come into relation with these sentences?—(Dr. Sutherland.)—Yes. Witness. —I look upon drunkenness as a heavy offence. After a man is had up five or six times, I do not think six months would be too much, considered with the view to his cure and reformation.

2608. Do you think solitary confinement in a prison cell teasing oakum for six months, and an hour a day in the open air, would be likely to cure a man of drunken habits?—If he were sent to a labour colony after a month or two, you might do something.

2609. I am speaking of the prison. Would six months in prison be like to cure a man of the physical, not to speak of the mental disturbance produced by a long course of drunkenness?—I should think not.

2610. (By the Chairman.) You suggest long sentences, with power to remove them as a premium of good conduct to a labour colony?—Exactly.

2611. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The Chief Constable of Edinburgh has told us that the number of habitual offenders in Edinburgh has been very largely increased by those discharged from prison, who have been brought in from outside localities, who have not on their release returned to those localities, and who have rather sold their tickets at the railway stations and remained to commit offences in Edinburgh—are you aware if that is the case?—Well, it is almost infinitesimal, I understand it does not reach 10 per cent.

2612. Ten per cent. of what?—Of those who get tickets.

2613. You are aware that precautions have been taken with your assistance, and with the assistance of the Railway Companies, to see that first of all if a passenger goes at all he must go by the first train, and by that train only; also that the ticket which is issued to him is a specially marked ticket, and is not available to anyone unless they cared to pass themselves off as a discharged prisoner; and that there is a very short time available for the sale of such tickets between the time of the discharge of the prisoner and the first train?—That is so; a very short time.

*Captain
Christie.*

21 Nov. 1894.

2614. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do any of those prisoners brought in from country districts refuse to take tickets when they are discharged?—A few.

2615. They have a desire to rest in Edinburgh?—Yea. They are tramps mostly, and may as well be in Edinburgh as anywhere else.

2616. In speaking of a six months' sentence for drunkenness are you aware that in the last Police Act passed by Parliament after a lengthened discussion, 14 days was the maximum Parliament would allow?—It all amounts to this that the growing spirit of the age is looking less severely upon drunkenness every year. A 14 days' sentence by itself will merely refresh a drunkard and prepare him for another debauch, for it must be remembered that although this may possibly be his sixth conviction he has nevertheless had innumerable warnings even before his first conviction, as a man is rarely arrested for drunkenness until his conduct has reached a very helpless and disorderly standard.

2617. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have become aware that there has been a considerable increase in the number of indecent assaults of recent years?—Decidedly.

2618. And these in your opinion have been due to the consumption of liquor?—Very largely.

2619. What sentences are given in cases of indecent assault?—Sometimes as little as a month. A general sentence is 40 days with hard labour. [The witness then withdrew.]

Captain Christie.

21 Nov. 1894.

WILLIAM DONALDSON, Secretary to the Prison Commissioners of Scotland, called in and examined.

William Donaldson.

2620. (By the Chairman.) You are Secretary, I understand, to the Prison Commission?—I am.

2621. In your statistics have you remarked whether there has been an increase or diminution in the class of petty offences?—They have been increasing.

2622. Much?—They have increased 6 per cent. since 1884.

2623. Has the increase been regular?—Pretty regular all through.

2624. Give us the increases?—These offences in 1884 were 114,066, in 1885 100,992, in 1893 120,890.

2625. (Col. M'Hardy.) Are you not taking the apprehensions?—These are apprehensions.

2626. (By the Chairman.) Have you any statistics as to the percentage of convictions to apprehensions?—87 per cent. were convicted, but I should explain that there are in the Police Courts a great number of cases where pledges are forfeited for non-appearance, and the case dropped in consequence.

2627. I am told such cases occur in Glasgow, but not in Edinburgh, where they require every person to appear. And that a man is not considered to have purged his offence unless he appears before the magistrate?—I know from statistics that these forfeitures over the whole country amounted to 21,194 in 1884, and 24,847 in 1893.

2628. So that pledge breaking is very general?—Very general.

2629. You cannot tell us whether that occurs in towns working under these new Police Acts, or whether it is under the law of the country?—It is under both.

2630. Can you offer any reason for the increase in the number of apprehensions made proportionally to the population?—In some districts the police are more active in running-in particular offenders than in other districts.

2631. You have not thought over that subject?—I have not.

2632. Of late years I understand there has been a considerable decrease relative to the population in apprehensions?—They have fallen since 1890.

2633. Can you suggest any reason for that?—No.

2634. Have you any suggestions to make in regard to the treatment of habitual offenders—has that matter ever occupied your attention?—I think they would probably be more effectively treated outside the prison, —in Reformatories and other Institutions.

2635. Have you thought the matter out?—No.

2636. You, as an official, will know all about the details of the arrangements connected with our prisons and institutions—I mean as to their ways and means. Supposing Reformatories were established, how would you propose that they should be supported?—I think locally by the districts. Each district should support its own, with probably a contribution in aid from the Treasury to the extent of the present cost of keeping them in prison.

2637. Of course if each district supported its own with contributions from the Treasury it would mean that the expense of maintaining these habitual offenders should be transferred from the Imperial funds to local ones?—Quite so.

2638. Don't you think local human nature might rebel against that?—Yes, it may.

2639. You think they might be satisfied by a grant from the Treasury?—I think so.

2640. Have you any figures as to the cost to the State of the detention and support of these habitual offenders whom you propose to deal with in Reformatories?—The cost is very heavy just now.

2641. What is the average cost per prisoner?—£20 to £21 per annum.

2642. Have you any idea of the cost of the habitual offenders? Could you give us, for example, the number of prison years that their aggregate sentences work out to?—I am afraid not.

2643. You cannot tell the cost to the State of these habitual offenders?—I have not statistics showing that, but it could be worked out.

2644. That is a practical point, and if you have materials for working it out, we should like to have it?—I could give it to you approximately.

2645. Perhaps you will work it out and fill it into your evidence when you get it to revise, and also send a copy to the secretary?—I will do that. The aggregate number of days spent in prison by prisoners who had been committed 4 times and upwards in 1893 was 79,646 (males 13,718, females 65,928). This represents a daily average number throughout the year of 218½ (males 38, females 180½), and at £20 per annum for each the cost would be £4,364. A Table giving details is submitted.

2646. Now as to juvenile offenders. We have been told that in Edinburgh, for instance, there is a great increase in the number of juvenile offenders brought before the magistrates since the passing of the Edinburgh Acts. Is that so according to your statistics?—I have not got the figures as to particular localities. I thought it was the totals for Scotland that were required.

2647. Well, let us have the totals for Scotland as regards juvenile offences? What is a juvenile offender?—A prisoner under 16 years of age. In 1871 the number received into prison was 1,094; in 1881 857; in 1891 797; in 1893 741.

2648. So that there has been a very considerable diminution in the number of juvenile offenders?—There has been a fall of 10 per cent. in the 10 years ended 1871, of 22 per cent. in 1881, of 7 per cent. in 1891, and 7 per cent. in 1893.

2649. Well now, to what do you attribute that. Will that be owing to a greater number of juvenile offenders being sent to Industrial Schools and Reformatories?—Yea.

2650. In the early years of Reformatories boys were sent first to prison before being removed to Reformatories?—Yes.

2651. (By Miss Stevenson.) When was the change made?—It began last year.

2652. Then it could only refer to last year?—Yes.

2653. (By the Chairman.) You have not a great fall between 1891 and 1893?—No.

2654. I see it is 56. So that a diminution of 56 between those two years, considering the change in the administration of the law, does not indicate any very general decrease in the number of juvenile offenders?—No, there is still committal to a small extent before removal to a Reformatory. We have had repeated cases lately.

2655. The law is optional is it?—It is optional.

2656. Have you any record of the number of boys committed to prison before being sent to Reformatories, since the change of law, and an optional power given to the magistrate?—No, but in 13 cases the attention of the Committing Authorities was directed to the Act.

2657. Have you any suggestions with regard to juvenile criminals?—No. Further than this, that they ought not to be sent to prison under 16 years of age. They should be committed to Reformatories direct.

2658. Do you take any significance of the extent to which whipping is resorted to for the punishment of juvenile offenders?—Yes, but there is a great dislike to it in some districts.

2659. I wish to know if you can tell me how many cases of whipping there are in a year?—I can give you that.

2660. You can give us the figures of the extent to which whipping is made a substitute for imprisonment for juvenile offences, and the districts in which it is practised?—I can do so. In 1893, 335 boys were sentenced to be whipped. The number for each year appears in the returns for that year.

2661. You have told us that 741 juvenile offenders under 16 were received into prison in 1893—how many of these would be boys and how many girls?—The majority would be boys.

2662. To what extent of a majority?—Over two-thirds boys.

2663. About 500 of the 741?—Yes, fully.

2664. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Would it not be three-fourths?—Possibly, female prisoners are generally one-third of the males.

2665. (By the Chairman.) Taking it at 500, that would be 500 boys sent to prison, and 335 whipped in 1893?—Yes.

2666. You don't know the offences for which these boys were punished?—The statistics do not show the offences.

2667. There must be a much smaller number of girls dealt with if you have only say 240 girls sent to prison, and no girls whipped?—Yes.

2668. What is the youngest juvenile offender you have on your record?—I have no record of individual ages. They are all classed under 16 years.

2669. You have no knowledge beyond the record?—Just that they were all under 16.

2670. Can you give us any information in regard to the class of vagrants?—The printed statistics give no information in regard to vagrants except as to begging.

2671. (By Dr. Sutherland.) There has been a very great increase in the number of apprehensions for petty offences in the counties of Scotland, amounting to about 100 per cent. These have risen within the last 14 years from 13,000 to 24,450; is this increase owing to the condition of the population becoming worse, or is it owing to the fact that many small towns and burghs have adopted the Police Acts?—That explains a great deal of it.

2672. In that offences are created which were not offences before?—That is so.

2673. You are the author of that volume of judicial statistics which appears every year?—Yes.

2674. No notice is taken of prostitution as a separate offence?—It is classed with police and guild offences.

2675. Don't you think as showing where prostitution most prevails, and where it most comes under the whip of the police, that it would be well to have a separate Act for it?—That could be easily accomplished.

2676. (By the Chairman.) What are guild offences?

—The offences classed as police and guild offences are:—prostitutes importuning; posting bills without permission; harbouring prostitutes; refusing to admit police; allowing dogs to go unattended; selling coals, &c. unweighed; exposing unsound meat for sale; conveying carcases uncooled; chimney vents on fire; beating carpets or committing nuisances; failing to light or clean stairs; overcrowding dwellings; failing to clean pavements and other places; acting as brokers potters, chimney sweeps, cobblers, or guards without license; keeping unlicensed articles such as cabs, &c.; contravening bye-laws for public parks; slaughter houses; river or harbour traffic; porters, chimney sweeps, cobblers, &c. failing to deliver found property.

2677. These are what are classed under guild offences.

Can you explain the meaning of the term?—It has reference to offences that came under the cognisance of the Dean of Guild Court.

2678. But the Dean of Guild Court would not deal with all these offences—prostitution for example?—But the classification is police or guild offences.

2679. (By Dr. Sutherland.) As prostitution is so much identified with drunkenness, don't you think a separate column would be desirable in these returns so that the public might know exactly whether prostitution is increasing or diminishing in the cities, and the way the police are dealing with this matter in different towns?—The police statistics are not statutory in their form, and such a column as that could be inserted.

2680. Under instruction of the Lord Advocate?—Yes.

2681. Before saying that the burden of the maintenance of these habitual offenders should be local or general, would it not be desirable to ascertain the birth-place and places of residence of these people?—It is very difficult to get their birth-places accurately. But in the prison registers the birth-place of every prisoner is registered.

2682. From the statement of the prisoner?—Yes.

2683. If the burden was made a purely local one, would it not be an injustice to cities like Edinburgh and Glasgow to be saddled with the maintenance of tramps from all parts of the country?—No doubt it would.

2684. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Can you give me figures showing the number of children under 12 committed to prison during 1883, 1888, and 1893?—In 1883 there were 172 (boys 166, girls 6), in 1888 there were 142 (boys 134, girls 8), and in 1893 there were 64 (boys 58, girls 6).

2685. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The Chief Constable of Edinburgh has told us that the number of habitual offenders in Edinburgh is very largely increased by prisoners discharged from the jail who are sent there from districts outside Edinburgh, and do not return to them. Have the Prison Commissioners made any inquiry into the facts?—Yes.

2686. With what result?—They inquired into the facts when complaint was first made by the Lord Provost of Edinburgh in 1886, that prisoners brought from a distance remained in Edinburgh, and did not go home. The matter was fully investigated. The result was that 736 prisoners coming from country districts got tickets and returned to their homes, and 230 refused them.

2687. Did you find out anything about the 230?—Nothing further than this—that a number of them were persons who had no fixed residence, and had been apprehended in one of the districts outside Edinburgh. They belonged to the tramp class, and preferred to remain in town.

2688. A considerable proportion of them were tramps whose centre was Edinburgh?—That is so. They would have found their way there in any case. In the following year, 1887, it was ascertained that 100 refused to take tickets, and 68 did not use the tickets given to them. That was out of 1,394 country prisoner-

2688. Were the same facts ascertained about most of these men as about those of the previous year?—Yes; I have made an estimate for the present year by taking the months of September and October, and I find that in these two months 343 tickets were given, and 36 were not used. That would give about 2,058 for the year, and about 216 as not used.

2690. Have the Prison Commissioners taken steps to prevent the sale of tickets by discharged prisoners?—Yes.

2691. What means did they adopt?—They first arranged with the Railway Company to mark the railway ticket with a large 'D. P.' (discharged prisoner) so that the ticket collector would be able to recognise persons whose appearance was not that of discharged prisoners; and after the second complaint had been made, they arranged that the train by which the prisoner was to travel should be the first after his discharge. That was marked upon the ticket, and it could only be used by that train.

2692. Is there any ground for the belief that there is practically a traffic in these tickets?—None whatever.

2693. That is the view of the Prison Commissioners and the Railway Company?—Yes.

2694. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think that Reformatives for the detention of offenders should be kept up by localities with a State contribution thrown in?—Yes.

2695. Might not the effect of getting State aid be to destroy local efforts?—I think not.

2696. By State aid you mean State control; would not that clash with local feeling?—I think not.

2697. You think they might harmonise?—I don't see why they should not work together.

2698. (By the Chairman.) Have you any record of the educational state of juvenile offenders—as to their being illiterates or otherwise?—We came across a girl the other day of 15 who could not read. We have no record published in the reports. But the state of education on admission into prison might be obtained.

2699. When we remove the list we spoke of already you could possibly get us that also. Perhaps you could get us the educational state of the juvenile offenders on any one day you choose?—Yes. [The witness then withdrew.]

Sheriff-
Substitute
Rutherford.

SHERIFF-SUBSTITUTE RUTHERFURD, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Sheriff-
Substitute
Rutherford.

2700. (By the Chairman.) You are sheriff-substitute of the County of Mid Lothian?—Yes.

2701. How long have you had your present appointment?—I passed at the bar in 1857 along with my friend, Professor Dove Wilson. From that time until 1872 I had no more than a casual acquaintance with the prosecution of crime, occasionally appearing for the defence, and sometimes assisting a brother who was an advocate-depute on circuit. In 1872 when Lord Young was Lord Advocate he appointed me as one of his deputies, and from that time until 1883 I was more or less connected with the Crown Office. In 1883 I was appointed sheriff-substitute of the Lothians, and I have held that appointment ever since. Except in time of vacation I have been constantly on the bench in the Criminal Courts of the County.

2702. Tell us about the arrangement under which you sit in the same Court as the bailies?—It struck me at one time as an anomaly that this should be—so far as I knew—the only Sheriff Court in Scotland where the sheriff sits in the Police Court. I made inquiry into that sometime ago. I don't recollect the whole particulars very well, but I rather think it was because of this that originally the magistrates exercised a police jurisdiction within the bounds of the ancient Royalty within the city walls. But as the city grew and extended, the bailies were not competent to exercise jurisdiction beyond the Royalty, and the sheriffs came to their assistance. That I rather think was recognised by various Acts of Parliament, and continued down to the passing of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, which contains a clause providing for the rotation of judges in the Police Court (the sheriffs and the bailies), being regulated by the Lord Provost and the sheriff, or the Lord Advocate.

2703. But in practice, now, each of you has jurisdiction in the other original dominions?—Yes; the way it is worked is this, that the bailies take one month and the sheriff-substitutes another.

2704. If you were ill would you apply to a sheriff-substitute or a bailie to take your place?—Either could do so.

2705. And you could take the place of a bailie in his month?—Yes. That is frequently acted upon, but I may say that lately, the bailies finding inconvenience in getting any one to act for them when they wished to be relieved from duty, have appointed an ex-magistrate, Mr. Colston, a judge of police, and it is his duty to relieve them when they want assistance.

2706. We have been informed that the bailies have another capacity in which they act, viz., hon. sheriff-substitutes or as sheriff-deputes, on the theory, I suppose, that the Lord Provost of Edinburgh is the high-sheriff of the city?—I do not know anything about that. By the interpretation clause of the Edinburgh Police Act of 1879, 'The word "sheriff" shall mean the sheriff of the County of Edinburgh or Mid Lothian, or any one of his substitutes; excepting where specially provided to the contrary.'

2707. Before we go further, how does this criminal jurisdiction fit in with the civil work of the Sheriff Court?—It has often caused us considerable inconvenience, and some years ago when Sheriff Hamilton and I were both absent in vacation, we had a young advocate friend acting for us. He had not much experience, and did not get through the work of the Police Court very rapidly. The consequence was that the procurators of the Sheriff Court made complaint about the delay in that Court, and an arrangement was made by which the sheriff-substitute of Peebles, which is within the same sheriffdom, was under a Treasury order brought in to sit in the Police Court three days during the month in which it falls to the sheriff-substitutes to take police duty. That relieves Sheriff Hamilton and myself to a considerable extent.

2708. This is the only place in Scotland where such an arrangement prevails?—So far as I know it is.

2709. Where the sheriffs do Police Court work?—Yes.

2710. We were told by the Chief Constable, I think, that in cases where persons are charged before the magistrates with petty offences, and plead not guilty at the trial, previous convictions are brought against them in proof before the judge has pronounced them guilty or not guilty. Is that so?—So far as my experience goes previous convictions are libelled. But I never take evidence as to previous convictions, unless I have made up my mind to convict after hearing the evidence for the defence.

2711. But they are libelled, and can be proved?—Yes.

2712. Is that the case in more serious offences under Lord Kingburgh's Act?—They are simply libelled as productions in jury causes. The accused is charged, for instance, with theft on a particular occasion, and with having been previously convicted of dishonest appropriation of property, and then these previous convictions are libelled as productions. But I may say that the libel is never laid before the jury. They never see that, and therefore know nothing of the previous convictions until the case is concluded, and the sentence is about to be pronounced. But it is impossible in a summary complaint, where the judge sits without a jury to do that. You must libel the previous conviction to give the accused notice of what is to be brought against him, and the judge cannot help seeing that. Personally I do not allow them to be proved until I have made up my mind that the case is one for a verdict of guilty.

Sheriff-
Substitute
Rutherford.

21 Nov. 1894.

2713. What is the practice of other magistrates?—I don't know.

2714. I presume it would be much more difficult for a non-trained lawyer to make that separation! He might have more difficulty in divesting his mind of the prejudice which the fact of the previous conviction coming to his knowledge might create. We were told that in Glasgow previous convictions are not brought under the notice of the magistrates, and that as a matter of fact it was held to be wrong to bring them under notice in that way?—In very many cases they don't know of them. For instance, in cases of breach of the peace, and petty offences of that kind, the prosecutor in the Police Court only libels previous convictions if they have occurred within the year.

2715. We have been told that in Edinburgh it is the custom for prisoners who plead not guilty to be remanded; and that that is a source of considerable hardship to prisoners, who, in many cases in order to avoid having to appear a second day or be locked up for 24 hours or 48 hours if the case occurs on a Saturday, plead guilty, though they might be able to offer a good defence. Have you any remarks to make on that?—I presume the suggestion arises from the idea that it would be well to have the case disposed of at once. The statute provides that the accused shall be brought before a magistrate with the least possible delay and charged, and the idea seems to be that the trial should proceed then and there. But I should like to point out that that would be attended, not only with inconvenience to the Court, but entail a great deal of hardship on many people. Nine-tenths of the accused plead guilty; but if you are to go to trial with all cases on the morning upon which they are charged, you must have all the witnesses in attendance. There would be hundreds of witnesses in the Police Court every morning, just to hear accused persons pleading guilty, and these people would be deprived of their wages for the time they had put in there to no purpose. But very likely they might not attend, and you could only compel them to attend in the ordinary way by a citation of 24 hours. Constables on night duty are very frequently the leading witnesses in cases tried in the Police Court, and they would be kept out of bed to the end. But you have also this to be kept in view, that in many cases serious injury might be done to the accused if he had not time to prepare his defence.

2716. Might that difficulty not be got over so far as the accused is concerned if he asked a remand?—They often do ask for delay, and I always grant it.

2717. Is this system of remanding prisoners who plead not guilty peculiar to Edinburgh, or does it occur all over the country?—I cannot tell. I may say this that the same practice prevails in the Sheriff Summary Court, in which cases very much resembling those in the Police Court are tried.

2718. Can you give us any idea of the number of people who are locked up under this remand system. I suppose you offer them every facility for getting out?—We accept bail, or their own bond, generally for a small amount, that they will come up again, and very often without going through the form of taking a bond, we release them on their promise to come up the following morning. I may say that in all my experience I only remember this promise to have been broken upon one occasion.

2719. Do you know as to the number of people locked up?—No.

2720. It was charged against the administration of the law here, that a very large number of prisoners were brought up, and tried and sentenced on their plea of guilty without their accusers being there, and without any possibility of the magistrate getting any evidence as to what the real nature of the offence was; we were told also that the English system, and the system which prevails in many other towns in Scotland, was a fairer one to the prisoner when the accuser had to be present in Court, although the prisoner pleaded guilty. Do you think there is anything in that?—I hardly think it. The accuser here is the public prosecutor. We have no private prosecutors as they have in England.

2721. That is the difference in that respect between England and Scotland?—I think so. It is not necessary in the Police Court here to serve the accused with a copy of the complaint. When a prisoner is brought before the judge the complaint is read over to him and he is asked to plead. He may get a copy of the complaint then if he wishes it. But the practice is not to serve a copy of the complaint.

2721A. And you don't think that the practice gives rise to any injustice?—I do not think so.

2722. You have to deal with a considerable number of cases of solicitation. I understand you deal lightly with them?—I do.

2723. What is your sentence?—My invariable practice in such cases is to dismiss a first offence with an admonition. That is the practice I follow in a great many of these petty offences which are distinct from crimes—such as aggravated assaults or thefts to a considerable amount. These police offences, such as being drunk and disorderly, or loitering and importuning for the purpose of prostitution, I deal with in this way—I admonish the accused the first time, and on the second occasion I inflict a small fine with the alternative of a short imprisonment. I do not much regard previous convictions, although they are libelled, unless there is some special reason. If the accused has just been a day or two out of prison, and is brought back again for the same offence, I would make the fine a little more, that would be all.

2724. What is your customary sentence for an offence with aggravation?—As I say I admonish for the first offence. The second time I impose a fine of 5s. with an alternative of 24 hours' imprisonment.

2725. And where does the prisoner do that 24 hours—in the cells or in the prison?—They may detain them in the cells. They have power to do so if the sentence does not exceed three days. If the cells are full they send them to prison.

2726. But if the cells are empty they keep them there?—I believe so, but that is a detail which does not come under my notice.

2727. Is there any uniformity in the practice of sheriffs in regard to all these petty offences, and especially in regard to cases of importuning?—I rather think a number of the bailies agree with me in the view I take. I consider it the first duty of a criminal judge on the conviction of the accused to endeavour to apportion the sentence to the nature of the offence. It is sometimes a difficult thing to do. It depends upon circumstances. But in these petty offences I don't think the thing is materially worse after 1 or 2, or after 20 or 30 previous convictions.

2728. Would you give 5s. for a 5th or 6th offence of this nature?—Yes.

2729. I ask you because in some places it is regarded as a rather serious offence, and we have got evidence that a common sentence for that offence in Glasgow is 30 days?—I should consider that to be oppressive, and my impression is that if such a sentence were brought before the High Court of Justiciary on a suspension it might be quashed on the ground of oppression.

2730. Have you known of any such conviction for solicitation being brought before the High Court?—I am not aware of any.

2731. You have told us you think the bailies have come round to your view; is there any uniformity among the sheriffs?—I rather think Sheriff Orphoot follows the same line as I do. It has really not been brought under my notice.

2732. The sentences in Edinburgh are not very high I believe, even by those who deal most stringently with solicitation. Fourteen days I am told is about the maximum?—It is not a crime; it is merely a police offence.

2733. Fourteen days is considered a very heavy sentence for it in Edinburgh?—I consider that a very heavy sentence for such an offence.

2734. Is it a rare sentence in Edinburgh?—I cannot tell you. I should not give such a sentence.

Sheriff-
Substitute
Rutherford.

21 Nov. 1894.

2735. In Glasgow we had evidence to the effect that the police there were very ready to arrest known prostitutes on a charge of importuning. In Edinburgh the chief of police told us that his instructions to his men were never to arrest a woman for importuning unless they had seen her importuning and had warned her the same evening against it?—I believe such instructions were issued. I confess I have sometimes had an uneasy suspicion about these cases from the fact that the better dressed class of the sisterhood very seldom appear at the bar. It is generally the oldest and the poorest outcasts; and from observations that they have sometimes made at the bar. I have an uneasy idea that members of the police force may levy blackmail upon them, and that it is when they cannot pay that they are brought up. That is a thing you could hardly prove unless you were to lay a trap for the offender. You have only the word of the constable against the woman. It is a mere suspicion.

2736. And that is evidence against the police it would be very difficult to establish?—It would be difficult.

2737. Do many of those women who come before you plead not guilty?—Very few. Sometimes they do, and then I hear evidence.

2738. In cases where you hear evidence is there a fair percentage of cases in which you find them not guilty?—I certainly have done so in some cases where I did not like the testimony of the constables—when their testimony did not agree, or was in other respects unsatisfactory. But the cases that go to trial are very few.

2739. We are informed that in Edinburgh it is only importuning that is considered an offence, and that the police do not arrest a woman for loitering, although loitering is an offence under the Police Act?—The complaint is for loitering and importuning, that is invariable style. It would be a dangerous thing to libel it alternatively.

2740. You say you have been struck with the fact that what you call the better class of prostitutes are rarely brought up?—Very rarely.

2741. The Chief Constable gave evidence that steps had been taken for the suppression of brothels, and that, he said, had assisted in the lessening of offences?—I do not know as to that.

2742. Do you find as many cases brought before you as there used to be?—Well the Act had been in force for sometime against brothels before I became a sheriff-substitute.

2743. Are many young girls—juvenile offenders—brought before you in connection with this offence?—No; not at all.

2744. In Edinburgh what is the law as to any increase of penalties in connection with repeated convictions for drunkenness?—I think all the magistrates repeat the same penalty—5s. or 24 hours.

2745. What are your powers?—They are contained in the 247th section of the Act—'Every person found drunk and incapable of taking care of himself, and not under the care or protection of some suitable person, is liable in a penalty not exceeding 40s., and in the case of a continuing offence the sum of 5s. for every day during which such offence shall be continued.'

2746. But the man cannot continue drunk and incapable for many days?—I don't think that is ever libelled.

2746A. Look at the same provision in the general Police Act. Is it the same or different?—It seems the same, the penalty is not to exceed 40s.

2747. But there is a subsequent clause for people who have been previously convicted?—Clause 382 gives permissive powers in that case to impose an additional penalty of 40s.

2748. But we were told that here it was in the power of the magistrate to send a man 60 days to prison for drunkenness?—I do not know where that power is.

2749. Possibly that power is only exercised in the Burgh Court?—I don't think there is anything in the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act to that effect.

2750. (By the Chairman.) One witness told us that he had himself sent one man to prison for 60 days, but possibly there was disorderly conduct also?—That comes under section 248, which provides that every person who shall be drunk and guilty of riotous and disorderly conduct is liable in a penalty not exceeding £5, with an alternative not exceeding 60 days.

2751. There are a large proportion of the drunks in Glasgow who, on being conveyed to the Police Office, attempt to kick and fight the police, and are thereupon charged with being drunk and disorderly. Is that so in Edinburgh?—I cannot tell. Those who are found simply drunk and incapable under section 247 are tried by themselves, I mean their cases are dealt with separately from those charged under the following section, which deals with drunk and riotous and disorderly conduct.

2752. But the police who run them in formulate the charge against them?—The public prosecutor does that.

2753. Have you many petty offences, mere technical offences, dealt with under the Police Act? For instance, in Glasgow, we were told that boys were in prison for kicking a dirty football against a woman. Have you anything of that sort here?—Juvenile offenders are brought up frequently charged with committing a breach of the peace by kicking about a football or something of that kind.

2754. What is done with them?—My way of dealing with them is to reprimand them. If it appears that they have been cautioned by the police before, I speak to them more emphatically, and tell them that if they are brought before the Court again they will be dealt with more severely. It is of no use fining boys like that. It only punishes their parents.

2755. Ought not the parents to punish them?—Well, that is so. I often hand them over to the parents on that condition. As to sending boys to prison, that is not to be thought of, if it can possibly be avoided.

2756. As a matter of fact you are strongly against sending boys to prison?—Certainly. We have better ways of dealing with them. We can send them to Industrial or Reformatory Schools, or we can order them to be birched.

2757. We are told there is a great reluctance to ordering them to be birched?—I have not that reluctance. I do it frequently. When I became a sheriff and it fell to me to sit in the Police Court, I found that the Act giving power to order juvenile offenders, under 14 years of age to be whipped, had never been put in force, and that they had no executioner and no instrument of punishment. I went thereupon to Sheriff Crichton and I had some conversation with him about it. He spoke with the Lord Provost of the time, and in consequence there was provided a birch rod, and we got an established executioner. I have constantly ordered boys to be whipped for petty offences.

2758. Do you think that is a much better way of dealing with them?—Oh, much better than sending them to prison.

2759. Do these boys often or ever come up again?—I cannot say I have observed that. Of course you could order a severer whipping; but a few strokes are severe enough as they are quite sufficient to draw blood. That should deter them from coming back again.

2760. What is the usual number?—Six strokes, and up to twelve if it is for something very bad.

2761. We were told by an ex-magistrate that he had on one occasion ordered a boy to be whipped, but that he believed he was the only Edinburgh magistrate who had ever had recourse to this form of punishment, although the sheriff ordered it. The reason of that he said was that his ordering this boy to be whipped had given rise to a great deal of hostile criticism on the part of the public. Have you found that?—I am not aware that I have ever been criticised in a hostile manner for that.

2762. You don't think that public opinion in Edinburgh is more against whipping juvenile offenders as an alternative to sending them to prison than anywhere else?—I do not think so.

Sheriff-
Substitute

*Sheriff-Substitute
Rutherford.*

21 Nov. 1894.

2763. I forget whether your colleagues, the other sheriff-substitutes, do the same as you do?—So far as I know they do.

2764. Is Leith, do you know, under the Burgh Police Act?—I do not know. I have nothing to do with Leith. The Magistrates of Leith sit in the Police Court there. I suppose they are under the General Police Act.

2765. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) In cases of women brought up for importuning you always give short sentences. You do not attach any weight to long sentences as deterrents?—Not at all.

2766. None of them acting as reformatory?—Not at all. I have reason to believe that a very large proportion of these unfortunate women are married women, who are driven out to get money in this way, either by their husbands or the men they live with.

2767. Is there no way of getting at these husbands?—I have not considered that. But I fear not.

2768. I suppose you agree with every other person who has spoken on the subject, that there is no reformation possible among drunkards with short sentences?—None whatever. Any sentence that could be awarded in the Police Court would have no effect in reclaiming an habitual drunkard.

2769. Suppose there was some fresh legislation for the establishment of Reformatories: would that do any good?—I may say that my old friend, Mr. Charles Morton, who was for many years Crown Agent, prepared and drafted a Bill on this subject. I have conversed with him about it. I have the Bill in my pocket.

2770. We have had that Bill submitted to us. I should just ask you, however, if you approve generally of his proposals?—I do. Of course, as he says 'the present Bill does not propose to deal with the case of persons who are not able to pay a moderate board, or with the cases of inebriates of the pauper or criminal classes. The great majority of the sufferers whose cases may be curable under such treatment as is proposed are of the well-to-do classes quite able to pay a board. Different provisions would be necessary as respects these other classes.'

2771. But these other classes are far more numerous?—Yes.

2772. Have you any suggestions to make as to how the more numerous class should be dealt with?—I might instance the experiment Bailie Walcot made in dealing with the notorious case of the woman Jane Lovey.

2773. We have heard of her. Do you think it practicable to work a system of Retreats with penitentiaries for the poor and the semi-criminal class on some such lines as Mr. Morton proposed for the better classes?—I have never given much attention to that. I think you would require to safeguard anything of the kind very carefully because it is an infringement of the liberty of the subject for one thing. If means could be found, and Parliament would sanction it, I certainly would think it a good thing. With reference to the case of Jane Lovey or Kirk, long sentences and short sentences had been tried in vain. Long sentences were just as inefficacious as short. The reason was that the woman was a dipsomaniac. When she was sober, I believe there was no more well-conducted woman. Bailie Walcot, in order to remove a scandal, got her sent away.

2774. In your personal experience you have never known the case of an habitual drunkard who was really reformed?—Never one.

2775. (By Dr. Farquharson, M.P.) Is that because the present prison machinery for reformation is imperfect?—I do not profess at all to give a reason. I only state a fact.

2776. Would you be of opinion that if we got some power of compulsory detention for a long period a drunkard might have a chance of reformation?—Personally I think it is an experiment well worth trying.

2777. Would you have those Reformatories maintained by local or imperial contributions?—That is a difficult question. I ought to say that I have not devoted sufficient time to consider these matters, and I would not like to offer an opinion upon them.

2778. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Would you think it possible to conduct the business of the Police Court without this power of remanding?—Well I have pointed out what I think would be a great difficulty—the hardship to witnesses.

2779. In the case of persons remanded is it not the practice to release them without any bail?—Yes, constantly.

2780. And they don't run away because they know the police can get them if they are wanted?—That is so.

2781. In the case of loitering what is the highest sentence that you yourself have ever given?—As far as I know 5s. or 24 hours.

2782. I think you stated that if persons came back within a few days you might give them more?—I was referring to cases rather of breach of the peace. I do not remember any case where a person convicted of loitering was brought back very soon.

2783. In the case of loitering what kind of evidence do you usually have if the woman pleads not guilty?—Generally there is no evidence except that of the police constables. It would be vain for them to bring up the evidence of the persons importuned. Two or three police constables generally give evidence which requires to be very carefully scrutinised.

2784. Do you require more than the constable?—According to the law of Scotland we must have two witnesses.

2785. There is no special provision for accepting the evidence of one witness?—There is nothing in the Act of 1879 about that.

2786. In the case of a person brought before you for being drunk and incapable, what is the highest sentence you have ever imposed?—I should think 5s. or 24 hours.

2787. Even if that person was an habitual offender?—I don't know that it has ever been the practice to give more than that for simply being drunk and incapable.

2788. The charge is really being drunk and incapable and friendless?—Very much so.

2790. We were told that in the Police Court of Edinburgh, Lord Kingsburgh's provision for not proving previous convictions till after the person had been found guilty did not apply. Have you any information as to that?—No, except this; that in a summary complaint you require to set forth previous convictions, you must do so to give the accused notice. That observation applies to summary procedure in the Sheriff as well as the Police Court.

2791. We were told that as a matter of practice before the magistrates, the whole proof including that of previous convictions was taken at once?—My own practice is to hear the evidence for the prosecution. Then I ask the accused if he has any witnesses, to bring them forward, and I hear them. Then I make up my mind, and it is only when I have made up my mind to convict that I take evidence of previous convictions.

2792. Does it consist with your knowledge that that is the general practice in the Sheriff Courts?—That is my practice.

2792A. Is it necessary for you to know as to the previous convictions in the charge?—Not at all.

2793. As a matter of fact you don't read the libel?—It is read to the accused in open Court by the clerk of the Court. That is all I hear of it.

2794. When the clerk reads the complaint, and asks him if he is guilty or not guilty, does he read out the part about previous convictions?—He either reads it or says that there are previous convictions.

2795. Are you aware that in other Sheriff Courts the clerk stops when he comes to the bit about previous convictions?—In the Edinburgh Police Court the clerk reads the whole thing. That is necessary because the accused has not been served with a copy of the libel.

2796. Are you aware that in other Sheriff Courts the clerk stops at the part about previous convictions?—In the Sheriff Summary Court of Edinburgh they read the whole thing before the accused is asked to plead.

2797. Do you see any necessity under our present law for sentencing a child under 12 to prison?—No. I have never done so.

2798. Do you find that your power of reprimanding, of whipping, or of adjourning to another diet quite sufficient for dealing with such cases?—Quite sufficient.

2799. Did you ever order a child to be fined with the alternative of being whipped?—Never.

2800. Does it occur to you that it would be an improvement if you had the power to put the father under security for the good conduct of the child?—I never thought of that. I never did it.

2801. You cannot very well do it under the present law. Would it not be an improvement?—It might be an improvement.

2802. (By Miss Flora C. Stevenson.) I am somewhat surprised at the statement that the most of those women of the unfortunate class brought before the Court, are either married women or women living under protection?—I have been told that.

2803. Is the class of women brought before you elsewhere different from those who are brought before the Police Court?—My remarks apply to the Edinburgh Police Court. Such offenders are never brought before the Sheriff Court, for there we can only deal with offences at common law. This offence is a mere creation of the Police Act. It is solely from acting as a police magistrate that I have any experience of these cases.

2804. Do you think there would be any gain if the magistrates had power to commit these women, especially the younger ones, to Homes of detention, where they might get useful employment?—Yes, I think so. There are some asylums of that kind in existence, and women like the late Miss Maitland used to attend the Court, and took steps to get women of this class to go to such asylums. But what the result was I don't know.

2805. The difficulty I understand in regard to such places is, that magistrates have no power to detain these women. I know as a fact that many of them leave the Police Court promising to go to these Homes. But they either don't go or they don't remain more than a day or two in them, if they do go—the magistrates having no power to detain them?—I think that is very likely; but I have no knowledge of it myself.

2806. Is it within your knowledge that there has been an increase of what might be called juvenile delinquency within the last 10 or 15 years?—It would be very difficult for me to answer that. The records of the Court would show that best.

2807. I suppose the most of the cases, or a great many of the cases that come before you, and which you dispose of by sending the children to an Industrial School, come from the School Board Office?—Many of them do, but I think that in most of the cases the child is charged with an offence in the Police Court or Summary Court.

2808. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In answer to the Chairman you stated that you believed that if a 30 days' sentence for importuning was brought under the review of the High Court, it would probably be quashed on the ground of oppression. Do you know that the law allows 30 days as a maximum for this offence?—The High Court would be very reluctant to interfere with the discretion of the magistrates, but it would be in their power unquestionably, if they thought the sentence was oppressive in the circumstances of the case, even although the law allowed it, to quash the sentence. I remember a recent case, in which I think Lord McLaren said that apart from quashing the conviction on some ground, I don't remember what, the sentence was excessive, and might have been quashed on that ground alone. I believe there are other authorities to the same effect.

2809. Have you heard of the famous Glasgow case, where the magistrates of Glasgow had to pay £500 for the police illegally arresting a woman on a charge of this kind?—I don't know anything about that case.

2810. Have you heard that a magistrate of this city was pilloried in the press for ordering a boy to be whipped? Of course I know the same thing does not apply to a sheriff who has not to seek re-election for a ward of the city, and is not subject to popular feeling. —No, I never heard of it. I am not aware that I have ever been pilloried in the press.

2811. So that in that case it would be better to send boys guilty of those trivial offences to the sheriff rather than to the police magistrates?—It may be.

2812. Do you think that imprisonment should be abolished as an alternative to whipping, or would you recommend that imprisonment should be abolished altogether for juvenile offenders?—In the Police Court the age up to which you can whip is 14. In the Sheriff Court it is 16. It might be for consideration whether it would be a good thing to take away the alternative on imprisonment. A boy's might be a bad case, and yet he might be prevented on a medical certificate from being whipped. In that case what could you do.

2813. But I thought you have strong objections to boys being imprisoned at all?—I have.

2814. Whether they are delicate or not?—It is the worst thing you can do with them.

2815. You are doubtless aware that private parties prosecute in England, do private parties prosecute for the offence of public drunkenness?—I have no knowledge of that.

2816. Suppose I told you that much fewer prosecutions took place in England than in Scotland, do you think that the system of private prosecution in England, as opposed to public prosecution in Scotland, would account for the extraordinary difference?—It might to a great extent.

2817. How many times do you think a person should be convicted of drunkenness before he earns the title of habitual drunkard?—That question might be more properly put to a medical man than to me.

2818. As an Advocate Depute of course you have had experience of those cases of fatal assault which come up at the Circuit Courts, where it has been proved over and over again that the person committing the assault was notoriously a drunkard, but that no notice had ever been taken of it until the fatal assault had been committed. Don't you think something should be done to these people before they reached such a stage?—Of course it would be the best thing to deal with them earlier, if possible, and so prevent serious crime.

2819. Who do you think should take the initiative?—I remember Lord Deas took a strong view of these cases, and in the case of a party indicted for murder, strongly charged for a verdict of culpable homicide on the ground that the accused was suffering from delirium tremens at the time.

2820. Delirium tremens is now recognised by the medical faculty as being a form of insanity? But who should like the initiative in informing the police that so-and-so is habitually drunk, and likely to become dangerous to his friends and the lieges?—In the Bill Mr. Morton proposed it was put upon his relatives to apply for an order from the sheriff for one of these Homes.

2821. I think there are three parties mentioned in Mr. Morton's Bill?—A member of his family or a near relative or friend.

2822. Have you known ladies in the upper circles of society dipsomaniacs who have been reformed?—No.

2823. Do you know that dipsomaniacs exist in the upper circles of society?—I presume they do, but I have personally no knowledge of them.

2824. If under Mr. Morton's Bill it is considered right that there should be a number of safeguards applied before a man is pronounced an habitual drunkard, don't you think there should be similar inquiry made for the protection of a working or respectable man who may get occasionally drunk, in regard to the circumstances of his life, general habits, and conduct, and that he should not be confined unless it were certified that he was not otherwise likely to be cured of his drunken habits?—Most certainly there should be inquiry.

2825. From a return by the Chief Constable it appears that 184 people in Edinburgh have been responsible for 1,403 arrests or 20 per cent. of the apprehensions by the police?—Yes.

2826. On an average each of these people have been convicted eight times, would it not considerably reduce police expenditure in Edinburgh if something were done to these 184 people?—Certainly.

2827. If they were sent to Homes would you not be entitled to set up against the expenses of their detention in such institutions the present cost to the country while in prison, and the cost borne equally by the Imperial Exchequer and the Local Authority in maintaining an unnecessary police force?—Probably the existence of such Homes would have in itself a deterrent effect, and where it had not, the cost of maintenance in prison might I think be fairly set against the expense of detention in a Home for inebriates.

2828. I find in the Burgh Police Act (Scotland) that the age limit for whipping a boy is 14 years. In a case in Glasgow the stipendiary magistrate sentenced a boy 15 years of age to whipping for creating a disturbance, but in appeal the sentence was quashed. You have told us that in the Sheriff Court you can sentence a boy to whipping up to 16 years of age. Would you be in favour of extending the age during which whipping could be substituted for imprisonment?—I think that the age in the Police Court should be raised to 16.

2829. I understand that as a Police Court magistrate you constantly remit cases to yourself in the Sheriff Criminal Court?—Constantly.

2830. And that the magistrates remit to themselves from the Police to the Burgh Court?—I know of no cases remitted from the Police Court to the Burgh Court.

2831. If you had a boy of 16 in the Police Court you might remit him to the Sheriff Court in order to deal with him there by whipping?—When I remit I know nothing about the case, the officials of the Court ask for a remit.

2832. I find that in 1893 in Edinburgh there were only 351 apprehensions, or less than one a day for importuning. Of these, 235 went to prison, what percentage of these 351 would come before you in your year's work?—Well, the sheriff-substitutes take month about with the bailies. Sheriff Orphoot and I take the biggest part of the month, and Sheriff Hamilton assists.

2833. Say that in a half of these cases the sentence would be 24 hours or 5s.?—That would depend on who they came before. Sheriff Orphoot and I think most of the bailies deal with them in the same way as I do.

2833A. What I wish to make out is that if two-thirds of these girls go to jail rather than pay the small fine, that shows that they are of the poorer class?—No doubt.

2834. You cannot tell in what proportion girls dealt with by you go to jail for 24 hours rather than pay the fine of 5s.?—I have no means of knowing that.

2835. (By the Chairman.) With the view of safeguarding the liberty of the subject, would you approve of an inquiry being held before the sheriff, such as is done under the Lunacy Acts before a man can be put into an Asylum, before a person was declared an habitual drunkard and ordered to be sent to a Reformatory?—It might be done, but I really have given that part of the subject little consideration.

2836. It would correspond to what is done under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes; there is an inquiry before the sheriff in the case of dangerous lunatics. If the man is not a dangerous lunatic he is remitted by the sheriff to the parish, and they take charge of him.

2837. But in every case before sending a man to an Asylum in Scotland, as I understand, the case must be brought before the sheriff, who satisfies himself that there is prima facie evidence that the person is a lunatic?—No doubt.

2838. So that by analogy the sheriff should be the person to certify habitual drunkards?—Yes.

2839. What is the machinery I would have to set in motion if I wanted to get any person for whom I was responsible into Morningside?—You would first of all have to get the certificate of two medical men; then an application has to be filled up in which is set forth the relationship of the applicant to the person alleged to be insane, and under what circumstances the warrant is craved; whether the case is one of urgency or not. These papers are laid before the sheriff.

2840. The sheriff has to judge of the evidence?—Yes. He has to judge of the evidence and the grounds on which the warrant is asked. I sign such warrants almost daily.

2841. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You have told us how you treat boys in relation to the birch. What do you do with little girls of the same class. You don't want them sent to prison?—I avoid sending them to prison in every way I can. I tell their parents to deal with them.

2842. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Or send them to the Industrial School?—Some of them.

2843. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) It has been represented to us that it was the girls who sold newspapers on the streets that fell into bad habits and became juvenile offenders. Do you know anything as to that?—I cannot say anything as to that.

2844. (By Dr. Farquharson, M.P.) Who does the whipping?—A police constable is employed, and it is always done in presence of a medical man.

2845. Do you find that six stripes breaks the skin?—I believe so.

2845A. I observe that in his report for last year the Chief Constable for the City very properly draws the distinction between crimes properly so called and mere police offences. He says:—“Crimes” include all ‘charges involving dishonesty or violence against the ‘person or property of a serious kind. ‘Offences’ ‘consist chiefly of crimes of disorder and drunkenness.’ Then he says:—‘There is a slight increase in the ‘number of crimes reported as compared with the ‘two preceding years, but the number is lower than for ‘several years prior to 1891. There is a most gratifying decrease in the number of offences.’—Well, that I think shows that these petty offences are sufficiently punished and should not be visited by cumulative penalties; but in any case, you soon get to the end of your tether, which is 60 days.

2846. You think it would be oppressive?—And have no result.

2847. (By Dr. Sutherland.) How many lunatics do you have inquiries regarding in the course of a year?—Very frequently. But I could give you no figures. That could be got from the sheriff clerk.

2848. One hundred?—Far more.

2849. The number of habitual offenders in Edinburgh is only 184?—These are given as the figures, I believe, but I observe that according to the Chief Constable's Report, of the number of persons apprehended more than once during the year 1893, only 26 were in custody more than ten times, and these 26 were all females.

2850. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) It is only in the case of dangerous lunatics that the sheriff has a formal inquiry and takes evidence?—Yes.

2851. In the case of lunatics that are not dangerous his duties are confined to seeing that the medical certificates and the application are in proper form?—Yes.

2852. (By the Chairman.) The medical certificates are the statutory evidence?—Yes. There is one institution in Edinburgh for inebriates which is referred to in Mr. Morton's Bill, viz., Queensberry House, which I believe exists for paying patients. It is said to be voluntary, but what I want to bring under your notice is this—that I have often received applications from parties, inmates of this asylum, complaining that they were being detained there at the instance of friends against their will. I thought the best way to deal with them was to send an agent of the poor to see them. That was done, and in some cases I believe that the agent threatened the authorities of the establishment with an action of damages. Then they liberated the complaining parties. Cases of the kind having been brought under my notice, I had a consultation with Sheriff Crichton, who was sheriff at that time, and he spoke to Major McCartney, the Governor of Queensberry House. We arranged that if there were any more of these applications we should send them to the Governor of Queensberry House, asking him what explanation his directors had to make, and if the reply to that is satisfactory, we just intimate it to the party complaining, and state that we think it better for his own interest that he should remain there. Of course it is illegal to detain anyone there who wants out. This practice has been followed. I have here a letter with reference to a complaint which lately was addressed to Sheriff Blair. On the 27th September last, this man, Mr. John Fisher, an inmate of Queensberry House, complained, and wanted to be released, and the answer he got was this:—'I am directed by the sheriff to communicate the result of the inquiry with regard to your letter asking to get out of Queensberry House. He is satisfied that it is for your good that you should remain in the institution; further, that your leaving may be attended with very serious consequences to yourself.' That is the kind of reply that is sent. I have always had an uneasy feeling that some of these parties are being detained illegally, and that some day the directors of Queensberry House may be treated to an action of damages.

2853. I am glad you have brought forward that subject. My recollection is that before the Dalrymple Commission similar evidence was given at the time of women sending complaints—were made by women to the Edinburgh magistrates. You say it is illegal?—Detaining them against their will is illegal.

2854. Is it the case that by complying with the formalities prescribed by the Inebriates Act they could have legal powers?—No! The Habitual Drunkards Act only applies to parties who are willing to make application.

2855. People who are willing to stop there of their own accord might be presumed to be willing to make application; and if you assume that none of them are willing to make application then the detention in every case is illegal. They have no right to be there at all. You have no executive concern in the matter?—None. I mention it because Queensberry House is referred to in Mr. Morton's Bill.

2856. Take this case. If one of the inmates of Queensberry House were to assault the doctor and the gate keepers in his efforts to get out—and were brought before you for assault; assuming that he had committed these assaults in fighting against illegal detention, what should you do?—It would be a difficult question. No doubt the directors of Queensberry House are acting from the best motives. They have got the people in the house there at the instance of friends. But they incur the risk of actions for damages.

2857. Are you as a sheriff suspicious of such illegal efforts?—I always am. I may say that the letter I have referred to came to me through the dead letter office. The man had been let out the day before it arrived and could not be found, and that is the way I have it. [The witness then withdrew.]

Sheriff-
Substitute
Butcherford.

21 Nov. 1894.

Dr. Clouston.

DR. T. S. CLOUSTON, Physician-Superintendent, Royal Asylum for the Insane, Morningside, called in and examined.

Dr. Clouston.

2858. (By the Chairman.) You are medical superintendent in Morningside?—I am.

2859. How long have you been in that position?—Twenty-one years.

2860. Please state your medical qualifications?—I am an M.D., and a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians.

2861. You have had other medical experience in connection with asylum work?—I have. I was ten years in England in charge of the County Asylum, Carlisle.

2862. Please give us your views as to habitual drunkenness—how far is it a vice and how far a disease, and whether there is any possibility of a border line between it as a vice or a disease?—I consider habitual drunkenness a disease in many cases. Undoubtedly it is only a vice in others. I do not think it possible, however, to draw a hard and fast line, or anything like a hard and fast line between what is vice and what is disease.

2863. Should I be right in stating that a person who is habitually intemperate—an habitual drunkard by his intemperance brings about a diseased condition of his brain and tissues generally, which in time amounts to disease?—That is undoubtedly so, if he drinks long enough, and we can now prove it microscopically by the actual change of tissue of the brain.

2864. And the first step towards the cure of that condition is to stop the alcohol?—Beyond a doubt.

2865. Further, is it the fact that certain diseased conditions produce in persons who have hitherto been temperate the loss of power to resist temptation to drink. I refer to such things as sun-stroke, apoplexy, or other diseased conditions, specially in connection with certain conditions to which women are subject, change of life and so on. Am I right in stating that these conditions change very frequently the whole disposition regarding drink, and cause otherwise formerly temperate persons to become drunken?—That is undoubtedly so in my experience, and I believe in the experience of other physicians. In addition to the cases you have stated adolescence and the coming on of old age, through the degeneration of the tissues undoubtedly produce a craving for drink, and men who have lived soberly may lapse at 60 or 70.

2866. In connection with your own special subject the action and reaction of drink and insanity is very close?—There is a very close connection indeed.

2867. In many cases does intemperance in drink bring on a well-marked insanity?—That is so. The assigned cause, predisposing or exciting, of about 16 per cent. of the insanity of the country in drink.

2868. And that insanity probably deprives the patient of the will to resist the inducement to drink?—That is so. It is frequently the case in the beginning, before proved insanity comes in, that the self-control is lost.

2869. In connection with that you have a provision under the Scots law for the admission into asylums in voluntary cases; do you find many cases in which drunkards apply for voluntary admission?—A certain number do so; but from my experience of such cases I am extremely loath to admit them. I find that many of them come in for the purpose of getting a sort of pick-me-up, and go away before any permanent good is done.

2870. Have you any suggestion to make as to the duration of the period of detention in cases of that kind?—I should not have drunken cases admitted as such into asylums at all.

2871. Not even the voluntary cases that come in?—I should not.

2872. You state here that in some few cases you have used the asylum as a Reformatory, keeping patients for six months, and even a year when they did not press for a discharge, but that your experience generally in regard to the plan of mixing inebriates whose legal insanity had passed off with insane patients had been unfavourable. In cases where they did press for a discharge you had no legal power over them?—If such patients had asked to get away I should have had to discharge them.

2873. How were these people sent to you?—They were originally certified as insane persons, the technical legal insanity had passed away, but still they retained the tendency to drink. They became intellectually sane, but not normal as regards self-control.

2874. I suppose you have a large number of patients who, a short time after they come into you, from being

Dr. Clouston. kept from getting drunk became intellectually sane?—That is so.

21 Nov. 1894. 2875. And how do you treat them?—We have to discharge them as soon as a reasonable period of probation has expired. We treat them exactly as we treat cases of mania or melancholia. We can retain such cases after the legal insanity has gone off but a very short time.

2876. What is the view which you take of delirium tremens as regards insanity?—It depends on whether the certifying doctor looks upon it as insanity or not. It is a mere accident whether it is sent to the Royal Infirmary or to the asylum.

2877. Do you get many cases?—We do get some.

2878. And you are entitled to keep them in for a reasonable probationary period?—We are.

2879. What do you consider a reasonable period?—It depends a good deal on the patient himself. One tries to persuade him after coming to reason to stay for something like three months; but usually one fails. There are certain reprobate cases coming in which we discharge at once. We do not keep such about the place after they are legally sane. I do not think it worth while to exercise any reformatory ways with them, because they are not reformable.

2880. Do you think they could be dealt with in the earlier stages before their condition became one of insanity?—I believe certain of the cases in the earlier stages could; but the reformation of habitual drunkards is not hopeful.

2881. Have you many reprobate cases; who go out, get drunk, become insane, and keep going the round in that way?—We have a certain number of cases; not a very large number of that class coming and going. We have one woman notoriously. Her mother had been insane, and a patient in the asylum; two brothers are insane, and she herself is a dipsomaniac, and has been with us ten times.

2882. In connection with dipsomania, and certain diseases of that type, have you observed anything in relation to heredity?—There is a close connection. This is a subject I have particularly studied.

2883. We should like if you can give us any light on that point?—It is difficult to give it in statistical form; I can only make a general statement that it is extremely common that hereditary connection exists. There are many instances of the hereditary connection between actual disease, that is legal insanity, where a man is unable to conduct his own affairs and requires to be placed under treatment, and the drink craving, and want of control over it which we call dipsomania. It is an exceedingly common circumstance in some families, but there are no statistics.

2884. Have you observed any cases in which the dipsomaniac children of dipsomaniac parents develop and show symptoms of insanity?—Constantly so. I have seen cases where, for instance, the parent was not insane when the children became dipsomaniacs and the parents became insane at the beginning of old age. Others with the hereditary taint, procreated children, who at the age of adolescence became insane. That is an important aspect—the way in which the drink craving comes in somewhere between the ages of 16 and 25—during the development of the brain just as St Vitus dance, epilepsy, and other nervous disorders do at that age. That is a critical age with many people in relation to dipsomania.

2885. Should you say that the influence of heredity in connection with the drink craving is as great as it is in the case of lunacy?—I am not prepared to give a definite opinion on that subject. I should say it is not perhaps quite so great.

2886. Is it sufficiently marked?—Very distinctly marked; but I am not prepared to say distinctly whether it is as great or not as in actual insanity. I have not got statistics.

2887. In dealing with such cases do you think that the Inebriate Acts is insufficient to govern the majority of them?—They have been a failure, and perfectly useless except for the milder forms.

2888. There are no houses licensed under them in Dr. Clouston Scotland?—None.

2889. In all cases where they have been tried they have been kept up by payments by the dipsomaniacs themselves or by their friends?—That is so.

2890. Coming to the question of a compulsory Act. There are three classes of habitual drunkards; (1) those who will voluntarily submit themselves to treatment, whose case is provided for under the present Act, or whose case could be dealt with by an amendment of the present Act. Then you have the cases of dipsomaniacs whose friends would like to commit them, and whose friends could pay for them; (3) you might have the cases of persons who would be willing to submit themselves, or whose friends would like to commit them, but who have no money; and (4) you have the quasi criminal class constantly up at the Police Court as a public nuisance. How would you deal with the case of a man whose friends wished to commit him to a Retreat, but who was not willing to go?—I should allow his friends, the nearest of kin, to submit proper evidence before the sheriff. Undoubtedly the sheriff in Scotland is the proper judicial officer to act. I should give the sheriff powers under an Act to issue an order for the person's committal, for 3, 6, or 12 months, as the case might be, compulsorily, either to a family or to a Retreat.

2891. Would you have that family licensed?—That is a question I have rather strong views upon. I think probably we should begin experimentally with our legislation; and one experiment in my judgment should be to allow certain persons suitably situated, and under proper conditions of supervision of course, to take dipsomaniac patients and to have control over them.

2892. There is some analogy to that is there not in the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, and it works remarkably well in certain cases.

2893. Under the Lunacy Acts what powers have the people to whom these lunatics are sent to detain them and to control them?—Absolute powers under the Lunacy Acts.

2894. Yes! I want to get the analogy. If you were called in for instance to advise as to a case of incipient mental derangement. You think it might be better to treat certain patients by sending them to reside with some suitable family than by taking them into the asylum. What I want to know is under what Act has such a family power to detain a lunatic sent to them?—There are two methods of doing what you refer to. An insane person can be detained for six months without a certificate, on notice to the Lunacy Board, as is provided in the Act 20 & 21 Vict. Cap. 71, Sections 41 & 43, 'with a view to his recovery.'

2895. But are these people under the provisions of the Lunacy Acts?—Under this first instance I speak of—this sending of a curable patient for six months for the purpose of cure—I am not aware that they are inspected at all.

2896. That is a very important point in connection with the analogy between the two things. I should be obliged if you will give us a definite reference to the whole thing. I want to know where such people get their power of detention and control?—Under the Lunacy Act of 1857.

2896A. You can give us the exact section?—I can send them to the secretary. The other way is this. There are certain houses licensed by the Board of Lunacy to take not more than four patients under the Act 25 & 26 Vict. Cap. 54, Section 5. I believe they usually prefer places where only one or two are taken. These houses are definitely licensed by the Lunacy Board, and these licenses can be withdrawn. To these houses usually paupers are sent by the Inspectors of Poor. That is commonly called the 'boarding-out system;' and these licensed persons detain these insane persons in their houses, and use the same control over them as I do with patients in the asylum. That is very extensively practised in Scotland.

2897. Then there must be express powers given to them?—Express powers are given to detain these persons 2898. These provisions do not exist under the English law?—Nothing analogous to them exists; and we think it is entirely to the disadvantage of the treatment of the insane in England that they do not exist there.

2899. That makes it all the more important that we should have a distinct reference to the Act. You will perhaps quote the section in your evidence when you get it to revise?—I shall be happy to do so.

2900. You speak of the boarding-out system. I suppose when one patient only is sent to a family for the purpose of cure he will mostly belong to the richer class?—On the whole they do.

2901. And on the other hand where three or four are sent together they are mostly paupers?—Mostly paupers. But at some places I know private cases are also boarded together in such licensed houses.

2902. The risk of abuse I suppose is always greater in the cases of the richer class of patients than in those of paupers—the risk of abusing the powers conferred by the Lunacy Act?—I don't know. I should say the risk is more where the money payments are small. You have in the case of the richer class sometimes large payments, and the risk of losing these payments undoubtedly operates towards good treatment of the patients. In the case of pauper patients that does not exist to the same extent, and one great risk is that the patients may get insufficient food and clothing, and care, and proper exercise.

2903. Are they inspected?—Oh yes; the inspection is at least three-fold. In the first place the Inspector of Poor, let us say in Edinburgh, sends his assistant to visit these patients at stated but irregular times. Secondly, he employs the local doctor to visit them four times a year, and for that he is paid. And third, a special officer, a deputy commissioner, visits them once a year at no specified date, so that the guardians are liable at any time to have some one in authority inspecting and seeing how the patients are treated. The patients have abundant opportunity of making complaints if they desire to do so.

2904. That system of inspection does not extend to those houses where a single patient is sent for the purpose of cure?—It does not.

2905. Have you any statistics on the subject?—I have not. The Lunacy Board will give you full statistics of boarding-out cases.

2906. And of those other cases?—I cannot tell whether they keep a regular record. I have never seen anything published in blue books as to cases sent for the purpose of cure.

2907. You find that a successful method of dealing with certain cases?—I think successful and appropriate. I resort to it often myself. It gives a man a chance of recovery without being considered insane in certain modified cases.

2908. In connection with the compulsory commitment of persons to Retreats for habitual drunkards, a case is given in the evidence taken before the Inebriates Committee in which a man in one of these houses had the drink craving so strongly upon him that he smashed up all the furniture, and made himself a nuisance in order to get out of the place. How would you deal with such a case?—I would hand him over to the police and try the ordinary effect of punishment.

2909. You can only do that in a licensed place?—I suppose that a man who breaks the law can be punished under any circumstances unless he is insane.

2910. I understand there are some houses in Scotland where inebriates are received?—Yes.

2911. Are the patients at liberty to leave when they like?—They must be so; otherwise the keepers of these houses would be breaking the law.

2912. As a matter of knowledge are you aware whether the keepers of these houses regard the law, and allow patients to go when they want, or whether they disregard the law?—Well if you had a man sent to the Orkney Islands say, and he had no money to take him away, it might be rather hard for him to leave.

2913. Of course in that case they would not be breaking the law?—No; that is often done.

2914. If a man is kept short of money that is perfectly legitimate?—That is the way it is done.

2915. When you are called upon to give advice regarding habitual drunkards where do you send them?—I have no particular place. But the best results I have hitherto seen have been got by boarding the patient with a minister or county doctor or farmer in a good house in some part of the Highlands as far away from temptation as possible.

2916. Where do you find that?—Well in Colonsay; or among the Orkney Islands and the Shetland Islands there are few public-houses. By putting certain patients under these conditions, if you get the right kind of guardian, you get a certain moral whip hand over the patient. He is in the midst of people leading right lives, and if they take trouble with him he gets into a better state of mind. His health is attended to, and I certainly have seen very good results in some early cases under that system of treatment. You first get your patient in a mood to want to be cured and then you may have good results.

2917. That is half the battle. I do not suppose there is any power that can help you if the patient himself does not want to be cured. If you get him into a state of mind that he wants to be cured it aids all the treatment.—That is a vital point.

2918. A good many nostrums are now proposed for the treatment of the drink craving. What is your opinion regarding them?—I do not think much of them. In the earlier stages medical men use bromides to diminish nervous irritability, and by producing a certain quietening effect diminish the actual craving, but their effect does not last for any length of time.

2919. There are some patent American cures such as the 'Gold' cure, the 'Tyson' cure, and the 'Metabolic' cure.

2920. What do you think of them?—My own opinion is that they are a gross quackery every one of them.

2921. You do not believe there is anything in them?—Absolutely nothing.

2922. Those cases you speak of which are sent to the Highlands must be a very small fraction of the grand total of habitual drunkards?—No doubt they are. They do not apply to the poor.

2923. You have the quasi criminal who comes before the Police Court, and you have the man who is unable to manage his own affairs on account of being an habitual drunkard. How would you deal with the poor but respectable drunkard?—Well, if the law would allow me, I should experiment with an institution of small size, where such people could really work for their livelihood. Probably the cost of the buildings would have to come out of public funds or from philanthropic sources. But I think a considerable part of the actual maintenance might be got by the work of the patients, especially by selecting favourable and curable cases to begin with. I think I should get good results by such an experiment. I do not believe that anybody would be rash enough to propose a gigantic scheme for treating drunkenness. I do not think we have the knowledge for it.

2924. Take the quasi criminal drunkard—the man who is constantly before the magistrates, who spends a good deal of his life in prison, is a nuisance to himself and everybody else, and the city a considerable amount. Do you think he might be better dealt with in a Reformatory and Retreat than under the prison system?—It seems to me that Reformatories might be set up for such cases. Practically I do not know more about such cases than any other citizen. Except there is a mental trouble they do not come before me. I cannot speak of this with any sort of authority or experience.

2925. Your experience has been chiefly among the well-to-do and richer classes?—And among the poorer too; we have a large pauper department at Morning-side.

2926. In cases where you are consulted about habitual drunkards, you could not, I suppose, give any power of detention or control, if the case proved less

Dr. Clouston. than insanity or dipsomania?—I should give control to the guardians of such cases. I think that the principle of prevention would be very valuable.

21 Nov. 1894.

2927. Under the present Act you would not care to do that?—There is no legal power at present to detain them against their will.

2928. You mentioned that you had been in England, and in England there are a large number of private lunatic asylums. We all know the reputation of Morningside, but every one has heard something about these private asylums in England. I suppose you admit the necessity of inspection of every asylum?—Beyond any doubt. Wherever the subject is deprived of liberty he must be inspected.

2929. Therefore you would inspect all places in Scotland where people may be or are detained against their will?—I think you must. If compulsorily placed, they must be under some kind of proper inspection.

2930. Don't you think it is desirable that inspection should be insisted on in every place where habitual drunkards are received, and where they may be detained against their will?—I do.

2931. At this present moment, as you are aware, a man comes forward and gets a certificate to keep a Retreat for habitual drunkards; his character is inquired into, the license is granted, his place is inspected. But is it not open for a man to set up a Retreat on his own account, and do away with inspection?—All I can say is that I get applications from at least a hundred persons for the care of dipsomaniacs. If patients of that kind were sent to unauthorised places they would very soon find out that they were being illegally detained. Dipsomaniacs, as a rule, are very sharp at finding out that sort of thing.

2932. You know of course some institutions about Edinburgh where dipsomaniacs are received?—Yes, there are houses, I don't call them institutions. There is a little place at Peebles, and there is Queensberry House.

2933. What is the size of the place at Peebles?—It is a small place.

2934. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I believe it has 14 patients.

2935. (By the Chairman.) You would have such places inspected as Queensberry House and Peebles?—Certainly.

2936. You believe in them having some employment?—Yes; that is one reason why I like them to go to a farm. They can have a little work there, and a little shooting and fishing; some occupation in life.

2937. You think the presence of inebriates in asylums is bad both for the lunatic patients and the inebriates?—I do. Of course if you have a private asylum, where the board-money is of some importance, I think it is a legitimate enough thing for them to take in certain dipsomaniac patients, and do the best they can for them in the present state of the law. It is for money reasons, but it is a perfectly legitimate thing.

2938. In the case of private asylums in Scotland where dipsomaniacs are received, are they received as lunatics?—They are received under the provisions of the Lunacy Act. They are voluntary patients, but the law expressly provides that such cases shall not be classed as lunatics, or treated as such, or entered in the register of lunatics. But they are not deprived of the control of their affairs or treated as insane persons.

2939. What does a man do if he wishes to get out?—He asks the doctor or he writes to the Lunacy Board. I think a good deal of good is often done by such residences. I should like to make one suggestion which I did not send in—I forgot about it—and that is that in any future legislation I would very strongly suggest that it should be made a penal offence for any publican or licensed grocer to sell any intoxicating liquor to any person who has been intimated to him by the proper authority as an habitual drunkard. I would make that a condition of the licensing laws. It would be most important; it would merely be carrying out what most of the guardians of dipsomaniacs try to do by private arrangement with publicans in their neighbourhood.

2940. That would be very good in the country; but would it not be rather difficult to work in towns?—Dr. Clouston. Well, it might be more difficult. The other day the wife of a man who had been a former insane patient of mine came to me and told me that her husband was making 28s. per week, and was drinking about 22s. in a certain public-house, the people of which knew that he had been insane. She was practically starving, but she could not get them to stop supplying the man with drink. That is merely an example. I should extend that provision to every person who had been insane. And after intimation by the Inspector of Poor, or nearest relative, to a publican or licensed grocer in the neighbourhood, I would make it a penal offence for such publican or licensed grocer to supply intoxicating liquor to the person referred to in the intimation.

2941. Could you not get that in some other way?—I have no doubt it might be done in some other way, but such intimation would do a certain amount of good, and in country places it would take away the chief risk we have at present.

2942. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think good might be done by holding over the heads of publicans, licensed grocers, and pawnbrokers, pains and penalties for selling drink to certified drunkards?—That is so.

2943. In the country towns the excuse could not be put forward that the drunkard was not known?—It could be carried out there.

2944. Do you think that the same penalty should apply to the pawnbroker in so far as he should not be permitted to receive furniture, body-clothes, or bed-clothes from certified drunkards?—I have not considered that particular question. It never occurred to me.

2945. Is it within your knowledge that drunkards pawn their clothing, &c., for drink?—It is so in a great many cases.

2946. Does he do so for any other reason: because if he were a starving man he could in this city, with so many benevolent societies, get food by applying for it?—Undoubtedly.

2947. You say that from your experience we have no information at present justifying us in starting big establishments for the treatment of habitual inebriates?—I should put it in this way. That we have not sufficient information and sufficient experience in starting gigantic or very costly experiments.

2948. In Scotland, allow me to mention that there are 13 Reformatory female shelters, in which women are detained for 12 and 18 months who have been addicted to drink and prostitution. The directors of these institutions inform us that from 40 to 50 per cent. have been cured and restored to society?—I should think that too favourable a statement.

2949. Assuming for the moment that the results in the main are true, is it not an object-lesson for the Government, the Municipality or County Council, separately or jointly, to deal with these people in Retreats or Reformatories and not in prison?—I have no doubt we ought to found on every bit of experience we have, but I am very sceptical of the records of cures of dipsomaniacs hitherto published. They are not at all in accordance with my own experience.

2950. Have you heard of the asile alcoolique about to be erected in Paris on the report of Dr. Magnan?—I have seen a statement in the papers about them. I have seen several establishments of the kind in America.

2950A. Do you think the law in America in regard to inebriety better than our own?—Different States have different laws.

2951. Is it the law that is wrong in America, or is it the management of the Homes and the want of constant, healthy, and varied occupation?—I looked upon them rather casually, and it would scarcely be right of me to express an opinion. But, from the knowledge I possess, I have no doubt they are run with the real object of benefiting the insane and benefiting society.

2952. Did it strike you that in most of the American Homes employment was looked upon as secondary to detention?—I took up some such impression in regard to some of them. I did not go into the question.

2953. You told us, Dr. Clouston, that inebriety should

Dr. Clouston.
21 Nov. 1894.

Dr. Clouston. be kept distinct from lunacy?—I did, but they occasionally cross each other; inebriety may become insanity, and the lunatic when cured of his technical insanity may take to drink from a still existing brain weakness.

21 Nov. 1894.

2954. Are you aware that the habitual drunkard has in his own, and in the eyes of many, less of a stigma attaching to him than the lunatic?—Oh! I suppose it is often considered a more respectable thing to be a drunkard than a lunatic.

2955. And that there are fewer social and civil disabilities attaching to drunkards than to lunatics?—That is so.

2956. If it is necessary for the treatment and cure of lunatics to classify them, would it not a fortiori be necessary to classify inebriates?—Yes; I have strong opinions in regard to the classification to inebriates. They consist of different classes, and a proper classification has not yet been formulated. They are distinct one from another, and any attempt to deal with them without regard to this fact would end in failure.

2957. Classification is a most important factor in any scheme?—Undoubtedly.

2958. What sort of classification would you suggest?—I am not quite prepared to say. There are, of course, the early or adolescent cases, and cases from which after reasonable inquiry there is every reason to expect good behaviour. These should be regarded as one class and provision made for them first. Extreme offenders—those who have been constantly in prison—should be regarded as quite a different class altogether.

2959–60. Supposing they have not that desire, should not their wives and families, relations and the public, be protected?—I think so emphatically. I never have sadder experiences than when the parents and wives and husbands of drunkards come to me and say:—‘Can nothing be done to save them,’ and I have to reply:—‘Nothing in the present state of the law, if they won’t go voluntarily to some guardian.’

2961. And the effects—where these exist—of the dipsomaniacs placed under a curator?—I think that is most important. Something should be done for the protection of the property of dipsomaniacs for the sake of society. There is no other condition I know of that causes so much misery as a drunkard in a family.

2962–63. Supposing it were the case that 30 per cent. of the poorhouses of Scotland are empty, or almost empty, there would be no necessity for going in for other costly buildings; they might be utilised, might they not?—Decidedly, I should like to see that tried.

2964. Do you believe in placing a large number of these inebriates together?—I do not. Where you get a number together they create a bad moral atmosphere, and prevent that desire of getting well which is at the foundation of their well-doing. They do each other a great deal of harm.

2965. Do you consider intoxication per se insanity?—I refuse to call it insanity. Insanity is a disease; intoxication is a temporary aberration.

2966. (By Miss Stevenson.) In regard to the statement which one sees frequently made, especially by temperance reformers, that there has been during the last few years a marked increase of drunken habits amongst women in the upper or educated class, producing a corresponding increase in cases of insanity among the same class. Does your experience corroborate that?—That is not in accordance with my experience. Thirty years ago, at Morningside, we had as many such cases as we have now.

2967. In regard to the treatment of people addicted to drinking among the upper classes whose friends can afford to have them put under restraint. Would you approve of such legislation as they have in France; where the family can meet with a lawyer and arrange to have the member who has incurred extravagant habits put under a curator?—I think that a remarkably good law, and I have often wished we had such a law here.

2968. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) What is your idea of the length of time that would be requisite to keep a patient in one of these asylums in order to operate a cure?—It is an extremely difficult question to answer. But I would say this, that there is very little use of placing a patient for any time under six months. Something between a year or two is a much more likely time in which benefit might be received.

Dr. Clouston.
21 Nov. 1894.

2969. (By Col. M’Hardy.) From what you have been saying hitherto I understand that you would be in favour of treating habitual inebriates in different ways?—I should.

2970. Some of them in one way and some in another. Probably a small amount of restraint would suffice in one case, and a larger amount would be required in another?—That is my experience.

2971. Am I right in supposing that in a good many cases probably simple boarding-out with satisfactory guardians would suffice?—In a great number of cases. In the best of the better-class of cases that would be quite sufficient. What you want is to get them out of the way of temptation.

2972. When you say ‘better-class’ I presume you mean the medical view of the case rather than the social position of the man or woman?—That is my meaning.

2973. Is there not a considerable difficulty, even in the Orkney Islands and elsewhere, in keeping drink from those men who are boarded-out?—There is considerable difficulty if the man is active and crafty.

2974. But you think some sort of simple guardianship would suffice in a good many cases?—Yes. If it did not the grip could be tightened until it became practically imprisonment.

2975. In every case you would have proper occupation?—I think that is most important; out-door occupation if possible. Agricultural work or gardening.

2976. Can you give the number you would deal with in one group?—I would not put more than four together in a private house and I prefer one.

2977. Does that remark apply to the quasi criminal class as well?—They would have to be grouped I presume in somewhat larger bodies. But the smaller the better.

2978. What number would in your opinion be the maximum it would be desirable to associate together?—I have not quite faced up that question. But I should consider that more than 50 would be a very undesirable number.

2979. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You think we have not experience sufficient to warrant us going into a large scheme?—That is my belief.

2980. Do you think a prima facie case has been made out for doing something?—For doing something undoubtedly—something tentatively in various directions for the inebriate and for his relatives.

2981. You think the present system of short periods of detention on the voluntary system has not been a success?—Its success has been extremely small.

2982. Do you attach much importance to evidence from America?—I do not; so far as it goes it is commonly too optimistic.

2983. Would there not be one drawback in these small institutions you speak of—the difficulty of carrying out compulsion?—I am referring to the curable class. I am not talking of the criminal class whom society must take in hand for its own benefit and treat them as it thinks best.

2984. You think healthy out-door occupation should be part of the treatment?—I do. I have seen men do well when they take to gardening. I remember being consulted about an adolescent case from Edinburgh. We sent the young man to a respectable Orkney farmer, and the lad had made his home there. He is now a big ruddy burly youth with no drink craving, a marked contrast to the pale nervous-looking person he was before we sent him away.

2985. Do you think there would be much difficulty on the score of expense if we recommended the establishment of Homes?—Well one would not like to frighten the tax-payer to too great an extent.

2986. Tax-payers are getting rather sensitive in these days?—They are undoubtedly; and not altogether without reason.

Dr. Clouston. 2987. Do you think it would be possible to get a fair return from these institutions so as to diminish their expense?—I think an energetic superintendent of one of these institutions might take a good deal out of one of them.

21 Nov. 1894.

2988. As regards the machinery for putting habitual drunkards into these Homes, would you put the responsibility on the doctor as under the Lunacy Acts, or would you make it a legal matter and leave it to the sheriff?—I think it should be treated as a legal matter and brought before the sheriff. It could come up by petition from near relations, or those suffering at the hands of the inebriate, and the sheriff should take evidence upon it and decide accordingly.

2989. Would the sheriff hear that in open Court?—No. I think that would immensely diminish the good effects.

2990. Do you think it should be a medical question at all?—It should be a question for the legal authorities. The family medical man would no doubt be asked by the sheriff to give evidence.

2991. He would give collateral testimony?—Not necessarily. There are plenty of cases in which the relatives would give sufficient evidence to convince the sheriff that a man was an habitual drunkard, and there are others where the doctor's evidence would be the most important—cases with markedly medical aspects.

2992. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Are these individuals who are sent to farms for six months sent on the certificate of a doctor or doctors?—They are sent with the certificate I have referred to.

2993. And the person they go to restrains them?—Dr. Clouston. Yes.

2994. That seems to me capable of tremendous abuse?—A certificate is signed to the Board of Lunacy; the doctor intimates that a case has been placed under such a guardianship in such a place. But it is not a formal certificate like our ordinary medical certificate.

2995. Any practising physician can sign that?—Yes.

2996. Are you aware if there has been abuse from it?—I am not aware that there has been the slightest abuse from it. I look on it as an extremely valuable measure for certain cases of slight and transient mental affections.

2997. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think we have any scientific evidence which would enable us to judge if there is much hope of reclaiming those people by continuous treatment?—Certain of them you can if you get hold of them early. The discouraging thing in connection with all legislation of the kind is that we shall probably have to begin with the worst cases that are the greatest nuisances to themselves and to society. That will tend to discourage. Undoubtedly one has seen drunkards who have been reformed.

2998. In the worst cases you speak of is it because there is an actual structural change in the brain or nervous system that makes the cure so hopeless, or is it merely that the will is lost?—In the advanced habitual drunkard such a change has taken place in the brain that it is impossible for a cure to take place. This change can undoubtedly now be demonstrated microscopically like any other bodily disease. In such cases the bodily vehicle of sound or strong will is gone.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MISS LOUISA STEVENSON, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Miss Louisa Stevenson.

22 Nov. 1894.

2999. (By the Chairman.) You are a member of the Edinburgh Parochial Board?—I was; but I was obliged to resign owing to a change in the boundaries by the Boundary Commissioners throwing my residence out of St. Cuthbert's Parish, and rendering me no longer eligible.

3000. How long were you a member of the Board?—Nearly ten years.

3001. And I suppose that in connection with that body you came across a very large number of petty offenders of all sorts?—A very large number.

3002. Had you to do with any schemes for their reclamation?—No; not specially.

3003. Have you any suggestions to offer as to the causes of repeated crime in these people?—Well, the subject on which I wished specially to speak was the case of children of vagrants who, through being trained as vagrants, add to the vagrant community in after years.

3004. Had you much experience of them in connection with Parochial Board work?—We had cases of the children of vagrant parents—parents who spent their lives between the prison and the workhouse during the winter, and who during the summer went off travelling through the country, taking their children with them out of the workhouse, begging from poorhouse to poorhouse, spending a night or two in whatever poorhouse was en route; and at the end of the time all the bills for their board and lodging during that period were sent in to us, and we had simply to pay for them. That went on repeatedly.

3005. That would only be people who were not classed as able-bodied?—They cannot be classed as able-bodied.

3006. We got evidence as to the children of vagrants detained in some other parishes. There they appear to board them out, and they seem to have power to retain them against the wish of their parents. Had you anything of that sort, or did you work on that system?—There is the Custody of Children Act 1891, giving the Parochial Boards power to apply to the Court for permission to retain children; but that Act has been practically useless. I believe that no case has ever occurred in which the Parochial Boards could defend such cases, partly because of the great expense; but as a matter of fact parents do not take such cases to Court. These Courts are too far apart from them. If it were the Police Courts—I think these were suggested for England—the parents might go there.

Miss Louisa Stevenson.

22 Nov. 1894.

3007. It is not a question of police. You say that your Board has suffered considerably in consequence of these guardians leaving their children in poorhouses all over, and then going off and travelling the country with them. What I say is that in some of the Glasgow Parochial Boards, inspectors told us that they were able to deal with such cases by boarding-out the children and refusing to give them up to their parents, and that they had something that they construed into legal warrant for doing so?—They may have construed it into legal warrant, but practically these parents cannot be said to be altogether 'unmindful' of the interests of their children.

3008. Then, might I ask, is what you suggest that there should be a cheap and readily accessible tribunal which might give power in such cases to the Parochial Boards to retain the custody of these children?—Well, what I suggested was, that the Parochial Boards themselves should have the power to retain those children till the parents had returned all or part of the money that the Board had expended on them—to have a sort of hold on them; not making it absolutely certain that they must do so, but giving them this power without going to the Court at all.

3009. You do not think that is a power that might be liable to abuse?—From my experience I should say no; because I think that as a rule Boards are rather anxious to get rid of their children than to retain them.

3010. We have suggestions made to us that the Boards should have power of compulsory retention in the case of another class of paupers—those namely, who get out now and again, get drunk, go to prison, and come back to the poorhouse; get obstreperous, go out again, and repeat that process indefinitely. The suggestion is that the Boards should be given power to retain those people for a certain number of weeks. Do you think that would be a good thing?—I do. So far as I can see it would be the only way of getting hold of the children under the existing law. Along with that would go the power of boarding-out these children and keeping them.

3011. You do not have any statistics sent in to the city parish from other parishes who had maintained your vagrants during the summer?—Not being a member of the Board now I have not access to statistics; but I have in my mind the case of a man and wife who wandered through the whole of Scotland in the summer, walking with their children as far as they could—to Stirling, Aberdeen, Inverness, and every large town—and then coming back at the end of summer.

3012. You speak of these as vagrants, but their domicile must have been in Edinburgh?—Yes. They are domiciled in Edinburgh; leading a vagrant life in the summer.

3013. They were vagrants so far as the rest of Scotland was concerned?—Yes; but they are domiciled in Edinburgh.

3014. Is there any other special point that you wish to bring before the Committee?—No; I think the one great point is that power should be given to the Boards to retain those children, until perhaps the whole or part of what had been expended upon them had been repaid.

3015. That might practically mean a very long time?—Yes; it might. But it would be in the discretion of the Boards, and I think from my experience it probably would work well.

3016. Now, did the exposure to this treatment prevent the Boards from boarding-out those children? Did they say 'It is not worth while boarding them out'? Did it operate to the detriment of the children themselves?—It did operate detrimentally to the children; because, whilst they are wandering about their education is interrupted, and they are learning vagrant habits.

3017. That is not exactly what I meant? Did it operate to the detriment of the children so far as their treatment by the Board was concerned?—No. I do not think so. The Board ultimately, after a number of years, persuaded parents to allow the children to be sent to an orphanage.

3018. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Have Parochial Boards any power at present of taking children from their parents when they are sent out to beg? Is there any legal power?—Yes; under this 1891 Act they have the power if the children have been badly treated by the parents—where the parents have been unmindful of the interests of their children.

3019. Did you say that Act was really a dead letter?—So far a dead letter that they have to go to the Court.

3020. Can a Parochial Board confine children sent out to beg on the street? Can the inspector carry them in and lock them up?—No; every one who goes to the Parochial Board must make application one way or other. No one can be made a pauper against his will. He must apply.

3021. Begging is a police offence?—It is an offence in towns.

3022. In a town what comes of the child found begging. Can the police not send it to the work-house? It is not sent to prison?—A child would certainly not be sent to the work-house unless taken up before a Court.

3023. (Miss Flora Stevenson.) They go to an Industrial School, under the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act.

3024. When you talk of money spent on the children do you mean money spent on their food and clothing?—Money spent on their keep. It mounts up to a considerable sum when it goes on year after year.

3025. It practically means keeping the children so long as the Parochial Board choose to keep them?—If you fix the limit of age.

3026. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Are most of those vagrants pursuing some kind of ostensible occupation?—Sheer begging.

3027. Is there any chance of their ever accumulating enough capital to be able to pay off their Parochial Board obligations?—I should say not.

3028. Would they not look upon this as rather an eligible opportunity of getting rid of their children; foisting them upon the Parochial Board. Do you think they would be inclined to make any effort to pay off?—I think those that were worth anything would; the worthless would not. Some who really care for their children might, but the worthless ones never.

3029. Do these children turn out badly in after life? Do they swell the criminal population; get worse than vagrants?—In this special case of which I speak the parents at last consented to the elder ones being sent to a Catholic Home. They were Catholics.

3030. There is a distinction, I see, made in our instructions between pure vagrants and show people—caravan people?—I speak of pure vagrants.

3031. I suppose a good many of the inferior class of show people lead very much the same kind of life as vagrants?—Yes, except that the show people carry their caravan with them, and the children are consequently not subject to the same bad influences as the children that are wandering about the country in the way I have been speaking of.

3032. Would you punish the people who do not attempt to pay up their debts to the Parochial Boards?—I would propose that the Parochial Boards should have powers, not only to recover for the past, but to make parents pay a fixed weekly payment to the Board for the children's maintenance.

3033. To intercept their wages?—To intercept wages or get it in any way they could.

3034. (By Col. M'Hurdy.) Don't you think that the tax-payer would be likely to object to pay for the detention and upbringing of these children?—The tax-payer must pay in any case, because all the time this family I allude to were wandering, their bills were running on. These bills came to us at the end of the season and we had to pay for them; so that they are on the rates in any case.

3035. Supposing that the children had been educated and well brought up, and had in any case come to earn wages, the parents would be more likely to try and reclaim them than if they were merely younger vagrants than themselves?—That is so. There are many cases where as soon as the child was able to earn wages, the parents have stepped in and claimed the child, in order to get the benefit of its earnings.

Miss Louisa Stevenson.

22 Nov. 1894.

3036. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Might these children not have been dealt with under the wandering clause of the Industrial Schools Act?—They only wandered during the summer, and they were with their parents, their parents really having some sort of affection for them, and taking advantage of what opportunities they had to visit them when they were in the work-house. Miss Flora Stevenson.—I think it is the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act of 1865.

3037. Was any attempt ever made to commit them under the Industrial Schools Act?—No; they were not suitable cases for being committed under the Industrial Schools Act, because the parents had this claim upon them, they cared for them, and when they were in the work-house they cared to visit them at stated times; so that they were not entirely neglected.

3038. But their education must have been completely neglected?—Yes; whilst they were wandering.

3039. And that was a large part of the summer?—During the great part of the summer.

3040. However, no attempt was made to apply to the sheriff for warrant to deal with those cases?—The Board to which I belonged, even I believe in the cases of grown people, about 25 years ago defended a case before the sheriff of a pauper applying for relief, and it was given against them. Now, and ever since, whoever applies for relief is offered the work-house. If they do not really need it they do not go in.

3041. (By Miss Stevenson.) I think your Board are of opinion that it is better if possible to board children out than send them to Industrial Schools?—Much better.

3042. And the difficulty was, as you have said, that these children did not come under the section of the Act because they were not without proper guardianship; they were with their parents?—Yes.

3043. If they had their children with them they helped them to beg?—Yes.

3044. You are also of opinion that it would be desirable that Parochial Boards should have the power to retain children after they are 14 years of age, so that dissolute parents who had been relieved of their children all that time could not take them away when they were wage-earning?—Yes. I think in the case of girls the age might be raised to 16.

3045. What did you do with illegitimate children who came in with their mothers? Did you ever board them out?—Yes; if there was more than one they were frequently boarded-out.

3046. Did you make it a condition of boarding the child out that the mother should stay in the poorhouse?—Not in every case; because each mother was supposed to be able to support one child.

3047. Some of the guardians in England are making application; are agitating for such powers to Parochial Boards as you refer to?—I think the suggestion in England was that it would meet the difficulty if the Police Courts had the power. They would save all the expense of going to the higher Courts if a parent might apply to the Police Courts. Miss Louisa Stevenson.

22 Nov. 1894.

3048. For recovery of a child?—Yes.

3049. As a matter of fact, if the case is referred to the sheriff, the Parochial Board has to pay not only its own expenses but the expenses of the pauper?—Yes.

3050. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Are you aware that the expense of putting a child into an Industrial School under the Industrial Schools Act is only a few shillings?—I was not talking of the expense of putting a child into an Industrial School; I was talking of the expense of a parent claiming his child from a Parochial Board, or from any guardian in whose hands it might be.

3051. You would have that in any case. A parent might apply for a child even though the Parochial Board kept it at its own hand, and might take it into the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

3052. But the expense of committing to the Industrial Schools is a mere trifle?—Yes.

3053. (By Miss Stevenson.) Your point is that those parents get rid of these children when they are of no use to them, and they become chargeable to the parish. Then when they are of use, you wish that the Parochial Boards should have power to keep these children altogether—if they have been chargeable to the Parochial Boards at all—if the parents are not suitable guardians over them?—Yes.

3054. And your point is that in the case of a parent applying for legal power to recover the custody of his child, the case has to come before a higher tribunal than the Police Court?—Yes. And to avoid that the Parochial Boards should have power to say:—‘Well, we are not legally bound to consider this case till the money that we have already expended on the child is paid up—till you have paid up the money which we have already expended on the child,’—without going to a higher Court.

3055. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you know if these vagrants have any respect for the law?—They have no respect for the law in so far as they are ready to break it.

3056. Are you aware that there is 1 out of every 7 vagrants apprehended by the police, whilst in the ordinary civil population the proportion is only 1 in 27?—I have not those statistics.

3057. That would indicate that they have not much respect for the law?—Yes, in that way; but I do not quite understand the question.

3058. Assume that there are 14,000 vagrants and beggars in Scotland. Of that number 2,000 have been apprehended by the police. That gives 1 to 7 of the vagrant population as offending against the law; whereas in the civil population it is only 1 in 27. That would indicate that they have not much respect for the law, and are rather frequent breakers of it?—Yes. [Witness then withdrew.]

Major
M'Cartney.

MAJOR M'CARTNEY, Governor of Queensberry House and Lodge, called in and examined.

Major
M'Cartney.

3059. (By the Chairman.) Will you please explain your connection with Queensberry Lodge and the House of Refuge?—I am the governor of that institution—one institution, because it is under the same board of directors and under the same government.

3060. But in different places, and with different sorts of patients?—It is within the same enclosure and under the same management, only that the patients in the one place are perhaps superior in status or in means to those in the other—although there are as good people in the House, people who have perhaps seen as good days, and maybe better, than some of those who happen to be in the Lodge.

3061. Well, one of the two institutions is called Queensberry Lodge, Holyrood, and it is described as ‘a temperance home, instituted in 1866, for ladies’?—It is also an invalid home.

3062. And the other is returned, the House of Refuge for the Destitute, Queensberry House, 64 Canongate?—Yes, that is the foundation of the House. The House is upwards of 60 years old, but since the introduction of poorhouses the place has been materially changed. Still it is a home for the destitute and a home for poor people who have no home at night—whom you might call vagrants and tramps, houseless and homeless. I should like here to make one statement. Any answer which I may give I give upon my own individual responsibility, and not as representing the Board of Directors of whose institution I am governor.

3063. How many inmates have you in Queensberry Lodge?—On an average there are from 12 to 20.

3064. Are you full just now?—No; at the present time I think we have about 16.

3065. Are there many of these inebriate cases?—I should say about half-and-half.

3066. You have got different classes of payments?—Yes, the payments range from £50 to £100 a year, but the majority of the patients pay £50 or £60. The place is not a commercial speculation. The directors allow me a certain amount of discretion, and the amount of the payment is sometimes reduced if they cannot pay.

3067. Is it self-supporting?—Yes; and it receives no grant. It does not require any subscriptions to meet any deficit.

3068. Does it make any profit?—No.

3069. After allowing interest on expenditure in building and the like of that?—The money to build the Lodge was originally taken from the House or by subscriptions. Any profit by the Lodge goes towards maintaining the House, which is a charity.

3070. Then does it make much profit?—Not much. Perhaps to the extent of from £50 to £100 a year or thereabout. It depends upon the number of inmates.

3071. You talk about invalid and aged ladies. These are not cases of weak-minded people are they?—No. Well you may call them so if you like. They are aged and infirm. They are people who require looking after in the way of nursing. Some are somewhat paralysed. We do not take in lunatics.

3072. I see when evidence was given in regard to this Lodge in 1872, Sir Arthur Mitchell mentioned that he had several cases of lunatics certified from there?—Whenever a case develops, I immediately call in a board of doctors, and if they are satisfied, I send the patient either to Morningside, Rosewell, or Gartnavel.

3073. Have you had many cases in the Lodge?—In the ten years I have been there, I think about three in the Lodge.

3074. I see Sir Arthur Mitchell had inspected the Lodge at the time of this evidence. Has he or any person connected with the Lunacy Commission inspected the House during your tenure of office as superintendent?—Sir Arthur Mitchell has been there once within the last three or four years, and Dr. Sibbald, I think, the deputy-commissioner in lunacy, has also been there, and gone through the whole place.

3075. What sort of cases of insanity were those—from drink?—One was through religious mania, supposed to be brought on by Moody and Sankey, and the other two, I should say, were from drink.

3076. None of them took the shape of delirium tremens?—No; I send those cases to the infirmary.

3077. Have you many cases of that in the Lodge?—I have never known a case in the Lodge; I have had them in the House.

3078. As to the Lodge, have you any statistics of the numbers of inebriate cases that you have had there, and the results so far as you know?—Nothing further than what I submitted to the secretary in the annual report which I sent him a short time ago.

3079. You are well acquainted with the annual report? Have you got a copy?—I did not bring one. I did not think it would be required.

3080. The admissions, according to the report, from August 1886 till 1893, are stated at 759 ladies, but it does not appear to differentiate inebriates and invalids?—Inebriates and invalids combined.

3081. You have no separate information as to the number of inebriates?—I would say about half. There are many ladies there who would not consider themselves inebriates. They live there for choice. They live there because they feel they are safe in it. I would say they are perfectly cured.

3082. During the last three years mentioned, 1891, 1892, and 1893, you have according to the report had 98 ladies in the institution?—Yes; during the year. It fluctuates, being sometimes more, sometimes less.

3083. Here is what is said about the results: 'The results of the treatment, when time has been afforded by a sufficient length of residence, continue to be satisfactory. Information cannot in all cases be obtained as to the benefits derived, but good accounts have been received in regard to a large number of the boarders, particularly those who have resided in the House for a period of four months or longer.' You can give us no more detailed information than this?—Those who have been there for a year or two rarely have returned—that is to say if the crave for drink has been starved out of their system. But if they have been in for short periods they frequently come back; sometimes two or three times over.

3084. How long do they come to you for?—As long as they wish to stay. They are nearly all voluntary people; whilst some are there perpetually of their own choice, and pay their own way.

3085. You say they are nearly all voluntary?—We prefer voluntary patients.

3086. Who are the involuntary patients?—Sometimes they are brought for their own protection to get cured from drink for the time. But we always prefer that they should come of their own accord. They always come with their own people, and so soon as their people see fit they come to take them away.

3087. If they want to get away without their people coming?—We have no legal power to detain them—nothing more than moral influence.

3088. Do they ever make off?—Sometimes. They get restive and write to the sheriff who generally inquires into the case; or perhaps they write to their law-agent, who inquires into the case. If the sheriff sees fit he advises them to return, or me to release them if he thinks proper.

3089. Have you ever had people go out and not return?—I have had worthless people go out and not return—thorough inebriates.

3090. Do you allow them out?—After a certain time there is no restraint placed upon their liberty. If they return under the influence I shut them up for two months according to the rules. In the Lodge they go out under the charge of the lady superintendent or the chaplain. As I came up to-day I saw several on the street shopping.

3091. Suppose they mean to give the chaplain the slip?—If they are mean enough to do so they can do so, if they wish to break their parole.

3092. Do you think the word of an habitual drunkard is worth much?—No, certainly not; but whenever I get them sober, and the drink out of their system, they are rational.

3093. In every reclamatory institution we have come across, we have found a certain, it may be a very small percentage of escapes or 'absconders'?—The thing has happened with myself. Half-a-dozen years ago at Christmas-time, I took out several ladies from the Lodge with me to buy some presents to send home to their children. Whilst they were buying and paying for the presents one of them made her escape. She is dead now.

3094. Was she brought back?—Subsequently she was brought back by her husband, who was a minister.

3095. Have you had any cases of ladies managing to get drunk when they were out?—No, never.

3096. Because I find that in 1872 several instances are given. One lady was found to be dead drunk, and on her trunk being searched they found 64 bottles of chlorodyne. It appears she had washed them out and drank the water, and managed to get drunk. In another case three persons were found apparently under the influence of drink, and on the matter being searched out, it was discovered that they had got possession of a box of Locock's Pulmonic Wafers?—I know they will drink anything that will, to use their expression, 'bite'—ginger, vinegar, cayenne pepper diluted in water. During my time I have never known a case of a lady getting drunk outside, for the simple reason that she was not allowed out except in charge of the chaplain or the lady superintendent. But I could not say the same of the House.

3097. The great difficulty is found in connection with the management of Retreats for inebriates, of keeping the servants from bringing in drink to the patients?—We search them. Everybody is searched coming into the house. I give a prize of a shilling for every bottle that is detected either on a boarder or a servant.

3098. Do you get many bottles?—I have got a good many.

3099. Have you to dismiss many servants for smuggling?—No.

3100. Are there public-houses near?—Yes; public-houses all round.

Major
M'Cartney.
22 Nov. 1894.

Major
M'Curtney.

22 Nov. 1894.

3101. Have you any understanding with the keepers of those houses not to supply these ladies?—It would be no use to enter into an arrangement. They would supply anybody with liquor who give them the money.

3102. You do not discourage the friends of those people?—We search the friends if we suspect them. If we detect them bringing in liquor we never allow them in again.

3103. You allow the inmates to go with money? In some places they ask the inmates not to have money?—As a rule we do not allow them to have money; but there are voluntary inmates who have money on their own accounts. But they do not misuse it. If they do they are either turned out or kept in.

3104. Do you find them willing to submit to being kept in?—Oh yes. Plenty of them come of their own accord.

3105. How long do you keep them in as a rule?—Perhaps a month.

3106. Do you use that as a means of discipline?—Yes; as a means of punishment for them transgressing the rules of the House by doing anything wrong. I give them from one to two months. They submit to it. It is an understood thing. They submit to it rather than be turned out.

3107. Do you find that the intermixture of invalid ladies and habitual drunkards is conducive to the reclamation of the latter?—The invalids are generally bed-ridden, and they have rooms of their own.

3108. The two points on which Mr. Nelson gave evidence before the committee in 1872 were—in the first place as to the great commercial success of the Lodge, which made a very handsome return in the shape of profit, if you did not allow for interest on the buildings and on the furniture. You could not tell us exactly what that profit is?—No, because the directors have allowed me to make the price elastic—to charge people according to what they can afford to pay.

3109. You cannot tell what surplus?—£200 a year is about the most I have ever handed over from the Lodge to the Refuge.

3110. The second point was the very great number of cures that you appear to have effected. Mr. Nelson was asked—'I think your experience is that you have cured 28 per cent. of the inmates that have been with you—37 out of 132?—Yes.'

3111. 'And you think you might cure a larger number if you could retain them compulsorily?—I have no doubt the result would be far more favourable.' That is a specific statement as to ratios of cures effected.

3111A. Do you think that is effected yet?—Since I have been there I would say that we have cured a great many people—I could not say exactly the number, and they are living in the House now perfectly cured—that I could trust just as much as you or myself.

3112. Do you encourage them?—I encourage them by giving them liberty to test them after a given time.

3113. Do you get many of them to take the pledge?—The chaplain administers the pledge to those who wish to take it. They are advised to take it as a guard against giving way.

3114. Do you ever use drink in the House for medicine?—Never except as prescribed by the doctor. Dr. William Russell is very much against it. He does not approve of it.

3115. What is your idea as to the necessity for compulsory powers? Do you think that you have power enough, or would you want more power in connection with the Lodge?—I think I have as much power as I require. I have no difficulty whatsoever in dealing with the people. Sometimes I get in an incorrigible, and people in whom there is no reformation or hope of reformation; and such people as these I would recommend to be placed in a lunatic asylum, as I think they are off their head.

3116. Probably the Lunacy Commissioners might object?—I think myself that inebriates, thorough inebriates are lunatics, and should be treated accordingly.

3117. Now we go on to the next branch of your Major charity or institution, the Queensberry House of Refuge M'Curtney for the Destitute, 64 Canongate. I suppose the object of that is as it was a number of years ago?—Yes; there is no change there.

3118. You take in poor women and lodge them?—We have at the present time, I suppose about 100 destitute men and women in the House, whom we make work for their living. They do all the household work about the place.

3119. Then you have another lot of drunken wives and daughters, who are sent in by their husbands and parents, who pay for them?—The payment ranges from 4s. 6d. to 10s. a week.

3120. And you find that from 5s. to 6s. pays you?—On an average about 7s. a week keeps a person there. But on the other hand we have a great many people, old and infirm, who live on small pensions—Trinity Hospital pensioners; and the parents of people who are in the Colonies, America, and Australia, who keep their old bodies in our place, because they knew that they will be well cared for and well looked after. That is a large part of the concern.

3121. How many inebriates have you?—I would say that at the present time there are about 50 inebriates in the place.

3122. How do they come in to you?—Some come in of their own accord, and ask to be shut up, and notify their husbands or their friends that they are there.

3123. Who pays for them?—Their people as a rule; and if they are not willing to pay I make them work.

3124. The worst lot; how do they come in?—There are people who make themselves nuisances. An unfortunate man will tell you that he cannot work by day or sleep by night owing to a drunken wife, and he asks me if I will take her in. If she is not willing to come, I do not mind taking her in until we sober her and put her into a right state of mind, and try to teach her by her surroundings the folly of her procedure.

3125. How long would it take to accomplish this?—Probably a month, perhaps two. A great many of the voluntary boarders were there in the first instance by compulsion, but after being in once, they never object to come back again.

3126. What I want information about is, how you keep them when they are in the thirsty stage, and want to get out?—We have a place called the nursery where we take in the first cases, and we have a moderate strong woman who is able to look after them. We give them as much butter-milk and potash-water mixed up together as they can drink, and they drink any quantity of it. We give it to both men and women, and sometimes we give the butter milk alone; we have not very many inebriate men—very few.

3127. Do you find that they take to that kindly as a substitute for drink?—The men are more difficult to deal with than the women. They are physically stronger, and their wills are stronger.

3128. Suppose a woman came with her husband very drunk, and persuaded him to go in there, would you treat him in the same way until he got unliquored?—Yes. Sometimes a husband and wife come in together, and we take them both in.

3129. How do you manage to bring your moral suasion to bear upon a strong willed husband who wants to get out?—I just advise him for his own good. I tell him in plain language that it is not a cemetery or a burying ground, and that he is there for his own good. We have never had occasion to use violence. I can always deal with the people so that they submit to my advice and good will.

3130. How many inebriates have you among the men in the house?—I should say at the present time there may be a dozen of what I would call inebriates—men who have been in business and have drank themselves out of it.

3131. Have you a nursery on their side of the house?—No, we do not require it for the men; only for the women.

3132. Mr. Nelson who gave evidence respecting the Major

M'Curtney
22 Nov. 1894.

House before, mentioned that he had a good number of cases who would be there for a month, and who at the end of the month got very impatient and difficult to deal with. Do you pursue any system of that sort?—When people are brought to me, I write to them or to their friends that they must come voluntarily and submit to the rules of the institution, and they may remain as long as they please there as long as their friends, with their own consent, wish to keep them.

3133. Mr. Nelson mentioned another method of getting inmates into the House, that a magistrate having to deal with an habitual drunkard ordered him to go to Queensberry House as an alternative to sending him to prison. Is that resorted to now?—Occasionally magistrates and police authorities act like that. They send them to me to keep them from going to prison.

3134. The evidence given before the former Committee was that women were brought from the Police Court in charge of policemen?—The detectives sometimes bring them, but they come of their own accord.

3135. Then the magistrates do not pursue this system?—No. I could not take them in but of their own accord. The place is not a prison.

3136. There was an interesting fact disclosed that certain magistrates had the habit, as an alternative to commitment to a prison, of giving the option of going to Queensberry House, and sending the prisoner there in charge of a policeman. Have you had any example of that in your time?—No, not in charge of policemen. I have known magistrates, out of kindness of heart, to send people to me that have come before them and pay for them out of their own pockets, not as prisoners, but merely in the hope of reforming them.

3137. You let the inmates come and go?—Any person who is thoroughly sober has as much freedom of action as if he or she were living in private lodgings.

3138. I ask for this reason, that Mr. Nelson mentioned that many inmates were sent there by their husbands, who instructed the superintendent to keep them there, and not let them come back to them at all events. These women when they went out occasionally got drunk, and were occasionally sent to the Police Office, and came back again?—I have had people who have got into the Police Office and been brought back again; and I have a great many people thoroughly sober and reformed who were like that, and whom I can trust to go out whenever they please, and to come back again perfectly sober.

3139. How many inebriates will you have among the women?—I would say altogether there are 50 who came into the House as inebriates out of about 200. I should say that one-half of those are thoroughly reformed, and living there from choice.

3140. How long have the longest of that reformed lot been living with you?—Some as long as I have been in the place; nearly ten years. I call them reclaimed.

3141. That would leave you with acute inebriates to the number of about 25?—Perhaps between 12 and 24. Of course there are some there that I could never hope to reform.

3142. How long would you keep one of those inebriates in before letting her out?—I should say two years at the very least, to make a cure of a thorough inebriate; that is if his or her brains were not drunk away before they came in, which unfortunately they often are.

3143. You do not, as a matter of fact, keep them in for two years?—Oh no; I let them out after two months.

3144. Do you let them out in charge of any one?—I let them out on their own parole of honour that they won't taste drink. I generally try them first on Sundays. I let them out on Sundays frequently. I do not allow any out on Saturdays, because it is a drunken day.

3145. Have they any money?—Oh yes. And they earn money by their work—sewing, knitting, &c.

3146. I was going to ask you about employment. You keep them employed as much as you can?—The destitutes work for the House, the others for their own hand.

3147. I suppose you like the inebriates all to work?—They are better working than brooding about doing nothing.

3148. You say they work for their own hand. Do they work in concert, and directed by the institution, or does each one simply do a bit of sewing or knitting, and so on?—They make work in concert among themselves. I know there is a trade of cap-making. One woman does borders, another the centre, another does hemming. There are specialties amongst them, and they send out their caps—they are female caps—to big shops in town; Small's and the like. When they get the price of these they make a division of the earnings among themselves according to the nature and degree of their work. That is one style of industry that is carried on.

3149. But you don't have any supervision of that?—Nothing to do with it; but I encourage them to go in for it. There is stocking-knitting and setmet-knitting, and there is dressmaking. There are some very good dressmakers among them.

3150. Do you do any laundry-work?—We do not take in public laundry-work. We have enough of our own: we have about 300 people to wash for.

3151. The laundry-work is done by people who are not inebriates?—By the poor. And we give them a small remuneration—perhaps to the extent of 2s. 6d. a month, or 3s. 6d., as a rule; and if they are going away to a situation we help them with a little clothing or the like to give them a start.

3152. So that during their sojourn at Queensberry House they simply make use of you as a regulated lodging-house? They earn what money they can for themselves, and you, as a charitable institution, assist them to make a new start?—That is the destitute people. We don't assist the boarders.

3153. How do the boarders pay?—Their people pay for them or they pay themselves. Many of them have small annuities. Some have money from the Patriotic Fund—soldiers' widows.

3154. We have been told that habitual drunkards are very often apt to consider themselves cured, when they are not so strong in their resolution as they may think, and that they want to get out of every place—against the conduct of which no suspicion would be raised—lunatic asylums and the like—long before they are able to be brought face to face with temptation. Do you often find the same thing?—I often find them say that they have no right to be there, and when they go away they go all wrong and come back again.

3155. I suppose wives in that condition would wish to go back to their husbands and families?—Yes. We have not so many wives in just now. I find that the greatest number of people of the female sex there are widows—widows who generally go wrong when their husbands die, who cannot contain themselves, who give way to drink, and whose sons and daughters bring them in.

3156. Mr. Nelson mentioned a strong form of compulsion that was exercised upon the married inmates—that the husbands who put them in to get rid of them were very apt unceremoniously to kick them downstairs. Does that accord with your experience?—I know this, that in many cases when drunk men bring their wives there, I do not take them in. This also I do know, that a great many men, if they got leave, would bring their wives in there to get rid of them. Those I do not accept; because if a man wants his wife to do what is right and proper, he should do that himself to begin with.

3157. Suppose he wishes his wife removed?—If the man is a good man, and he wants his home peaceable and quiet, and is desirous of placing her with us, and she admits that she is in the wrong, I take her in. If the man is a drunkard, I refuse to take his wife, for the reason that he would just treat her again in the same way.

3158. It is not very easy to discriminate these cases?—In a very short time I find out. If I find that a man wishes to get rid of her, I immediately send her to the poorhouse, where she is under legal authority.

3159. In the course of your experience have you had any inmates who have gone off, returned to their friends, and come back to you with evidence that they had met with a warm reception—in the shape of black eyes and things of that sort?—No sir; because the people who have left me have always been taken away by their friends. But I have numbers of people—ladies and gentlemen—who have come back to me in friendliness when they come to Edinburgh from the country or from other towns, to see their old friends, and to show me how well they have done since they left.

3160. Have you any complaints from the sober and the pensioner class of your inmates as to the effects of association with these inmates?—No; because I have them so placed in the wards as to give, I think, two superior wards for better-class people.

3161. That is for non-inebriates?—Yes. Then I have one, an intermediate, and I keep the pensioners by themselves as much as possible.

3162. What are your hours?—From ten in the morning until nine at night. We finally lock up the House at ten. Their is no rule as to their taking their meals with us. If they wish for leave I give them it. If they absent themselves without leave I treat it as an offence, and I shut them up for a month. If they won't be shut up, I shut them out. They have the full run of the barrack square. They are just confined to barracks, to use an army phrase.

3163. Have you anything analogous to the sentry?—We have a man at the gate, and their names are on the gate.

3164. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What do you think of outdoor employment for inebriates?—I think outdoor employment would be very good if they were under supervision.

3165. Light labour?—Light or any labour that they could be made to do.

3166. Do you believe that these nostrums, said to contain chloride of gold, &c., have any influence in checking the drink crave?—No.

3167. What do you think about these things?—I believe there is only one cure for drunkenness, and that is to stop the supply. The reformation must proceed from the party themselves, helped by good advice and object lessons, on the principle that you may take a horse to the water but you cannot make him drink.

3168. Have you formed any idea as to the restriction that should be placed on the vendor of liquor and the pawnbroker?—I think if the liquor shops were closed the pawnshops would close with them. The one is the counterpart or the father of the other.

3169. Would you apply any restrictions upon these if the person had been certified to be an habitual drunkard?—I would abolish liquor shops altogether.

3170. Seeing we cannot abolish them?—Whilst they are there the Upas tree of intemperance will remain. The common people will not control themselves.

3171. Could you not protect the victim of intemperance to some extent from the liquor seller and the pawnbroker?—Yes; by putting a sentry on the door of the public-house and keeping him out.

3172. (By Miss Stevenson.) You spoke of the regulations in regard to the ladies who were boarded in Queensberry Lodge. Do they sign any agreement that they are willing to stay there when they come in?—If their friends wish them to do so they may, but I do not require it.

3173. Do you read over to them the rules of the institution, and take them in on condition that they know the rules?—They are always sent to the parties who apply for admission before they come.

3174. These are the friends of the parties, but do the ladies themselves know under what conditions they are living?—They should know; they generally know.

3175. But do you not, as the governor of the institution, make a point of seeing that they know what the rules are that they submit to in coming in there?—There are no rules except that of total restraint from drink.

3176. There are rules as to exit and entrance?—They know that they won't be allowed out. They know that perfectly well; they are told so. They are treated in every way as if they were in a hydropathic or a hotel.

3177. You say, that in order to prevent the introduction of any intoxicants into the Lodge, you search the friends. By what authority do you do that? If a friend came to see a mother or a sister in the Lodge, and they refused to be searched?—If I suspected it I would ask if they had any liquor. If they gave me their word of honour, I should be satisfied. If I suspected that they were shady people and likely to bring in liquor, I would have them searched by the lady superintendent, and if I found any drink, I would put them out straight off.

3178. By what authority?—My own; simply as governor of the institution.

3179. You say that a number of the women there do work for profit?—Yes.

3180. I understand that you have your sewing-hall under the management of a superintendent, where work is done for the benefit of the institution?—Yes, that is so.

3181. Do the women there get any proportion of their earnings?—No; for the simple reason that their earnings do not keep them.

3182. How many hours do they work?—In the winter from eight till six, with two hours interval for meals, their Thursday afternoon free to themselves from one o'clock, and their Saturday afternoon from four o'clock. On Saturdays I do not light any gas in the winter evenings.

3183. They must have light somewhere?—They have light in their rooms. They come to their work in the winter after breakfast, in summer at seven. They work until twelve, when they have an interval for twenty minutes, they get from two till three for dinner, and they work then from three till six—with the exception of Thursdays and Saturdays.

3184. The proceeds of the work done in this department are £120?—On an average there are between 30 and 40 women. They have to be fed and clothed out of that sum.

3185. I understand that in the House of Refuge you take in destitute people for their meals—what you call casuals?—At night at eight o'clock, we take in 20 men and 20 women. Women with children we give a preference to. Many of these have half-a-dozen little ones at their heels, and they could not tell you who their fathers are. We give them porridge and milk and a scone, and we give them breakfast. We do not require any work from them, and we keep them on Sunday. If the men will work I make them work, but many of them are too lazy to work. I take in as many as I can to the extent of 40. Old men and lads I give a preference to.

3186. Do you find that those class of people belong to Edinburgh, or are they people on tramp?—I am sorry to say that many of the men are short-service soldiers. The short-service system is at present productive of a great many tramps and vagrants. In our two casual wards we have about 40 tramps a night. There are generally from 8 to 12 children among the women.

3187. During the past year there have been 13,181 persons sheltered and relieved?—Yes, about that.

3188. The nightly average of inmates being about 38?—Yes. Then we feed a multitude of people during the day for a penny a meal, and we feed poor children for nothing, to the extent of 100. We also feed a considerable number of children at a penny a meal.

3189. (By the Chairman.) I see you say you have 25 persons suffering under incurable disease?—We have an hospital with 54 patients in it. They pay 8s. per week. They have two attendants in each ward, with fires, medical attendance, medicine, and all that. It does not pay us; but it pays the people to come there.

Major M'Cartney.

22 Nov. 18

3190. Who is the doctor?—Dr. William Russell.

3191. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Have you many children in the Refuge?—We don't take them, except at night.

3192. Do you ever take children in the Lodge?—Sometimes; when they are children at the breast, or when the mother wishes to bring them. We have a child there now.

3193. Do you ever take them at such an age that they require education?—If they do, I send them to school. I have a child at the present time with its mother whom I send to Moray House School.

3194. You mentioned what work you had for the women; what sort of work can you give to the men?—I make the men do all kinds of work in the place. I make them clean. I utilise their trades as far as I can—slaters, painters, plumbers, joiners, and so on—that is, if they will work. If they won't work, I won't feed them, and I send them about their business.

3195. Have you any gardener?—I have a gardener; also a destitute man.

3196. Do you employ many of your men upon garden work?—We find one or two quite sufficient. There are about three acres of ground: it does not require a great deal.

3197. You have inebriates sometimes who are quite destitute. Do you ever take them in without payment from anybody?—Yes; but I make them work.

3198. Do you think you lose much upon those inmates?—We don't gain anything by them. The place could not be maintained as it is if it were not for public contributions. It is a charity.

3199. Do you think their work represents anything like a fair equivalent for their board?—No; it does not half pay their board.

3200. You mentioned that you took in 40 people every night?—Yes.

3201. Do you find that that exhausts the supply, or have you a competition to get in?—Sometimes there is competition. I do not take in any person more than three times in the month; because if we did not have a rule of that kind we should have the same class in night after night. We have the same class of people presenting themselves very often—what you would call 'loafers.'

3202. What might be the greatest number that might apply on one night?—I have seen as many as 50 apply in a night; and I may say that although perhaps I was transgressing the rules of sanitation, I have, on a very cold, wet, frosty, or snowy night, told the people that they might come in and lie on the floor, if they preferred that to lying outside. I have taken in as many as 50 on a frosty night.

3203. Is it the case that practically you take in all who apply?—I cannot take in all, occasionally. I generally take in all the women. I never turn a woman away from the door if I can help it.

3204. Do you take in very nearly all the men that apply?—Probably two-thirds or three-fourths.

3205. You mentioned that you sometimes search the people who come in to see the patients. Have you any power of enforcing that, except just telling them that they won't get in if they do not submit?—That is all. I would never search respectable persons who brought in their people there for the sake of being cured. But sometimes shady companions come to see people there, and if I have a doubt about them, and if it be a woman, I ask her to submit to be searched by the female searcher. If they refuse, then I say, 'You can't go in.'

3206. (By Col. McHardy.) Children are sometimes sent to you from the Police Court—those who are brought before a magistrate under the Industrial Schools Act. Are girls occasionally sent to the House of Refuge until an Industrial School is provided for them?—Yes; the Police Commission give us £50 a year to take in these cases and provide for them temporarily. It used to be £80.

3207. How many cases in a year?—It is difficult to say. Sometimes the police pick up people on the streets, waifs and such like, and bring them to me. Major M'Cartney. If the House is open I take them in.

3208. Are cases of people picked up on the street covered by this £50?—I daresay it does cover it.

3209. How many girls would you have brought to you in the year, until an Industrial School for them is settled?—Not many of that kind. But when they do come, they generally stay for a week or a fortnight. Perhaps to the extent of 30 in the year; perhaps 2 or 3 per month. I take in boys in the same way until they are sent to Reformatories.

3210. You have had considerable experience of men and women afflicted with drunkenness?—Yes; I think I have.

3211. And not only those who have behaved themselves and kept clear of the police, but also those who have been offenders and come under the notice of the police?—Yes.

3212. From your experience of that class of offenders who have been apprehended and convicted for disorder, accompanied by drunkenness, have you thought of any better treatment than the present one of sending them to jail for short periods frequently?—I do not think that it is advisable to send them to jail altogether. I would employ them in a useful way for the good of the community—place them under police supervision or any other supervision, and make them work and do their punishment in that way for the good of the community—exposing them if possible.

3213. Working outside do you mean?—Working outside; and shutting them up at night either in poor-houses or prisons.

3214. How would you deal with persons convicted frequently of vagrancy and begging?—I would make these people criminals; I would put them in a penitentiary or a house of industry, and I would make them work for their living under Government supervision.

3215. How long would you keep them?—From one to two years according to the nature of their offence.

3216. I think you said two years would be necessary to reclaim people who had become habitual drunkards?—Yes; to starve the drink crave out of the system I think it would take fully two years.

3217. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think that you could do more effectual work at your institution if you had compulsory powers?—I do not think so. I do not think that in a private institution, worked as ours is by moral suasion and kindness, I could do any more good than we are doing there; because if people won't reform you can't reform them. You can do nothing with incorrigibles but make criminals of them, and our institution would be no place for them.

3218. I think you have said that the only chance of reclaiming those people is to keep drunk absolutely from them?—Totally.

3219. Would not compulsion come in, in keeping them away from drink?—I think myself that a drunkard should be deprived of his liberty.

3220. You have only a modified moral compulsion which practically compels people to stay with you?—I have no other force but my own force of character to compel them.

3221. You have found that pretty effectual?—Yes, I have. But I may tell you that force of character has no effect upon a man when he is drunk. He is the worst kind of lunatic. You cannot influence him in any way unless he is sober. You can quell a lunatic but not a drunkard.

3222. But suppose your successor were a man of less force of character, would you require compulsion?—I do not know that I have great force of character, but I manage to deal with those people with very little trouble. Any man with ordinary firmness and kindness could I think.

3223. Then you are satisfied with the results of your institution as a whole?—Yes, quite so.

3224. Is it your opinion that you could cure almost any case of confirmed inebriety by a detention of two years?—No; it is not. Because an inebriate is not like any ordinary being. If he is two years sober and anything goes wrong with him when he is free, he is liable to lose his balance, to go off his head, and to take to drink again; but the chances are that he may keep sober.

Major
M'Cartney.

22 Nov. 1894.

3225. Would you say that your chances were better if you got the case earlier?—Yes; and that is where people fail. They do not bring in their cases until they are too far gone. In many cases they do not bring them in until they have drunk their brains away. I find that husbands screen their wives, and their friends do not like to let it be known.

3226. Do you follow up your cases to find their future career?—Yes; and I invariably find, in most cases, that they are doing well. I have met people on my holidays who have been delighted to meet me, and have spoken of themselves as being perfectly cured.

3227. I observe you treat the male and female patients with different discipline in the matter of going out?—Females in the House are allowed to go out by themselves.

3228. You said you had no faith in nostrums. Has your medical attendant any medical treatment that he pursues beyond the potass-water and buttermilk?—He might perhaps administer bromide of potassium to an inebriate, just to settle him, until he got a night's sleep or so.

3229. Do many medical men give doses of cayenne pepper, or something of that kind?—Dr. Russell does not. Like myself he believes in knocking the thing right off. He sometimes administers a little brandy when the patient is infirm, or the action of the heart is weak; but that is all.

3230. Do you find no cases of delirium tremens from sudden knocking off?—Unless they are when they come in. I do not treat them. I send them to No. 6 ward in the Infirmary. I may say that drugs are more difficult to deal with than drink.

3231. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) What are the youngest of your inebriates?—I have a girl in the House now not 20 years of age.

3232. Is she a confirmed drunkard?—I would not like to say that; because she was taken in time. Her father and her brother brought her in. She is there quite voluntarily and quite happy, working and sewing away.

3233. Did you inquire as to her antecedents?—I did not. Her mother is dead, and getting too much opportunity of knocking about, she afterwards got in with bad associates. It is largely women that lead each other away.

3234. Did she lead a bad life before she came in?—No, as far as I know.

3235. Were her people respectable?—Her father is respectable, and her brother thoroughly respectable. She is a nice-looking girl.

3236. How long has she been with you?—Now about three months, and perfectly content to remain. But in most cases I inquire into the antecedents, and I find that either the father or the mother was a drunkard, and that it is hereditary.

3237. That is in a large percentage of cases?—Yes.

3238. Do you make any inquiry into the character of the applicants for admission?—Yes; the people who apply for admission to the Lodge are generally people of means and of substance, and of respectability.

3239. As to the House?—I take a great many people in to take them off the streets, and I try to get situations for them. Sometimes I send them to the country, and keep them until they get something to do.

3240. Do they often come from the streets?—I do not know. Sometimes country girls find their way into Edinburgh, and some kind person brings them to me, and I take them in. To-morrow there is a nice young girl going away to a place in the country.

3241. There are destitute people who do not pay?—Yes.

3242. Would you refuse a girl whose previous character had been immoral?—Not if she wished to reform.

3243. Do you ever find that the other inmates have any objection to associate with them?—No. If a girl tells me that she has gone wrong, I tell her to keep it to herself, and to say nothing to the others.

3244. (By the Chairman.) I asked you about the number of lunatics that had been certified from the Lodge, and you mentioned three?—But I have sent a great many more from the House.

3245. That is precisely what I wished to ask you. Can you give me any number in regard to the House?—I suppose since I have been there I have sent probably a dozen people to Morningside Asylum—people who developed insanity after they came.

3246. What class do they belong to?—Inebriate boarders. I would say they were alcoholic lunatics.

3247. Do they often get delirium tremens in the House?—No, I have never known them to get delirium tremens in the House, but I have known them to come in in delirium tremens, and when I see that I send them at once to No. 6 ward in the Infirmary. We have no means of strapping them down.

3248. With regard to the Refuge, where you have 40 people every night, does that in Edinburgh come within the definition of a common lodging-house, and is it inspected?—No; it is just a shelter for the destitute. There is a policeman there every night. I asked a policeman in order that he might see if there were any delinquents that the police might want; and I find that the presence of a policeman maintains order when they are being selected.

3249. I merely ask because there are certain provisions as to the regulation of lodging-houses in certain towns?—The place is open to supervision from daylight to dark to any to come to see. Anybody can come and see.

3250. You spoke about a sewing-room. How many have you there?—Between 30 and 40.

3251. Does that come under the Factory Acts?—No; it is just part of the charity.

3252. That is quite true; but it is not inspected, and you do not comply with the provisions of the Factory Acts as to putting up notices and so on?—No.

3253. You do not regulate the hours of labour according to the Act?—To many of those who cannot sew we give the knitting of tablecloths, &c. It is just to keep them employed.

3254. You mentioned about boys sent to you to be kept until they are sent to a Reformatory. Many of these boys are very obstinate and stubborn to deal with?—They are troublesome and tricky, and they will escape if they can.

3255. You have no powers?—No, but they are only there for a short time, until they get into the Mars Training Ship or an Industrial School. Sometimes their parents demand them in spite of the magistrates and the police.

3256. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Are you quite certain that you have no authority to keep them. Are you not aware that under section 19 of the Industrial Schools Act, a magistrate can send them to you for two or three days?—Yes, he does. And I never let them go without consulting a magistrate.

3257. I have been looking over the suggestions of a scheme which you have submitted. You would work habitual petty offenders in a special garb in gangs, under gangers, on public roads, streets, gardens, docks, &c., or in any manner in which they might be usefully employed for the public good for longer or shorter periods, and you suggest that the jails or poorhouses might be utilised to house them at night, and on Sundays when not at work. You suggest that they should have a reasonable plain diet of wholesome food, and that any among them who might refuse to work should be placed in solitary cells or apartments, on one pound of bread daily, with as much water as they might drink, until starved into submission?—That is exactly what my directors disapprove. That is purely my own idea. In suggesting these things I speak from my military experience.

3258. You suggest also that while at work, or in their dormitories, should they offer violence to a ganger or other person placed over them they should receive corporal chastisement—from 12 to 24 lashes on the bare back with a cat-o'-nine-tails well laid on?—I saw that when I was on duty in a penitentiary in Canada. It had a splendid effect. They never committed themselves again. I may mention farther that in Canada vagrants are made criminals, and are made to work; either that, or they deport them out of the country.

3259. Do you think dipsomaniacs to whom there comes the lunatic asylum, should be treated in a somewhat similar way?—That is my opinion.

3260. If they have the means they should be made to pay for their maintenance, if not, they should be treated as criminals and made to work for their living, although their work would not support them?—I say criminals, because I think it is a criminal offence for a person to get drunk. They do things when drunk that they would not do when sober. I consider drunkenness is no excuse for crime.

3261. You are in favour of a heavy penalty for drunkenness accompanied by incapacity or disorderly conduct. You would fine them something under £1, and if the fine was not forthcoming, you would make the man or woman do scavenging or charring work?—Yes; I think our punishments are far too light for criminal offences of that kind.

3262. You would have the culprits wear uniform, and be employed under gangers, and housed in jail or some other public building, in which they would be kept under lock and key?—Yes.

3263. You would have them work from six to six, either by night or day as exigencies might require, with an hour's interval for meals?—I would make them do street work at night.

3264. You would deal with breaches of the peace and petty assaults on the lines of habitual petty offenders, only with more vigour?—The oftener a man had committed himself the more severely he should be punished.

3265. You think that prostitutes or women who go about the country as tramps, vagrants, &c., propagating their species with indiscriminate men, should be shut up in houses of correction, or located on islands where there are no male inhabitants except married officials, and be made to work for their living at either indoor or outdoor labour; and that they should be housed, clothed, and fed at the public expense, and made to work in return for the public good?—I say that from what I see takes place. I have in my mind a young woman under 30 years of age, with five little children at her feet—she could not tell the name of the father of one of them—tramping about the country, propagating their species. It is a common thing.

3266. Vagrants you would treat on the lines of habitual petty offenders, but with more stringency?—Yes.

3267. You have mentioned Canada. You were in Canada?—I was in the army in Canada—in Kingston, where there was a large penitentiary.

3268. You had no position there?—No, except when I was on duty we had to guard it when we had Fenians Major McCartney.

22 Nov. 1894.

3269. You speak of how they treat habitual offenders there?—They make them convicts; make them work; and hire them out to contractors under prison supervision.

3270. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Does that hiring go on now?—Yes.

3271. (By the Chairman.) It is common all over Canada?—They also put them down mines. There were no mines then, but they employed them in quarries.

3272. Don't you think the miners might have something to say as to that?—It would bring the miners to their senses.

3273. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You said you had no desire for compulsory powers. How are you going to deal with obstinate and refractory drunkards?—Put them in jail and make them work there. If you want to stop drunkards you must stop the manufacture of drink.

3274. Your Home is a voluntary one, and you have no desire for compulsory powers?—No.

3275. But I suppose you could conceive of Homes where compulsory powers would be necessary?—They are necessary in a prison.

3276. Oh yes. Never mind the prison. I am speaking of Homes for inebriety where the drunkard class would be confined against their will?—You might make it an inebriate asylum, and put it under authority the same as a lunatic asylum—put it in the same position exactly.

3277. Are those vagrants and destitute people that you take in for a night at a time, people who are domiciled in Edinburgh as a rule, or are they tramps passing through the town?—In some cases domiciled; in some cases tramps.

3278. What proportion are tramps?—I should say about half.

3279. But you only take them in three times in the month?—Men as a rule, but I never refuse a woman. I have never turned out a woman except she was drunk. They are, as a rule, under or about the twenty.

3280. (By the Chairman.) I see you have a strong objection to Government interference with private or social enterprises of any kind?—Perhaps I might modify that, and say I object to Government interference in private affairs.

3281. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you admit that like every public institution, hospital, &c., in this country, you are liable to public inspection?—To the civil authorities.

3282. Which may be the municipality or the Government?—Whichever the Government require. When I allude to Government interference, I speak from my army recollections of trouble with the War Office. If I were under Government I could not get a broom-head without a Court of Inquiry. [Witness then withdrew.]

THE REV. H. MACKENZIE CAMPBELL, M.A., Chaplain, H.M. Prison, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Rev. H.
Mackenzie
Campbell.

3283. (By the Chairman.) You are chaplain to the prison here?—Yes.

3284. How long have you held that office?—On the month of May I shall have had it for three years.

3285. Have you been connected with any other prison?—I have not.

3286. Will you state what is the daily population of the prison?—The daily population is on an average about 290. It is 306 at the present moment.

3287. You have both female and male prisoners?—We have. The proportion of males is very much higher.

3288. A very large proportion of the inhabitants are drunkards?—A large proportion.

3289. Do you mean by that that they are regular habitual drunkards, or simply that they combine drunkenness with their other evil courses?—Many combine drunkenness with their other evil courses, and many are drunkards pure and simple—a considerable number. I should say that of 800 male habituels 200 are to a great extent drunkards, though that follows perhaps as a result of their condition.

3290. Will you please explain?—I mean that drunkenness follows with many other vices. They are habituels probably by birth and upbringing; and drunkenness is added on among the other things.

3291. There are about 250 females?—250, of whom I compute that 150 are drunkards.

3292. That gives you a total of 550 habitual criminals?—As expressed between the periods of 31st March 1893 and 31st March 1894. I mean habitual offenders.

3293. Petty offenders such as come within our remit?—Precisely.

Rev. H.
Mackenzie
Campbell.

22 Nov. 1894.

3294. The total number of habituels in Edinburgh you put down at 550?—About 550. And of these 550 I put down 350 as drunkards.

3295. What do you mean by habituels of habitude?—By habituels of habitude I would indicate that their birth—their surroundings I mean—has been unfortunate; that their parents have not shown them the example that one might desire; that as they grew up they had no regular form of education; that they were not disciplined to live in such a fashion as would make them other than habituels.

3296. Of the remainder you say that a small number are neurotic habituels, victims of a physiological condition. Would you explain that?—That in connection with the brain of such an individual there is a neurosis pointing to a particular line of action, associated to a certain extent with one who might be insane, with that same condition, though not insane—still that there is a neurosis pointing to a particular line of action which the patient, the sufferer, cannot readily combat.

3297. Do you find that many of these habituels are weak-minded?—I find that what is for their own interest they would neglect, rather than fail in the particular thing that seems to lie as a curse upon them.

3298. You do not consider the present method of dealing with these as at all satisfactory?—The present method is very perfect so far as it goes; but I daresay that since there are two distinct classes—the habituels of habitude, and the neurotic—a certain classification might assist the matter.

3299. In prison?—In prison.

3299A. How would you propose to carry out that classification—by individual examination?—By individual examination.

3300. You propose to adopt the special method of treatment to each individual class?—Yes; I think there are only the two classes.

3301. What difference of treatment would you consider necessary?—For habituels of habitude, I should of course eliminate, as the prison always does, the particular environment that they have been brought up in, the particular example that has always been before their eyes. To that I would add a regular form of education in all that they lack. There is first of all discipline which they already have. Then there is encouragement towards labour; there is definite purpose; there is some definite aim that might be set before them; some rational result that might be aimed at.

3302. The present system of prison labour is calculated to carry out your views?—To a great extent it is.

3303. In Edinburgh they have the same form of labour as in other prisons?—Picking oakum, teasing hair, mat-making, &c.

3304. Do you consider that that tends to educate their industrial instincts?—To a very great extent it does.

3305. Do you consider it is equally educational to employment in trades which, I suppose, you also have in Edinburgh prison?—Well, if definite and distinct trades were introduced it might be better, because I daresay the different kinds of employment that are at present in operation in the prison are forms of labour that, after release, there is no possibility of the man performing outside.

3306. As to the neurotic habitual, you say that scientific treatment would also be necessary, as these are scientifically set apart?—Yes.

3307. What do you consider?—That, I am afraid, I cannot answer. In some of these creatures, men and women both, undoubtedly a great portion of the brain is cerebellum—it is evident even by outward examination. The fact is that, to put it broadly, the world would need to supply the cerebrum which they lack. I know that cannot be done, but I think that certain things might be done to improve their mental condition.

3308. In corroboration of this statement you propose to give us certain illustrative examples?—I have brought a few here. As a neurotic individual I might instance the case of —. This man, first of all, committed a small forgery—a thing that was almost certain to ruin his entire life—and he did it just within four months of the completion of his law apprenticeship, when he had every prospect of entering into the tolerably fair business where he had been.

3309. Did he do it under any special circumstances?—The circumstances were certain to be found out in a very short period. Then this man got into prison and did nine months afterwards. I wrote to a friend in Glasgow, who, on his release, took him in to enable him to complete his indenture. There he stole. The whole theft amounted to the most paltry sum, and thus he ruined himself remorselessly, and apparently without any reason.

3310. What did he get for that?—Six months.

3311. What is his subsequent career?—He has disappeared just now. I think that the moral nature here was totally submerged. I have no doubt that upon this particular point this man was mad.

3312. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Did he drink?—Absolutely he did not drink.

3313. (By the Chairman.) Another case is that of a lad —, a very painful case belonging to a remarkably nice family. His father is a minister, and he is very well connected in every way. He is one of a family of six who have all done exceedingly well, and he himself is the only one who has gone astray. He was brought into prison on a charge of forgery. He came out of prison and promised amendment. I got him into a shop in George Street, and the lad evidently determined to do well. He was brought up to St. Giles during Assembly time, and it was observed that a whole lot of money was pilfered in small sums. This boy, however, had money; his parents have money. He was perfectly comfortable, and it was unnecessary that he should steal in this way. Still he persisted in this course, and I was asked by the gentleman into whose employment I had got him to come and speak to him. I saw him, warned him, threatened him. Still money disappeared, and this time the theft was clearly proved. I asked his employer to take no further proceedings. He agreed to this, but he went to an employer whom the lad had had before, and he told precisely the same story—that he pilfered little articles really without any necessity whatsoever.

3314. You have not any subsequent information?—I have traced really four distinct cases of theft, for which he would certainly have got sentences accumulating altogether to a year and a half.

3315. You told us that you had asked his employer not to report him to the authorities, in order to avoid his being punished. Did you think that the absence of punishment was calculated to produce his reformation?—No, I did not; but I was sorry for his mother, and I daresay you will respect the feeling. I think for example's sake he ought to have been punished.

3316. Do you think it would have been better for himself if he had been punished?—I think he was a neurotic individual, and that it might not have done any good. Another clear case is—. At the age of 16 he was found guilty of criminal assault and received sentence of three months. Immediately on liberation he repeated the offence and got a sentence of five years' penal servitude. Directly he was liberated he has done the same thing; and he is in prison for a couple of years now. Apart, however, from this particular line of action he is a very decent fellow—in prison a good worker and a thoroughly good prisoner; but I am perfectly certain that on his release this neurotic condition will still pursue him. Another case is —. So closely does the neurotic condition approach to the insane condition in this man that he has been sent, either to the Criminal Department at Perth, or to Morningside Asylum proper. So closely does the one condition approach the other that it is difficult to distinguish them.

3317. What is his line?—He goes to lodgings upon Friday night, and leaves on Monday morning for his box, which he never finds; swindling landladies.

3318. It would appear that the first two cases would come under what is sometimes pled of respectable people without apparent motive for theft—Kleptomania; but you appear to carry out the theory further, and think that wherever you have a criminal confining himself to one particular line, and repeating the offences in that line again and again, notwithstanding punishment and the probability of being again punished for these offences, this is due to a sort of moral twist—that he is a quasi maniac?—I think so. That is when the commission of the action is known to bring no gain.

3319. But that man who swindles landladies gets three days' lodgings, and a chance of getting them?—But if you take into consideration the general conversation of the man, there is a lowness of tone, an unhealthiness of tone about him.

3320. Does he give you any explanation of his motive, or have you ever tried to get one?—I have tried, but very often he is incoherent.

3321. His incoherence would seem to indicate some mental defect. But if insanity were pleaded in such a case I suppose the result would be that such a man would be sent to a lunatic asylum, to be detained there during Her Majesty's pleasure, which would be very much more severe than anything he would be likely to get for a petty offence of that kind?—Precisely.

3322. You say he has been in a lunatic asylum. Did he think it did him any more good than an ordinary prison?—No.

3323. Have you any other case?—There is a man —, who has been in prison for the last 12 or 13 years almost continually. My impression of him is that he cannot on liberation do better than he has hitherto done. That is my distinct impression. The very appearance of the man, the aspect of his head, would show you that this man cannot do better than now. Only a couple of days ago he said to me that he would be perfectly willing to remain in prison all his life provided he got a pipe. He certainly is the best worker in the prison.

3324. What is his line?—A fighter; a sort of bully. He fights and of course drinks. He likes to fight—sober or drunk.

3325. Does he ever try to indulge in that amusement in prison?—No; he is under the power of discipline.

3326. What does he work at?—Hemp-teasing generally, and sack-sewing.

3327. Has he ever ventured to assault a warder?—He has: I remember one case. He is generally abusive if anything does happen.

3328. Abusiveness is not encouraged in prison?—It is not.

3329. Has he on that occasion been punished? Petty offences would be punished by the governor?—By the governor.

3330. Now, take a case of that sort. Supposing he had been willing, getting his pipe, to remain in a sort of Reformatory, he might find things more conducive to indulgence in his taste there than in prison?—There is not the least doubt that for a man of that type, and all men of that type, rigid discipline is absolutely essential.

3331. Are there any other cases?—There is one case, that of a man—. He has had four sentences, and he is an intellectual man, and an exceedingly clever man, who might do remarkably well, but who has persistently and on every occasion thrown himself away.

3332. What is his line?—Fraud.

3332A. Any particular form of fraud?—No; the usual form of fraud. He goes and gets money under false pretences, and is certain to be discovered. He is not an old man, and he really could do remarkably well in many ways. I tried to get him sent to America, but owing to the United States Law we could not do it just as we wanted. I thought a new country might have some effect upon him. I think he is a neurotic. I think he would do precisely again as now. These are all the neurotic cases I have the habituals of habitude.

3333. Could you give us one or two good chronic specimens?—One is a man —. His whole environment has been such as to create a habitual of habitude.

I have seen his mother, and he is always more or less under the influence of liquor.

3334. Do you know anything of her history—whether she was drunken at the time of his birth and childhood?—I understand she was.

3335. What is the number of his convictions?—Seventeen.

3336. What is his line?—He has really got all forms of convictions—theft, drunkenness, assault. I have just taken the general drunkenness and assault, but he has got theft, and has run a very narrow riak of penal servitude this last time.

3337. What is your idea of penal servitude as a means of dealing with people of that sort? Does that give them a caution?—There is a certain class with whom it acts in the way of a deterrent. Take the case of that man —. The last time he came in—it was his eighteenth conviction—he lay grovelling almost on the floor of his cell. It was the grate out of the room he lived in that he stole, and sold for 9d. He said if he got off penal servitude this time he was perfectly certain he would never enter the prison again as long as he lived. He has not been back since; but that is only a very few weeks ago.

3338. How long has he been out now?—About seven weeks.

3339. But I suppose you do not attach a great deal to that?—I am afraid he will come back again.

3340. I suppose a man like that when drunk will forego all his good intentions?—Yes. Then there is the case of —. He is a very distinct habitual of habitude. He is a son of the Queen of the Gipsies, Queen Faa. He is an habitual, and I do not think any possible system would reform him. He is a lazy rascal. I have got him repeatedly into Croall's stables. He has always remained for a very short time and then gone away.

3341. What has he gone in for?—For drunkenness and vagrancy generally.

3342. Was the Queen of the Gipsies notorious for drunkenness?—Not notorious; but for the general form of life, the nomadic life the gipsies lead, and not very serious labour; he is thoroughly lazy.

3343. Of course laziness is not a crime?—No; but of course with all these habituals it is one of the strongest adjuncts.

3344. Have you any good case of hundreds of convictions?—We have had numbers. I think there is one of 320 on the female list.

3345. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Jane Kirk?—Yes.

3346. Have you heard of her lately?—I have not heard of her lately.

3347. (By the Chairman.) Not since she was taken in hand and sent north?—No. Here is one —, with 103 convictions; and his condition is, I should not say perhaps neurotic, but he certainly is in an imbecile condition, and is physically weak. He is a blind man who just gets drunk and is brought up as often as he gets drunk.

3348. I believe your sentences for drunkenness are very short in Edinburgh?—14 days and up to 30.

3349. Does it run up to that?—I think it often runs up to that.

3350. Have you often had that blind man in for that length of time?—Yes, I think so. I think he has done 30 days.

3351. You say here that the method adopted in Canton Neuchatel, Switzerland, is worthy of notice. Is that with respect to the treatment of habituals of habitude, or neurotic habituals?—Habituals of habitude. My information is slight, but I will give the little I know. I believe that there it is entirely trades they are taught, and that they may be said to be sentenced for a certain period conditionally; that when the craving for drink is submerged a certain amount of freedom is granted to them; that they labour under the supervision of the police, and also under the supervision of one member of a local committee; not a legal committee, but a charitable committee to supervise their progress; and that gradually they regain their freedom with the increased advantage of knowing a trade, and their craving for drink submerged altogether.

Rev. H.

Rev. H.
Mackenzie
Campbell.

22 Nov. 1894.

3352. It is an extension of the ticket-of-leave system to ordinary business?—Yes; it is so.

3353. You have often spoken of teaching trades. Don't you think that would evoke a great deal of opposition from the members of these trades?—I am afraid it would.

3354. Well now, about vagrancy; you make the suggestion that for a repeated series of offences of vagrancy, of offences in respect of vagrancy, the Court should sentence to a poorhouse or house of detention?—For vagrancy and begging I think so.

3355. Well, that would not apply to the worst case of vagrants, because in Scotland there is no provision for the maintenance of the able-bodied poor. An able-bodied, a sturdy beggar is the worst class of vagrant?—Precisely.

3356. He is precisely the person whom the Parochial Boards would not be authorised to maintain or detain in Scotland?—Unless he is compelled to do a certain amount of work, to work at a particular trade, or whatever employment is assigned him, if certified as fit for labour.

3357. If not fit for labour, he becomes a fit subject for parochial relief, but if he is fit for labour there is no legal right to assist him from the parochial funds. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the able-bodied vagrant who could not be detained in the poorhouse?—For the able-bodied—the stalwart beggar—I think severe discipline would be necessary at any rate; and, of course, that might not be administered so effectively in the poorhouse as in the prison.

3358. What sort of sentences do they give for vagrancy here?—Tolerably long sentences—40 days for begging.

3359. What sort of beggars are the general run of beggars committed here?—Rather miserable specimens.

3360. Are many of them silly?—A good many of them.

3361. Do you think prison is a proper place for them?—I think the physically weak and the silly would be very much better in the poorhouse.

3362. Have you many prisoners in for prostitution, solicitation?—We have got, I should think, 40. I should say that reckoning upon years' convictions, there are generally about that number.

3363. Per annum?—The same women come in from year to year.

3364. That is chiefly to the prison as apart from the cells?—We only get those of the higher sentences, and these vary from five and seven to fourteen days. Five days is very common.

3365. What class of women are they? A very poor class?—Yes; miserably poor.

3366. I ask you, because we had the evidence of one magistrate, that the women who were brought before him did not appear to belong to the richer or better dressed class of prostitutes, but to the very poorest class. Is that so?—They are miserably clad as a rule. I hardly think I can recollect one case of a respectably dressed woman being brought in.

3367. It is your business to instruct them and try to improve their morals and so on, and probably they speak to you very freely. Do they make any complaint to you about their treatment at the hands of the police?—Well, I have heard them do so.

3368. In what respects?—They seem to be under the impression that if once they get into prison, and their bad name is established, they may be rearrested on very slight provocation—though I believe myself personally the charge is wrong.

3369. Have they ever made to you any charge of blackmailing against the police?—Never.

3370. We are informed that in Edinburgh they are treated with extraordinary leniency compared with some other places—that they are never arrested except for solicitation, and never arrested even for solicitation unless they have been warned on the same evening against it?—I myself have seen on the streets arrests made, and the women arrested I knew personally by their having been in prison, and I think I can honestly say they were not arrested without sufficient ground.

I have seen them warned repeatedly. Not longer than one week ago I saw two women warned in front of the Post Office. They did not take the warning, and afterwards they went along the North Bridge; and I think the policeman was certainly justified in arresting them.

3371. I ask you, because we had had complaints on that score made in Glasgow, and I wished to see if there were any complaints made by these people in Edinburgh?—Yes.

3372. Is there any suggestion that occurs to you, as explaining how it is that only those very poor and miserable women find their way into the prison?—With most, with all of course, drunkenness is also an accompaniment.

3373. But there must be a number of what you may call the more respectable class, the better dressed, the richer class, who, we are told, do not gravitate there?—I imagine that they, perhaps, have not got so thoroughly debased. Their solicitation is a more private thing, and they do not bring themselves so prominently forward before the police. I mean they are more cautious.

3374. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Possibly they do not get so drunk?—No.

3375. (By the Chairman.) I see no alternatives between drunkenness, disorderly conduct, and solicitation?—Precisely so; and it was very difficult to make out this list.

3376. When these women get out there are institutions for reclaiming them here?—There are.

3377. Do many avail themselves of them?—A good many go there.

3378. What institutions are there?—There is the Alnwickhill Home, the Magdalene Asylum, and the Grove Laundry, which has been discontinued; because they did not avail themselves of it latterly. We had 57 from the 31st March 1893, till the same date in 1894. I think 57 passed through these different institutions in one form or another; but I am sorry to say that the results were not encouraging.

3379. You get back a great number of those who do go there?—A great many have been back.

3380. After how long do you get them back?—Eighteen months as a rule.

3381. Do you mean to say that in 18 months they come back?—In that table a great many have not been in for that length of time.

3382. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I see 13 have been reclaimed?—But that is for those years. A huge number must have passed through in that time. These were really all I could get extracted. I went over the books, and wanted as many as possible in those sheets, and these were the results.

3383. May it not happen that a woman who has had experience of these Homes may try to hide herself and sink her previous history?—Well, I find that the officials associated with these Homes knew fairly well the locality to which they go. The unfortunate thing is that the great majority are here, and have passed in and out since then.

3384. Is that after a long stay?—Less or more they have had. Here is a woman with three convictions, who has only had promiscuous assistance. Take another case with 23 convictions; repeatedly in the Grove Laundry; assisted in these other Homes; in Alnwickhill received promiscuous assistance; has not recovered.

3385. But has she been any length of time with you?—I am sorry I have not got the length of time. I know the majority of them have had a fair length of time. I should think a good number of them must have had a year.

3386. Your experience has not been at all of an encouraging nature?—I am sorry to say so as to those Homes, because I had hoped it was otherwise, and my desire was that as many should be presented as I possibly could.

3387. Might it not be the case that you get the very worst under your Edinburgh system, and the most degraded only of that class in your hands?—Undoubtedly it is so.

Rev. H.
Mackenzie
Campbell.

22 Nov. 1894.

3388. And that would probably account for worse results here than elsewhere in the way of reclamation?—You mean that this class is a worse class than the corresponding class in Glasgow?

3389. I mean that in Glasgow, where they certainly do take up, I think, nearly three times as many prostitutes in proportion to the population, they reach a higher class of prostitutes, who are more desirous of reform?—That is probably so.

3390. Possibly the better results shown there are not quite contradictory of the worse results here?—That is so. These undoubtedly are an exceedingly low type of prisoners, and the women are a very much lower type than the men. It seems more hopeless work to reform a woman. Possibly on account of her keener susceptibility it is more difficult to tune to the old pitch.

3391. Your experiences generally do not appear to coincide with the returns, for instance of the Magdalen Asylum here; for, according to their statement, the number of dismissed, absconded, lapsed, is only down at 18 per cent., and they are more than self-supporting?—You see there occurs a period of release after they get out of this Home. It is then that one looks to see any benefit derived. Although they may appear perfectly clear upon that sheet, the question is, are they reclaimed? Of course, a few months after liberty they may revert to the old condition of things.

3392. You having fuller information don't you think that this information is accurate?—That may be accurate in regard to their residence in that Home. I am only reckoning the convictions over seven—not prisoners who have been with us fewer times.

3393. I suppose these people would be more or less excluded, or at all events they would not be selected in this institution. It is rather an important point that you had taken the number of reclamations from the books of this institution. If you do not credit them with being able to detect the lapsed, their information about the reclamations would probably be affected?—I have no doubt they are perfectly accurate in what they say; but in those I have dealt with I have taken seven convictions as making an habitual. I do not regard as habitual anything under seven convictions in all during life.

3394. I suppose there are a great many prostitutes who have been convicted more than seven times if the sentences are small. I suppose a 24 hours' sentence will be regarded as a previous conviction?—It will be so regarded. A prisoner having only six convictions I have not considered at all.

3395. In Edinburgh do your previous convictions mount up very much? Take these girls, have you got any note of the number of their previous convictions?—Here are all the names I have taken in connection with these Homes. They have all been above seven. Here are 34, 23, 21, 17, 36, 7, 10, 9, 16, 72, 34, 53, 30, 9, 35, 82, 39, 86, 103, 41, 108, 104.

3396. What are the ages of the 103 and the 108?—I have not got the ages here. I cannot exactly say what her age is. But the number runs up to 153. These are pronounced, absolute habituals, and for that reason I take them.

3397. My object was to see whether the very short sentences which are given here, and which would enable a woman to run up a very much bigger record than she could in a place where longer sentences were imposed, appeared to aggravate the number of convictions. Do these figures that you mention include convictions followed by committal to the cells as well as by committal to prison?—They do not include committal to the cells.

3398. You have had some experience of a class among whom there are a great number of vagrants, the gipsies?—I have visited the Caithnessshire caves where that historical race of gipsies are to be found. They are a law-abiding and peaceful people, but occasionally one drifts away from the general mass and goes into general society, becoming a pest and a plague there. Of course they are the fragments of a race, and possibly if they were in their original country they would be looked upon as satisfying the conditions of that country. Rev. H. Mackenzie.

3399. How do they live in the caves of Caithness? Campbell. What sort of caves are they? Where are they?—They are along the North Head from Wick. 22 Nov. 1894.

3400. Are there many of these gipsies?—A great number.

3401. How do they live?—They come down to the town in bodies, and they sell tinware. It is very often difficult to know how they live.

3402. When they come down to the town, do the inhabitants complain of anything going astray?—My residence was six weeks there, and I saw them repeatedly. I did not hear of anything during that time, and they seemed a peaceful set of people. I have spoken to them on the cliffs repeatedly. I know that when one isolated case came down to the town it became a pest to society generally; but while they remained in their own picked mass in the caves I do not know that they were regarded as offensive.

3403. You never heard of them descending upon isolated farmhouses and insisting upon being supplied with food?—I did not hear that.

3404. Your impression is rather favourable?—It is, rather a favourable one.

3405. Have you anything to tell us about juvenile offenders?—I think the system of committing juvenile offenders to prison before reformatory sentence, is a harmful thing, because the childish idea of a prison as a very terrible thing is utterly removed. They see the thing before them as a reality, and I venture to think that they are not so frightened if they happen to come back again. I think it is a pity that the childish idea of a prison should be abolished.

3406. I suppose a number of the children who go to prison come from homes so very squalid that the prison cell is rather an improvement?—I should imagine that; although I find that several juvenile offenders who have come in have had a fairly respectable home.

3407. Do you find that when a child gets into prison for a childish offence, he or she is apt to come back there?—I find it is so.

3408. Have you many children?—Not just now. Of course this First Offenders' Act has given an opening for many who would otherwise have come to prison. I dare say pity is taken upon a greater number of them in that fashion; and certainly within the last few months we have not had nearly so many.

3409. How many have you in just now?—There is one small boy. I think that is the only one.

3410. Have you any idea what he is in for, or what his age is?—He must be, I should think, 14 years of age. Formerly I used to remark three or four at a time. There certainly seems to be a great reduction within the last few months.

3411. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Was not the common offence soliciting the carrying of luggage in the station?—That was the general offence.

3412. (By the Chairman.) What sentences do they get?—Seven to ten, and fourteen days.

3413. In Edinburgh?—Yes.

3414. You have spoken of the First Offenders' Act. They would possibly get off under the Act; but they would be taken again, and get perhaps about seven days.

3415. They must have had more than two or three days or they would not have come into your place?—No; they might possibly come down upon six hours to our place.

3416. You do not generally get short sentences business? I understand that in Edinburgh most of the sentences under two or three days are worked out in the cells?—They are worked out in the cells when the sentences are very short.

3417. Have you had any of these luggage-solicitors?—Not recently.

3418. (By Miss Stevenson.) As to the class of women that Sir Charles has been speaking of, you believe that if they could be forcibly detained in any refuge, or in places where they could be employed suitably, there would be more chance of their reclamation than by this continual punishment and short sentences?—I think the repetition of the short sentence is not of very much value. I think that some sentence of that sort would be better.

3419. I see from your return that a great number of women went through the Grove Laundry?—A great number.

3420. That is an institution which was in connection with the Prisoners' Aid Society?—It was so.

3421. And apparently these women have been in that place two or three times?—A great majority.

3422. And find their way back to prison?—Yes.

3423. You said, I think, that nearly all those women are of a very low and a very poor class?—Exceedingly so.

3424. Have you ever had any of what might be called the more respectable, the better dressed class?—There was one girl, a girl from England, who promised me that she would return to England and abstain from the life she was leading. She seemed to belong to a class very much superior to the general class. That girl went out of our prison about three-quarters of a year ago, or even close on a year ago, and has not returned.

3425. You do not know if she has gone?—She said she would.

3426. Have you had many children committed to reformatories, and sent to prison, since you have been chaplain there?—Within the last nine months I cannot instance a case. Within the last four or five months previous to that there were several. I cannot exactly state a definite number.

3427. Did you think that was a bad arrangement?—I did.

3428. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The only point I wanted to ask you about is this, in regard to work. I do not think you quite understood some of the questions put by the Chairman of the Committee, and you included in the work, in addition to oakum-picking, and repairing bags, the word 'mat-making.' It has been pointed out to us that that kind of work has a very distinct influence upon reformation, and I suppose you would agree with others, that some kinds of work may have more of a reformatory tendency than others—for instance, that mat-making would be very much superior to repairing old bags?—Very much superior.

3429. And that if it were the object to reform the individual, those entrusted with the reformation should have a free hand in selecting the best classes of labour for the employment of the people?—Undoubtedly so.

3430. You say there is only one small boy in prison at the present moment, but from time to time boys are sent to prison. What is the ordinary state of their education?—The ordinary state is commonly good.

3431. Can they read and write, and sum up to compound division?—Yes, as a rule they can. We find that prisoners as a rule can read tolerably well—a great number of them. They can also write their own letters. Arithmetic is their stumbling block. These boys we find proficient to a certain extent in all three.

3432. So that their presence in prison is not due to want of education?—No.

3433. How many boys have been in prison during the last five years for offences in connection with disorderly conduct at the Waverley Station?—There have been, in all, 84 convictions on this special offence.

3434. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you make a sharp distinction between functional and organic conditions of inebriety. You talked of habituals of habitude in whom no organic change has taken place?—No.

3435. Do you consider those hopeful of cure?—Yes.

3436. In the second variety of organic change, do you think a cure would be difficult, if not hopeless?—I think that depends upon the organic change that has taken place, and the extent of it.

3437. You spoke of the cerebellum. Do you think the cerebellum presides, as it were, over the drink craving?—I do not think I said so.

3438. What did you say about the cerebellum?—

That was in talking of the neurotic condition. If you find a person with positively no room for cerebrum; if you find that, as in the ape, the brow goes back, and a huge mass shows itself at the back; if you take all that in concurrence with the general course of the man's conduct and conversation, you can deduce certain facts.

3439. Their condition would be necessarily hopeless? Could you develop the cerebrum?—I have no doubt you could do it through the centuries. In the neurotic I do not desire to embrace anything but the condition of the individual.

3440. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) I understand that in regard to those by habitude criminal, the tendency of your remark is that it is more malady or infirmity than fault—that there is a certain allowance to be made?—You get a child born in a certain environment—the father a thief, the mother a questionable person. To begin with, the child has no basis of education. There is no education in any fashion. It simply exists by whatever method, questionable or otherwise, and the child simply goes on and develops; becomes a habitual from environment and habitude.

3441. That therefore one should look upon it more as an infirmity or mental want than crime? Would you say the same as regards those whose form of vice is picking pockets and theft, which wants the full exercise of the intellect, such as it is? I can understand there being a craving for drink or sexual passion; but for dishonesty, for forgery, you must trace some mental peculiarity?—Belonging entirely to the individual; produced, I will not say by heredity, but existing there as a neurosis. The father or mother may be perfectly devoid of that particular instinct, as in the case of the boy already referred to.

3442. I notice a terrible sheet there of female prisoners more than seven times in prison, and I think in every single case efforts have been made for their recovery, but they have all lapsed—perhaps one or two have been reclaimed, but virtually none. Now do you think that those Homes to which they have gone might be improved? Do you think everything has been done for these poor women that reason suggests should be done?—I have no doubt that everything has been done for the best in those Homes—that the method that commended itself to these people as likely to prove most suitable was adopted; but at the same time, the results have been unsatisfactory.

3443. Have you any suggestions as to what would produce more satisfactory results? Of course, one knows that very much unwisdom is done, in spite of the best intention?—Yes! With regard to male habituals I dare say that agriculture might not be ineffective.

3444. But as regards those women whom you have in that sheet there—because it seems a very hopeless list?—I was sorry it was so; because my intention was all the other way. If I could have got any satisfactory results at all I certainly would have had them forward.

3445. Do the female prisoners generally go to some sort of Reformatory on leaving prison? What generally comes of them?—One evil is this. On the release of a prisoner, female or male, they are generally met by a certain company of friends beyond the prison gate; and however strong or however good the intention may be, it is exceedingly hard to get out of the old environment and the old life when those people meet them.

3446. I understand that they are also met by the agents of the Prisoners' Aid Society, which takes up the girls especially, and tries to make something of them. Is that not the case?—They are not absolutely met by them at the gate, and that is the important point, their friends meet them first. The important thing is that they should be met at once.

3447. Do you not manage here to transfer them direct to some Home?—If they desire to go to a Home that is always done.

3448. Are they recommended in that direction?—Yes, they are advised. And there are ladies from those various Homes that visit them and advise them very strongly. Very often they agree to go, but when the moment of liberation comes they do not go.

Rev. H.

22 Nov. 1894.

3449. Do a considerable number go to these Homes?
—A fair number.

3450. Those ones on that list I have alluded to had all gone to Homes?—At one or other time.

3451. And yet nothing came of them?—No. But these of course are all over seven convictions. There may have been a great many successful cases that have been under seven convictions.

3451A. (By the Chairman.) You could tell us what had been done by the Prison Authorities in the way of reclamation.

3452. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Since you have been chaplain of Edinburgh prison you have taken a considerable interest in the prospects of prisoners discharged?—I have endeavoured to do so.

3453. Can you give the Committee any idea of how many cases you have dealt with?—I have dealt with a great number of cases. The difficulty is this, that the cases I have dealt with, and many of them with tolerable success, have not had seven convictions.

3454. But independent of the number of convictions can you give the Committee any idea of the number of cases dealt with?—I should think that individually I must have dealt with at least, perhaps 250 or 280, up to this date—say 280.

3455. And the lines on which you have gone more particularly are to obtain employment?—To obtain employment.

3456. Believing that that is the first necessity for an honest life?—That is so.

3457. Have the results been fairly successful?—The results have been fairly successful.

3458. In the case of habitual offenders, or in cases of first offences?—Only in the case of first or second offences.

3459. Extremely difficult where the offences were habitual?—Extremely difficult. One case I might mention. At those town destructors, work can always be had, and Mr. St. Clair Cunningham, who manages them, very kindly said I might draft prisoners there for a time. They got a very tolerable wage—at least a guinea a week; and it is disappointing to find that these men just worked for a few days, drifted, and then came into prison. On coming out they have asked and have gone back to work there, but they do the same thing—stay for a few days, and drift again.

3460. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) These are drunkards?—There is both drunkenness and laziness. I think their laziness has as much to do with their condition as their drunkenness. I think their drunkenness is as much a consequence of their condition as their condition is a consequence of their drunkenness.

3461. (By the Chairman.) A witness who was before us, a magistrate, told us that one reason why he gave such very light sentences was, that many of the women were incited to prostitution by their husbands, or by the men with whom they lived. Has anyone told you that that is their case?—Well, their marriage of course is a promiscuous thing as a rule. I know that a lot of them live with any man.

3462. That I do not refer to. He said—because we had found a woman who told us just the same story in prison—this magistrate said that the one reason which induced him to give such light sentences was, that many of these women were compelled to go out on the streets in order to bring in money to their husbands, or to the men with whom they lived?—In one or two cases I have come across I have found that that was so. The man with whom they resided was not their husband; but they lived with him.

3463. But you would not have thought of that remark had it not been put to you?—I would not.

3464. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You seem to be familiar with the teaching of the Italian school of criminal anthropology?—I have not studied it in any fashion as a science, but have simply drawn deductions from the few things I have seen in the prison.

3465. Have you seen Lombroso's work on the subject?—I have not; but I have looked carefully over the works of M. Ribot.

3466. You attach great value to the symmetry of the head?—No; only in conjunction with other things.

3467. In conjunction with what?—In conjunction with general demeanour, the general tone of his conversation, and the nature of the offences which he commits.

3468. The mere formation of the head would not of itself lead you to your conclusions?—Oh, dear no. It is the general aspect of the case—his features as much as anything.

3469. Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff drew a distinction between a crime and a petty offence. The man who breaks into a place, commits theft, and picks pockets, must have some capacity to work out his plans; he must have a smart brain for doing these things, and ready communication between brain and the muscular mechanism. Where does the neurosis come in there?—You mean the neurosis pointing to this line of action? But the same thing may be said of an asylum patient. You find the greatest cunning in a particular line of action in one who is pronounced by competent authority to be insane.

3470. Do you know of any lunatic who ever left an asylum to pick pockets or burglarise?—I have known a lunatic whose particular bent was towards robbery; but I have known them whose particular bent was otherwise.

3471. Lunatics as a rule do not commit robberies &c., in or out of asylums?—If you regard the prison as an asylum, you find that those prisoners plot during the time they are there how they can commit those offences; and they afterwards do it.

3472. In regard to neurotic temperament, I suppose you are aware from your experience and observation that neurosis has a range as wide as the poles asunder, both in men and women?—That is so.

3473. Do you look upon neurosis as a form of insanity?—Certainly; an intense neurosis I look upon as a form of insanity.

3474. Legal insanity or moral insanity?—There is a certain point where moral insanity becomes legal insanity, is there not, if you push it far enough.

3476. How many working men and others may have been in the Calton Jail seven times, and yet only once, twice, or even three times in a year. Still under your definition he would be considered an habitual offender, and as having a moral squint or a double dose of original sin?—That I cannot say. But if a man has got into prison once, and even after two years have elapsed he gets in again, he is a very foolish man, and there must be something seriously wrong.

3477. But you know these petty offences, such as breach of the peace, are easily committed. Don't you think your definition of seven is severe for such a man? (The Chairman.)—I do not understand Mr Campbell to set himself the particular number of seven, excepting as giving a line.

3478. (Witness.)—I confine myself to those with seven convictions and over.

3479. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You include the working man who gets drunk twice a year?—You must take some basis of 'habitual,' and I take sentence. I am willing to admit that I may have been rigid in my definition with a man who is seven times convicted.

3480. You have said that their education is fairly good, though the arithmetic is somewhat defective?—That is so.

3481. In regard to the typical cases you have cited, do you think the prison is the right place to treat them?—I think that in many cases the prison system is a good system in regard to these people.

3482. You say that even of those who go to Homes, there are very few reformed. If the present system is not yielding good results, is it desirable to continue it?—If the discipline could be extended after their liberation; if there could be surveillance of some sort.

Rev. H.
Mackenzie
Campbell.

22 Nov. 1894.

I believe something modelled on that might be followed with very good results.

3483. That would necessitate every man or woman having a keeper to look after her at the cost of the State?—Yes, not a keeper for each, but one for many.

3484. Have you formed any idea of the time these people should be detained in prison, supposing the prison to be the right place to treat them?—I think that method we spoke of, where they are shut up for a few years, and where they earn their liberation, if they can, within a shorter time. Within a certain period you may see a slight change for the better upon their general demeanour and their industry, and a certain prospect might be held out to them as to the future.

3485. Do you mean separate or cellular confinement?—For a time I would say cellular.

3486. Twelve months?—Possibly for that, or less.

3487. And the same discipline now in operation in prison?—The same discipline, with the classification of the subjects.

3488. The same dietary?—I would give increased dietary to those habituals. I think that certain little privileges might be allowed, and that they might earn privileges by good conduct.

3489. Do you think public opinion would support you in such a proposal?—I would even have some advantage held out to them on release. That is the blot on the present prison system, that on liberation there is nothing to look forward to but to go back to their old environment.

3490. What do you find as the result of confining any person in a cell, let us say for 12 months, in regard to his physical health, and even his complexion?—The result is not good.

3491. Do you think it would be desirable to perpetuate that in regard to petty offenders?—No; but at the present time a prisoner has only one hour's exercise a day.

3492. You are almost inclined to admit that the prison after all is not the place for them, but a place where considerable relaxation of diet and other privileges might be conceded?—According to the classification of the prisoners. I mean that severe discipline might be necessary for one class of prisoner, and the very reverse for another class.

3493. What classification would you go in for?—I think the classification I have given is about the only one.

3494. Would you not find, among neurotics themselves even, great necessity for supervision?—That of course would be the medical aspect of the case. [Witness then withdrew.]

Miss Grant.

MISS E. GRANT, Matron of Edinburgh Prison, called in and examined.

Miss Grant.

3495. (By the Chairman.) You are the Matron of Edinburgh Prison?—I am.

3496. How long have you held that post?—I have only been two years in Edinburgh prison; but I have been in the position of matron for about 10 years. I have been 21 years in the service altogether—11 years as teacher, and 10 as matron. I have been in Greenock, Dundee, Glasgow, and Edinburgh as matron.

3497. How many women have you under your charge in Edinburgh?—Seventy-one last night.

3498. You give here the state of the female department on a particular day, the 3rd September 1894. You show that you had untried prisoners 4; convicted of serious crime 22; petty offenders 75—giving a total of 101. Then you analyse the crimes, and show 1 case of assault; 1 of assault and robbery; 1 of fraud; 15 of theft; 1 of child murder; 1 of harbouring prostitutes; 2 of robbery—making a total of 22. Then as to petty offenders, you show 9 of drunkenness; 39 of breach of the peace; 3 of assault; 1 of fraud; 15 of theft; 7 of importuning; 1 of begging—making a total of 75. These are your figures?—Yes.

3499. You give the number of convictions and nationality?—Yes. Of the habitual offenders there is a large proportion of Irish.

3500. Have you no prisoners besides Scotch and Irish?—One or two English occasionally.

3501. Here you have a table giving the number of convictions and nationalities, and you show that among those convicted 4 times and under of crimes there were 8, of whom 6 were Scotch and 2 Irish; that of those convicted over 4 times there were over 14, of whom 9 were Scotch and 5 Irish—making a total of 22, of whom 15 were Scotch and 7 were Irish.

3502. To show us the significance of that could you tell us the proportion of Irish in the population of Edinburgh?—I do not know.

3503. Of petty offenders your table shows that of those convicted 4 times and under there were 33, of whom 3 were English, 21 were Scotch, and 9 were Irish; that of those convicted over 4 times, 24 were Scotch, and 18 Irish—making a total of 75, of whom 45 were Scotch, and 27 Irish?—Yes.

3504. (By Dr. Sutherland.) While a great many Irish people come to Edinburgh, a greater proportion are born in Edinburgh of Irish parents, and register themselves as Irish?—Yes.

3505. The other contents of your table show that, according to the prisoners' own statements, none of those convicted of serious offences were of criminal parentage?—None of them would acknowledge that they were; but I think there were some who were, but would not say so.

3506. Of petty offenders you put down four as of criminal parents?—These were the only four who acknowledged that their parents were criminals.

3507. Of your prisoners, 12 of the serious offenders, and 47 of the petty offenders, had children?—Yes.

3508. You give the number of convictions as stated by the prisoners themselves. Have you any record of these yourself?—I understood Mr. Campbell would give these in his statement. These are therefore given just approximately.

3509. You appear to be for a repressive mode of dealing with habitual offenders?—On the one hand, yes. But on the other I would have means used to remove the causes of crime if possible. I think, however, that the mode ought to be deterrent on the one hand if possible.

3510. You state here that the irreclaimable habitual petty offenders, of whom there are 25 in the chaplain's female list, should be confined for life in poorhouses, with the alternative of imprisonment if they prove refractory. Is not that rather stiff?—Yes, but they are found to be unable to take care of themselves. The State has to support them in any case.

3511. Yes; but the Parochial Authorities have not. A good many of these women are, no doubt, able-bodied!—They get out, become debauched, and come back again. It would be better for themselves to be confined. They just live between the prison and the poorhouse. Twenty-five of that number I know.

3512. The poorhouse authorities do not ask for such great powers over them. They ask for powers of detention?—Well, that might be sufficient.

3513. The poorhouse officials visited you with the view of identifying the women who were frequently in the poorhouse, and you state that 9 out of the 20 identified by them were of this irreclaimable class?—They identified 20 of our prisoners as having been in the poorhouse, and 9 of these belonged to the irreclaimable class, who have been convicted about 50 times and over.

3514. For the habituals whom you do not consider hopeless, you propose a lengthened period of strict discipline, and you think that could be carried out nowhere so efficiently as in prison. Is that your view?—Yes.

Miss Grant.

22 Nov. 1894.

3515. That would involve long sentences, and people are averse to that now?—It would involve a sentence of say, six months, or twelve months to begin with.

3516. Whereas at present, perhaps a sentence of one month is given?—I consider that time is required for training those women in habits of industry and self-control.

3517. You go on to say that many of this class have voluntarily undergone a period of detention in asylums and Homes with no result, and that their association in these institutions is sufficient to nullify any good they might otherwise have received; and therefore you propose that a term of, say 12 months' cellular imprisonment, would give them time to acquire, to some extent at least, habits of industry, order, and regularity, whilst it would exercise a much more deterring effect than confinement in a Reformatory. But don't you think it is rather severe?—If they can be cured in any other way; but I don't see how it is to be done.

3518. That would vastly increase your charges?—Yes, it would.

3519. That would fill up the vacant prisons pretty quickly. That is merely evolved out of your own experience?—Just out of my own experience. I should think that wherever they are they must be under discipline and restraint.

3520. If you gave them 12 months' cellular imprisonment for, say being drunk and disorderly, and increased the sentences in proportion for more serious crimes, it would make life too short to work them out?—I would not have the sentences increased for more serious crimes. The long term in the case of petty offenders would be for habituality.

3521. You are for training their intellect by instruction, where they cannot read and write?—I think we must engage their co-operation if they are to be reformed at all. We must interest them in their own reformation.

3522. And would you provide lectures for them?—Yes; I think they are very ignorant.

3523. That is true. You were a schoolmistress?—I was.

3524. And in those days illiteracy was very much more common than now?—There are more now who can read and write, but still they are very ignorant. I think they might have instruction in many matters that would be of importance to them, and that would help them.

3525. Lectures, and direct religious instruction as at present given by clergymen and lady visitors?—Yes.

3526. Then you go on to talk of providing for them on liberation, and you say that to disperse them would be better than to form them into a community by themselves. Do you restore many to friends at present?—A few. There are one or two in my mind just now that might be restored to friends if they had undergone a period of discipline. There is one woman in prison just now, a tradesman's wife who has a respectable home and family, but she has quite lost herself there by getting into bad habits and drinking. Her husband takes her home even now, although I believe he has said he won't receive her again. She has been, I think, about 14 times in prison. Her husband is a master tradesman in a good position, and her family quite respectable. There are a number of girls who have come to situations from the Highlands, &c., who might be dealt with in this way.

3527. It is very obvious that you might send these people back to their friends, but it is done at present by the Prisoners' Aid Organisation?—A great many of them do not wish in the meantime to do well. They are dealt with too well; they are too happy in prison just now.

3528. You are for making prison a rougher place?—I think for that class. I do not mean that they should be treated more roughly, but I think longer sentences desirable.

3529. If they are too happy under a six months' sentence, would they not be twice as much too happy under a 12 months' sentence?—No; it is the five or seven days' sentences which are undeterring.

3530. You would not surely increase these to a year? Miss Grant.—I would. They are lost by present treatment.

3531. You have not many prisoners in for long terms?—Just now we have 15, I believe. 22 Nov. 1894.

3532. Is your experience of these long-term women that they pull round?—If they are in for a first or second sentence they do; but after they are habitual my experience is that they make an effort to do well after they go out, and that they are longer in coming back to prison—although many of them do come back eventually.

3533. You recommend domestic service as a suitable employment for many of these girls on liberation; but is it not a very difficult thing to get places for them as domestic servants?—Servants are very scarce. If they had undergone this training, that, I think, would benefit them and do them good. It might be possible if the interest of the public could be enlisted in their behalf.

3534. Don't you think they would require to be shut up somewhere else than in prison? If a mistress objects to take a girl after a seven days' sentence for a petty offence, would she probably not object a great deal more to take her after she had been 12 months in prison?—The mistress would know that the offence had been the same, and that the girl had undergone training.

3535. Do you find mistresses willing enough to take them back?—Not in the meantime. But there are other employments.

3536. The Prisoners' Aid Society gives them every assistance?—Yes, to those who wish to do well; but there are a great many who are really lost to all good, and that is the class for whom something ought to be done—those who do not wish to do well.

3537. Your experience is that when a prisoner who has a large number of convictions one after another for petty offences happens to get a long sentence for some offence, she generally benefits by it, and often does not appear in prison again for a considerable time?—Yes; that is so.

3538. It is on that experience that you base your recommendation?—Yes.

3539. You have a long table of petty offenders that shows the proportion of petty offences to more serious convictions. You have a long list of convictions—several of 200 and one of 250; 200 appears to be about your limit?—That is just approximate; it is not the exact number of sentences.

3540. Have you many prostitutes in for importuning?—A great many, although they are not always charged with that offence. They do not, as a rule, get into prison unless they are drunk. Then they are charged with being drunk and disorderly.

3541. Do they get a bigger sentence for that charge?—For importuning the sentence is 14 days; and for being drunk and disorderly 5 and sometimes 7 days. But the sentences are unequal.

3542. These women are of a very low class in Edinburgh—the very lowest and poorest of that degraded class?—Not always.

3543. Have you come across the more respectable and richer and better clad members of that class?—No, not many. Respectable girls whose fathers are perhaps small farmers in the north, who have come to Edinburgh for work—there are a great many of that class, but of a class above that there are very few.

3544. I mean what you call the 'flash' prostitute—the one who apes stylish dress?—Not very many of that class. When they come to us they have gone down.

3545. Can you explain why it is that that class appears to be escaping?—Because they are better able to take care of themselves. I don't think they drink in the same way. I think they keep within doors more, and are not so liable to be apprehended.

3546. You have not anything in your experience to show that there is anything in the suggestion thrown out by a witness who was before us, that there is any bribery of the police, or any partiality of the police to act in these cases?—I have heard that said, but I don't know as to the truth of it.

Miss Grant.

22 Nov. 1894.

3547. Have you ever heard any complaints of that by your prisoners?—No, I have not.

3548. You have one girl here who has had 30 days for importuning. Do you often get such long sentences?—Sometimes, but not very often.

3549. Is there any particular magistrate who sentences them in that way?—Bailie Colston.

3550. He is a long sentence magistrate?—He gives longer sentences.

3551. Then you have some of these long sentence women. Do you find better results from them?—We find in prison that they improve in appearance and health, that they take more interest in their work, and that when they go out they do not come just so quickly back, as if they had had a shorter sentence.

3552. That is what I wanted to know about—they do not come back again quickly?—No; I have known of them being liberated on Saturday morning and coming back on Monday.

3553. But in Glasgow they get long sentences?—I think much the same. Longer sentences if anything here. I remember one woman who was in twice in one week. So that some change, anyway, in the present system is urgently required.

3554. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You say you thought long sentences of imprisonment gave you better chances of better results in the way of reformation. You know something of the number of female convicts who are convicted. Do you think that your experience of those long sentences of several years is such as would lead you to believe that a long sentence tends better than a short sentence in prison towards reformation?—The results with convicts are very poor indeed. But that is quite different. They are associated. The evils of association come in there. It is imprisonment sentences I mean. They should be kept separate. All of that class have a defect in their character. I do not think they should be associated, and I think that by association they do each other harm if they are kept as they are in prison. But of course there is one difficulty in prison of providing work for them. If they could be employed in the open air it would be more conducive to their health and welfare. But I think they should be kept separate as far as possible.

3555. Do you think that with prison discipline as we understand it, cellular confinement is well adapted to increase self-control, or otherwise?—Otherwise.

3556. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Is it your experience that most of the women who become habitual criminals begin their career early?—Yes.

3557. Do the most of them drink?—Yes; they nearly all drink.

3558. Do you find any sharp line, or any line at all, between those who commit offences involving dishonesty, and those who do not?—Well, that is a question that has puzzled me often. I think they often commit offences of that kind when in drink that they would not do otherwise.

3559. Then you really think that the drink is at the bottom of the most of it?—I do think so. I think there are other causes besides drink. Their birth and surroundings from the very beginning have been at fault. I think that has a great deal to do with it.

3560. Is it the case that most of those unfortunate women who come in are also drunk?—Yes. Those who keep sober do not so readily get into prison.

3561. Are you aware of any instances where people have come to your prison for 14 days for a first offence for importuning?—Yes, I think so; but I am not quite certain. I think we had one or two cases lately, but I would not be positive.

3562. Is it your experience that it does no good to give short sentences?—No good whatever. It does a great deal of harm.

3563. (By Miss Stevenson.) You point to the longer period of detention being in the prison, where you certainly would not have the same means of supplying occupations that you could have, say in an establishment that you might call a grown-up Reformatory. Would the same results you point to not be obtained by the prisoner being removed, after solitary confinement in prison, to some other institution, where she would be under compulsory detention, and where she could get training similar to that you propose?—I think she could; if it were under proper supervision.

3564. You do not lay stress on the detention being within the prison walls. It is the compulsitur that you lay stress on?—Yes, but I think if it could be done within the prisons, the expense to the community of that class would not be so great.

3565. You have not got remunerative employment?—That is the great want in prisons; the right kind of employment.

3566. Had you ever any connection with Deanbank Institution?—Yes.

3567. How long were you in connection with that institution?—About three years.

3568. Was it your experience that it did good work in preventing girls from falling into the criminal class?—Yes; I do think so.

3569. And the class of girls you had charge of there came very much from the same class of society who are now under your care in the prison?—I think they were the class who would have been prisoners if they had not been taken charge of in their youth and trained.

3570. Very many of them were children whose parents had been in prison?—Yes.

3571. Very many were girls who had been before the Police Court and not convicted?—During all the time I was in Edinburgh prison I only met one of these girls.

3572. What age of girls had you in the Deanbank Institution?—From about 8 to 15 or 16.

3573. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think public opinion would support you in a sentence of 12 months' cellular confinement for petty offenders, considering that the maximum allowed by Parliament so recently as two years ago after long discussion, in the Scotch Burgh Police Bill is 30 days?—Perhaps not.

3574. Is it not just looking for the thing that you are not likely to get?—But the public might be educated to it. It is not just as a punishment of a year's imprisonment that I should propose to give it, but to cure them of a disease.

3575. Is your main object in having a 12 months' detention to keep them off the streets and prevent them doing harm?—Yes; but also to try and reform them if possible.

3576. I quite understand 12 months for a genuine felon. How are you going to cure an habitually drunken woman by the mere fact of detaining her in a cell for 12 months?—Would it not do something to wean her from drink?

3577. Is mere confinement, in a room of 800 cubic feet of space, the only method of curing a drunkard?—I do not say that it is the only one.

3578. Do you think it would be possible to find domestic service for women who come fresh from prison after 12 months' detention?—Young women from these Homes have not much difficulty in finding service.

3579. Yes, from these institutions. Is it possible to make employment either as remunerative or as educative in prison?—Not to the same extent I know.

3580. You know, as a matter of fact, that it is most unremunerative?—Yes.

3581. It is within your knowledge that certain women in Glasgow have been convicted 40 times in one year of drunkenness and prostitution, but that since the magistrates have adopted more repressive measures, by giving them the full 14 and 30 days, the same people have not come to prison quite 40 times, but have been running up scores of 20 in the last two years. Does that indicate reformation?—Thirty days is not long enough for training.

3582. Thirty days is a great improvement upon the former sentences. They come back to prison fewer times, but not the least improved in condition. In seeking to cure a person of habitual drunkenness would you not have some regard to the kind of occupation, and the surroundings in which they are made to work—say in the open air?—Yes.

3583. Would it not be better to have classification

Miss Grant.

22 Nov. 1894.

Miss Grant. than the long tried system of locking up in a cell for 23 hours out of the 24?—It would be better physically, but they would be associated.

23 Nov. 1894. 3584. If you classified them the evils of association would not be so great?—I don't think they do each other good.

3585. If your system is to be carried into operation in a prison it would mean the establishment of an imperium in imperio—two kinds of discipline?—That would be necessary.

3586. Is that possible in one institution?—I think prisons might be adapted to any change of that kind.

3587. You really think that confinement in a cell for 12 months, having regard to the kind of work in prison, would be the means of reclaiming an habitually drunken woman?—No; but I think it would be more deterring than at present, and it would be more productive of results.

3588. But we are looking for reformation?—A great many of them will not be reformed by any means.

3589. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) What are the terms of admission to this Deanbank Institution?—Young girls who might otherwise be sent to the Industrial Schools, but who do not come strictly within any one of the clauses of the Industrial Schools Act. There are about 50 girls in it. It is supported by charity, by subscriptions, and by a small grant from the Town Council. It must be preventive work, both then, and later on.

3590. How long do they stop there?—Until about 16. They go out to a situation. They are probably five, six, or seven years there.

3591. I gather from your evidence generally that you think a very short sentence is no kindness?—I certainly think not. I think it is a great evil. [Witness then withdrew.]

NINTH DAY.

Edinburgh, Friday, 23rd November 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, BART., M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

Mr. David Lewis.

23 Nov. 1894.

EX-BAILIE DAVID LEWIS, called in and examined.

Mr. David Lewis.

23 Nov. 1894.

3592. (By the Chairman.) How long were you a bailie?—About five years.

3593. And you have long taken an interest in all municipal matters?—Yes; for 30 years at any rate.

3594. You don't think that the police returns give a true indication of the state of drunkenness?—Oh, no.

3595. Would you please elaborate that?—Yes. As to the police returns, I have prepared a table on which my observations rest—a table dealing with the returns of three of our leading cities, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee, and giving first the population of each of these cities.

3596. I think we have got all that already before us—so far as official figures are concerned?—The point I was aiming at was the number of police apprehensions in these three cities.

3597. And how they vary, compared with each other?—Yes, and the number apprehended drunk, and drunk and incapable.

3598. We have got all that. Very good.

3599. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Can you give the number of those who were drunk when apprehended?—Surely. The number drunk including simple assaults when apprehended in Glasgow in 1893 was 45,779.

3600. That is apprehended for the offence of drunkenness?—No, for simple assaults and drunk when apprehended. The number in Edinburgh was 6,900. In Dundee the returns are made out somewhat differently, but the number there who were drunk and incapable was 1,643.

3601. (By the Chairman.) Have you any information that would supplement ours giving the number of persons apprehended for particular offences, who were drunk when apprehended?—I have no analysis of the various charges; merely the numbers.

3602. You consider that a very large number of people who are habitual drunkards do not come under the notice of the police?—Certainly; but it is well to keep in view that an immense number of those who fall into the hands of the police are cumulative cases.

3603. You refer to notes about outstanding cases taken by you when a police magistrate?—Precisely. I refer to two cases especially. I took considerable interest in one of them, and I asked the Governor of the Calton Prison to prepare a return showing the period the man spent in jail. He was a notorious drunkard. He had been apprehended and convicted upwards of 300 times.

3604. His name?—Alexander Merrilees. I had visited him repeatedly in prison, where he spent fully 33 years of his life.

3605. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I think this is a case which occurred a considerable number of years ago?—A good many years ago.

3606. How many?—I should say 20 years ago.

3607. But there has been a considerable difference in the treatment of such people since 1873 I believe?—In Edinburgh there has. The circumstances are peculiar. In one of the recent Police Acts a clause was inserted making the penalty cumulative for drunkenness, instead of the usual sentence of a fine of 5s. or 24 hours' imprisonment.

3608. (By the Chairman.) That is rather an exception. We have been informed of some rare cases in which a man gets 60 days for habitual drunkenness?—That is very exceptional. In short, the cumulative sentences as they appear to me, have not been so frequent as one might have expected.

3609. They had no power to give long sentences in your day?—No; it was 5s. or 24 hours.

3610. Have you any other case?—There was another case in which I took an interest, but I forget the man's name at this moment. He was a young man comparatively. He was only 30 years of age, and he had been 23 times convicted. He was a drunkard, but at the same time unlike this other man, in that he was very apt to get disorderly, and even lapse into crime. I find he had spent upwards of 5 years in prison, exclusive of the time before trial.

3611. Your meaning is 'the failure of all moral and legislative agencies to reclaim confirmed drunkards'?—Yes, upon that I am perfectly clear; and I may tell you I have been in connection with a vast number of agencies of different kinds. We have had meetings again and again in the Council Chambers to consider what was to be done with this class.

Mr. David

3612. That is drunkards?—Yes, and if there is one thing upon which I am clear it is that our agencies are sufficiently numerous, but sadly inadequate.

3613. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What? Inadequate?—To meet the social conditions of these people.

3614. (By the Chairman.) You say they are sufficiently or insufficiently numerous?—That they are sufficiently numerous but inadequate—I think out of all proportion numerous. I find for example that we have 128 societies in Edinburgh all aiming at the improvement and reclamation of the dissipated and poverty-stricken members of the community.

3615. Poverty-stricken is not a crime, and we have nothing to do with that. We are dealing with a class of people I should be sorry to mix up with those who are poverty-stricken. If you can will you eliminate as far as possible the poverty-stricken?—Yes. The only reason why I would submit this statement is the difficulty of finding out those who are poor by circumstances over which they have not any control, and the immense number who are poor in consequence of their dissipated habits. We have no means of drawing the line of demarcation. We find, however, in regard to those societies that are at work for the amelioration of the conditions of this class of people that the expenditure in Edinburgh is something like £150,000.

3616. In these institutions do you include the Parochial Board?—No. If we included that Board we have a further expenditure of £56,392.

3617. Do you mean to say that these voluntary agencies in Edinburgh expend three times the amount that is expended by the Parochial Board?—Evidently. They expend a sum of £150,000.

3618. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you include the Royal Infirmary?—Oh yes.

3619. (By the Chairman.) Have you a list of the institutions you do include?—No; but I could supply it.

3620. I wish you would?—I will do so.

3621. You mentioned that you have a Royal Infirmary?—Yes.

3622. Have you any other institutions devoted to the medical treatment and care of the sick poor?—Well I don't know. I don't know if I could answer that in the absence of the book issued by the Charities Registration Union.

3623. The Sick Children's Hospital?—I think so; but you will find that the volume deals with all the charities except private charities.

3624. In a number of those charities they make inquiries into the lives of these people?—Oh yes; in every case. There is an immense amount of labour expended, and they are doing an immense amount of good; but still we can scarcely keep abreast of the tide of moral and social degradation.

3625. Do you think that anything would be gained by consolidating the charities that are intended to deal with drunkards and habitual offenders?—I have a decided opinion, that if the object of these organisations is to be somehow attained, the greater the amount of concentration we have the better. That raises the question of overlapping, which we find in Edinburgh to be most mischievous.

3626. You have long taken an interest in temperance matters?—I have.

3627. Do the licensing laws lay down that it is a crime for publicans to supply intoxicated persons with drink?—That is the law.

3628. That is a crime, and a penalty is attached for giving drink to intoxicated persons?—Well, my experience is in regard to that, that where it is the law it is unworkable.

3629. Have you looked into the law in other parts of the country. Do you know whether there is any difference in the English and Scottish Law in this respect?—I am not sure. I cannot speak definitely.

3630. Is there any improvement—any alteration that could be made in the Scottish Law which would make it more workable?—I don't know. Only I know this, that the legislature of this country has done everything that men could do to prevent those who frequent these liquor shops getting drunk, and they have put on heavy penalties. No doubt you have been told that the penalty is £5 or one month's imprisonment for the first offence—that of publicans selling liquor to intoxicated persons.

3631. As a magistrate what steps have you taken to pull up publicans who supplied liquor to intoxicated persons?—Well, in the first place, there are not many of them brought before the magistrates, and very few of them are convicted when brought into Court.

3632. Had you ever any publican brought before you?—Yes.

3633. And did you get a conviction?—I think about that there is no question.

3634. Do you remember any case in which you found a publican guilty of an offence?—Yes. I have a case before my mind at present.

3635. And did you ever hear of any further charges being brought against that man?—I cannot say.

3636. The Chief Constable of Edinburgh told us that he had been informed there was a distinct difference between the Scottish Law and the English. In England the offence was permitting intoxicated persons to be on the premises. Must you supply drink to intoxicated persons?—Our law is exceedingly drastic, and wherever the defect may be it is not in the legislation.

3637. It is in the administration is it? Or if not—if it is drastic—if it is not in the legislation, then it must be in the administration?—And I think—

3638. Where is it in the administration?—I think also the penalties are so severe that if the law could be administered—it would be put a stop to. But I hold somewhat peculiar views.

3639. That is exactly why I asked you. I thought from the views you hold on the temperance question you were likely to be a witness who would be inclined to do everything that could be done under the existing law. You probably have acquainted yourself with any defects in that law?—I think you may take it from me that there is no defect in the existing law. You have the penalties of £5 or a month for the first offence, for the second offence £10 or two months, and for the third offence £20 or four months.

3640. Do your temperance organisations avail themselves of that legislation?—No.

3641. And the difficulty is in getting evidence?—There is this difficulty here. There has been more than once appointed in Edinburgh, what is called a 'vigilance committee,' but we found that these committees were practically useless for this reason, that, rightly or wrongly, there is a feeling abroad that to become too interfering in matters pertaining to the duty of the police, is repugnant to the minds of many citizens.

3642. On the other hand, so far as the police are concerned, is there not a feeling on the part of the magistrates that they don't like to send policemen on duty loitering about a public-house?—I cannot say that I had ever found that feeling in the minds of the magistrates.

3643. Then have the police ever in plain clothes been instructed to pay special heed to that class of people?—I think so. I think it is right to say that I believe Mr. Henderson has given instructions more than once, but I think he would inform you that with the strictest magistrates he has great difficulty in securing convictions. The difficulty is not in the law. I am not prepared to say it is not in its administration, but there is a great difficulty in drawing the line where an individual passes into a state of intoxication as interpreted by the statute.

3644. Your suggestions are confined exclusively to the habitual drunkard—to persons at all events whose crimes arise from drink, or connected with it?—These observations that I apply are specially to drunkards and drunken persons. I think the police attention is generally directed to that class.

Mr. Daw
Lewis.

23 Nov. 1

Mr. David
Lewis.
23 Nov. 1894.

3645. Have you made any personal effort in any particular case to try and reclaim any bad case?—Well, I may say that during the long period of 40 years, a very large proportion of my leisure time has been given to this question; and I have tried many things in my life; but the most difficult thing I have undertaken was to reclaim a confirmed drunkard, more especially if it was a female.

3646. Did you ever succeed in any good case?—Oh yes.

3647. Well, let us have some case—some good chronic case that you have had?—It is a very delicate subject. I could state numbers of cases of confirmed drunkards who have been permanently reclaimed, by the observance of entire abstinence. But I can point to one case, that of a young man of high social standing, who only held on about six months.

3648. We are all impressed with the good work of the total abstinence organisations, but we have rather to deal with the cases of persons who either won't take the pledge, or who, having taken it, won't keep it at all?—Well, I have a word about that, but let me dispose of this case. This man, as I say, held on for six months, and to all appearance was 'square' and getting on. I had a communication from him the other day, and I was waited upon by one of his friends, and the whole thing has gone wrong, and he is to-day where he was 12 months ago. I give that as a simple illustration to prove that the difficulty of reclaiming a confirmed drunkard is such as to be almost insurmountable. It may help you to understand this when I inform you that, while the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society, which was instituted in 1836, has pledged, numerically speaking, double the adult population of the city, as nearly as possible 75 per cent. of those pledged have fallen away.

3649. That population would be about how many?—About 180,000.

3650. During the whole course of the history of the Society?—Yes.

3651. Then you make some suggestions—that rural industrial reformatories be established for the reformation of confirmed drunkards, and idle able-bodied loafers and vagrants; that for the able-bodied out-door labour be given, such as the reclamation of waste land; that they be remunerated also; that they be charged board, and that the balance, where there was any, go to assist industrial schools or workhouses where their wives and families were being supported?—That is what I would suggest; and I have exhausted all the intellectual powers I possess to see if there is no human remedy for this state of things, and it appears to me that one of two things is imperatively demanded, and it is this, that so incorrigible and hopeless is the class we are now dealing with, they would either require to be removed from the drink, or the temptations to drink would require to be removed from them.

3652. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you said that the agencies in Edinburgh, although adequate in number, were inadequate as regards results?—Precisely.

3653. Do you think, in other words, that the amount of money contributed in Edinburgh would be sufficient, under good management, to carry out much more important results?—I am satisfied of that.

3654. Have you thought of any scheme for better arrangement of this form of charity? Would you put it under Government or municipal control to prevent overlapping?—That is a most difficult point. We have in Edinburgh tried this again and again.

3655. To try to get these charities amalgamated?—The Charities Registration Union made the last effort; but we find that it is difficult, very difficult; each association having its own surroundings and its own interests.

3656. It has been suggested there should be institutions for the purpose of shutting up the victims of inebriety. Would you be in favour of them being kept up by voluntary contributions or State aid, or by a combination of both?—My impression is that they would require to be kept up by State aid, and by money raised through County Councils or some such agency.

I have no doubt that in Edinburgh, a very large sum could be raised by voluntary contributions, if the public were satisfied that the arrangements were efficient; but, at the same time, as I have suggested the establishment of rural Reformatories, I think that to put them on a permanent solid foundation they should be under the control of Government. Whether it should be directly through County Councils—that is a question for the legislature.

3657. You would not wish to lose all these contributions from private sources? You would utilise them?—Yes, to a large extent.

3658. You would have such institutions controlled by Government inspection?—Yes, and supervision. I think if the suggestion was carried out there would be an immense saving to the localities in the way of police supervision. As an ex-magistrate—and I think Mr. Henderson would indorse what I am about to say—I would observe that while we have somewhere about 400 constables in the police force at present, if we could get rid of this incorrigible class that goes from public-house to police, and from police to prison, we could do with one-third less, or perhaps one-half of that number. That is my honest conviction.

3659. (By Col. M'Hardy.) About the management of these Reformatories that you suggest—would they be purely Government institutions?—Well I don't know if I could go the length of saying that they should be purely Government institutions the same as prisons.

3660. I suppose that personal interest in each individual case, by a visitor for instance, would be a valuable sort of thing?—I think it would.

3661. What I am hinting at is that probably it might be desirable to have the actual government of the establishments more or less local?—I think so.

3662. And therefore that, even if the Government subscribed a certain amount out of the Imperial taxation, certainly some proportion would be paid by the localities from the rates?—Certainly.

3663. Would you suggest that there should be only one institution of the kind, or that there should be a number of them?—My impression is that if we had them in counties, and where there was a sparse population, there might be amalgamation of two or more counties.

3664. We are told that the accommodation in some poorhouses is vacant—a large amount of it?—That is so. In Edinburgh that is so.

3665. Do you think that it would be a good thing to utilise that accommodation for the class we are referring to?—I don't think so.

3666. Why?—My impression is that if these people are to be reclaimed we should endeavour to get them to work. My experience is that it is not merely drink with a lot of these idle loafers. There is a disposition not to work.

3667. But why should they not work in a poorhouse?—We have never found that we can get much work out of them in the poorhouse.

3668. But how would you propose to get work out of them anywhere else?—You have a rural Reformatory. When they come in I would give them to understand the regulations—that they were to set about to work. Able-bodied men should tear up heather, burn whins, and reclaim land, and I would endeavour to keep out of their minds the punitive idea.

3669. How would you force them?—I would say—here is your name in my register, and here is the charge against you for your board and for your clothing, and here is what you are credited for the work you do. I would pay them for working, giving them a fair wage—one that would be fair and reasonable, and I would get them to do that work.

3670. These people are disinclined to work. How are you to force them?—Well I would give them to understand that every person there must work, and that if they did not work they must pay the penalty.

3671. Which penalty?—Just as they do in the prison at present.

3672. Would you have a system of punishment?—Yes.

Mr. David
Lewis.
23 Nov. 1894.

Mr. David
Lewis.

23 Nov. 1894.

3673. Would you have it conducted in the Reformatory or in the prison?—I would neither bother the prison nor the police with them. I would have them under the administration of this institution, and if they would not work we have pretty good authority for saying that the food must be regulated accordingly.

3674. But you would deal with them inside the institution?—Yes.

3675. How long would you confine such people?—This is a point to which I have directed attention. It is this—

3676. How long would you confine such people?—Well, this would be dictated by circumstances. You would necessarily have a man at the head of this institution who was a competent man of administrative ability, and who knew human nature. I would have a Board meeting once a month, and if he reported that a certain man should be liberated, then by all means let him be liberated.

3677. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What would be the maximum power you would give a magistrate in committing?—Well I would say it is rather hard lines just to say that—

3678. It would be necessary to fix a period?—Say within a period of three months; if a man had been there three times for incorrigible drunkenness I would give the magistrate power to send him to this Reformatory.

3679. How long should he be confined in this place?—I cannot say; you must be guided by circumstances.

3680. If anything were done it would have to be by statutory powers?—Yes.

3681. That statute would give the limit of time which a magistrate or other person could impose. What is your opinion of what that limit should be?—If convicted three times within three months I would give statutory power to send to this Reformatory.

3682. (By Miss Stevenson.) For how long?—This is a point I was anxious to explain. He would require to be sent there without any definite period being fixed; and if the manager recommended at the end of three months to the monthly meeting of the Board that he thought this man might be restored to society, then let him be, but if found he could not so recommend that for a period of six months then let him stay.

3683. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In suggesting that funds from philanthropic quarters might be got for supporting inebriate Homes in this city by a system of centralisation, are you aware that the funds of the Royal Infirmary are languishing now?—Well, they may be languishing; we have been always hearing that they could use more money; but I think the citizens of Edinburgh and of the country contribute very handsomely to that institution.

3684. Is it in your mind in proposing centralisation to constitute something—the bureau de la bienfaisance in Paris?—I would certainly recommend that, taking care that such public institutions as the Royal Infirmary and the Sick Children's Hospital were not included, as well as others of a kindred nature. But for all those minor charities I think it would be a very excellent thing.

3685. In answer to Col. M'Hardy you said that County Councils and other bodies should assist in maintaining these Homes. In that way would you assimilate these Homes, and have them partly maintained by local rates and partly by State subventions?—Precisely.

3686. Are you aware that habitual drunkards in Edinburgh are the clientelle of certain public-houses?—I believe they are.

3687. Do you think further checks might be imposed on the publican and the pawnbroker?—I don't think it is possible to impose severer checks than legislature has as yet done.

3688. In the Colonies the name of the habitual drunkard—

3689. (By the Chairman.) Do you know anything about the colonial system?—Not much.

3690. You don't know enough to give any evidence?—That is so. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.

MR. ANDREW FERRIER, Inspector of Poor, St. Cuthberts, MR. GEORGE GREIG, Inspector of Poor, City Parish, and MR. DANIEL F. STORY, Chairman, City Parochial Board, were called in and examined.

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.

3691. (By the Chairman.) Mr. Ferrier you are the Inspector of Poor for St. Cuthbert's Combination Board?—Yes.

3692. Would you please give the population of the parish?—The population is 179,679 within the city of Edinburgh, 13,493 within the burgh of Leith, and 2,299 in the landward district—in all 195,471.

3693. What is the rental of the parish?—The rental is £1,348,999.

3695. You mentioned that the figure (children boarded-out) 193 is exclusive of 61 separated from parents and included as dependants. What do you mean?—They are included in the 1,368 dependants, and therefore not taken in twice here, but besides the 193 who are boarded-out there are also 61, or 254 boarded out altogether.

3696. You say separated from parents. How are they thus separated?—They have been taken away from their parents on account of the dissolute habits of their parents.

3697. What power have you of separating them?—Only with the consent of the parents.

3698. You have no power whatever of separating a child from its parents except that way?—None whatever.

3699. And you don't do it?—No.

3700. What about your applications for relief?—The number of applications for relief made during the year ending 14th May last was 4,331. Of these there were 1,094 with 72 dependants, who had no home, but were leading a vagrant life.

3701. Give me the number of men and women in these figures?—Of the 1,094 vagrants, 774 were men, and 320 were women.

3702. Just explain a little what you consider a vagrant?—Well I consider a vagrant a person of no settled occupation and no home, but is just moving about the country, either begging or supporting himself or herself by casual labour where it can be got.

3703. Have you any reason to imagine that these vagrants occur in a ratio disproportionate to the number of the general population? Are you troubled with gipsies?—No; not in the least.

3704. You give the ages of these?—Of these 144 were under 30 years of age, 178 under 40, 200 under 50, 240 under 60, and 332 over 60 years of age.

3705. That shows that the number of presumably able-bodied vagrants—those under 30 years of age is very small?—Very small.

3706. As compared with those over 60 years of age?—Yes.

3707. And I suppose in a large number of cases vagrancy is resorted to owing to inability to get work?—Yes; that is my opinion.

3708. Give us their occupations?—The various occupations were principally labourers, hawkers, shoemakers, tailors, painters, charwomen, &c. I don't think out of the whole lot there were a dozen bona fide working men amongst them. Although they had followed these occupations presumably in early life, I don't think that at the present time they were following their occupation, but still stuck by the occupation learned in their young days.

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.
23 Nov. 1894.

3709. They said they were seeking work?—Generally seeking work.

3710. But many of them supporting themselves by begging?—Yes.

3711. Well, about these 332 over 60 years of age, were there many of them you could call fit for work?—No; none of them at all were what you could call able-bodied.

3712. In fact you could not have anything to do with them if they were?—No.

3713. And even these—the whole—were disabled in some way or other?—Some it may be only temporarily, but those over 60 years of age were disabled in some way or other.

3714. How do you generally deal with them?—The usual method of dealing with vagrants is to take them into the poorhouse.

3715. Do you send them for examination medically?—Yes; a certificate being sent along with them to the governor.

3716. That will take some time?—Yes.

3717. You have got 1,094. That would be three or four a day?—Yes; about that on an average.

3718. Then have you a medical officer always ready to attend upon them?—He attends at the chambers from one to two o'clock every day.

3719. If a vagrant wants to get a night's shelter, or a few nights' shelter in the poorhouse here, they are obliged to turn up before one or two o'clock?—We have difficulty with those turning up after that.

3720. I suppose many do turn up after that?—Yes; and we sometimes send them to the House of Refuge. We have an arrangement with the governor of that institution. We give a ticket to be taken in there, where they get supper and breakfast, and come to us in the morning.

3721. If they go there and get bed and breakfast there is nothing to prevent them resuming the tramp next morning?—Nothing whatever.

3722. So that they are better off than the fellows who go direct to the House of Refuge, and may be refused admission?—Well yes, I daresay, because we pay them 4d. a night for those we send there.

3723. Do you think that vagrants know sufficiently about the way that is done?—Oh yes. I have no doubt when they are refused they come to us. The difficulty is being able to get them into the poorhouse without a medical certificate when they apply late at night. If we had some means whereby we could take them into the poorhouse in any circumstances we would have fewer of them; but knowing we have no power to send them without a certificate, I know that many purposely wait till after the doctor leaves.

3724. Would that suggest the desirableness of a casual ward?—We have probationary wards, but even there they cannot be admitted without a medical certificate.

3725. Would you give us your views as to the movements of vagrants?—Vagrants seem to travel principally between the large towns, which are good begging grounds, and where they can make a living in this way for a few days; but, as the law against begging is generally strictly enforced in large towns, as soon as the tramp finds he is 'spotted' he makes off for other places, and thus succeeds in migrating between Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee, &c., backwards and forwards.

3726. We were told yesterday of tramps who were in the habit of going into the poorhouse in winter with their families, and when spring came round going out and resuming the tramp?—Yes.

3727. And we were told that on their way, whenever they wanted rest, they went and sought relief from the Parochial Boards in the different parishes through which they passed, and at the end of the year you would have the bills for their entertainment sent in to you?—That is so.

3728. Do they amount to much?—Oh yes; they do. I cannot tell you the amount, but I touch that question a little further on in my statement. I find that a great many apply more than once. One man,

I find, applied 18 times last year, another 9, several 8, and several 7, 6, and 5 times.

3729. Always here?—Yes. And a great many oftener than once. Then another point you mentioned. Besides the frequency with which we have to deal with this class here, we find them turning up all over the country, going direct from one Inspector of Poor to another, and passing over the length and breadth of Scotland during the year. Last year one man had visited ten different places. Stirling, Dunfermline, Dysart (twice), Paisley, Hamilton, Old Monkland, New Monkland (twice), and Blantyre, and the cost of this—the bills from these places will come in at the end of the half year; a considerable amount. In many of these cases the only way of dealing with them is to order them home.

3730. Yes; but they would be out of the parish?—Yes, and as soon as we get them home, and have them a few days in the poorhouse, they start off again.

3731. Take this gentleman who has had this nice tour. You would not get in his bill from Stirling, for instance, until he got his way to Dunfermline, and when the Dunfermline people sent in their bill he would be somewhere else?—Oh yes; but we get notice of them. We get a notice that they have become chargeable, but we don't get the bill till the end of the half year.

3732. When do you get notice?—The moment they become chargeable.

3733. They have to write by first post?—Yes; or else they lose the advance made.

3734. All this must involve an immense amount of correspondence?—There is no doubt of it.

3735. And book-keeping?—Yes, and great trouble.

3736. Can he get out of these other poorhouses after 72 hours' notice?—In most of them I think. There are only two or three where there is the privilege of the 72 hours' notice.

3737. Is that statutory?—No; it is an order of the Board of Supervision.

3738. But in the other cases he can get out within 24 hours?—Yes.

3739. So that if he wishes to come back to Edinburgh by train, all he has to do is to allow you to order him back?—Order him back.

3740. And when you order him back, does he come back alone, or accompanied by any one?—Generally alone, but that very much depends on the state of his health, or on the certificate of the doctor. In many cases we have to remove them under the care of attendants, and although they find their way from here to Perth or Stirling by themselves, in many cases we have to be at the expense of having an attendant with them were ordered back.

3741. These fellows are often very sharp are they not?—Yes.

3742. A man goes on the tramp, and finds himself, say at Inverness, and wants to get to Edinburgh, and does not want to tramp. He knows if he goes to the poorhouse you will order him back?—Yes.

3743. There is a great deal of difficulty about prisoners' railway fares. How do you manage to see that these are right?—The parish sending back either gives him money, or takes out a ticket.

3744. Yes, but we find it was said that prisoners who get tickets, were in the habit of not going by train, and selling their tickets?—I could not say we have had anything of that sort; but I know, in my experience of many paupers who, after having been provided with tickets to the parish of settlement, and having been seen into the train at Waverley Station by attendants, have left the train at Haymarket, and the same day applied perhaps for relief to my friend, Mr. Greig, of the City Parish.

3745. And Mr. Greig was in the same box?—Yes. He would then require to intimate to the parish of settlement that this party who had been ordered home was now chargeable to him.

3746. What would occur then?—The same procedure, and sometimes with the same result.

3747. Where would he go from Haymarket?—He

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.
23 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.

23 Nov. 1894.

would walk back. But I never heard of any of them selling their tickets. It is possible they may do it.

3748. We will take the case of a man at Inverness. If he were ill, and required an attendant home, you would not feel inclined to force him home?—Certainly not.

3749. You would rather keep him there?—Oh yes.

3750. And as a matter of fact you won't often have to pay the expenses of an officer in attendance?—Not often. We don't grudge it where it is necessary, but what we feel is that sometimes medical officers won't take the responsibility of certifying that a man is fit to be sent home without an attendant, while the man himself tramps there perfectly easily without one.

3751. In the case of a journey from Inverness, we will say, you will have to give him something to enable him to live on the way?—Yes, he generally gets some provisions with him—some bread and cheese, or biscuits; but never money.

3752. Give us a few more of these cases?—I find another one had visited nine different parishes, another eight, another six, and there are many more examples.

3753. You have some figures that show the extent to which this moving about is carried on?—Yes. To show the extent to which it is carried on, I may state that the daily average number of inmates in the poorhouse is 483, yet last year the number of admissions was 1,606, and of those who left 1,618, showing the continual shifting backwards and forwards.

3754. That will give you about three days stay as the average?—Yes. One, I find, was no fewer than 13 times in the poorhouse in the course of the year. Others were 11, 10, 8, 7, and 6 times, and many others more than on two occasions.

3755. What would you suggest as a cure?—To cure this vagrancy and tramping through the country, my only suggestion would be that the law against begging should be as vigorously enforced in the counties as it is in the towns.

3756. Is the law enforced at all in the counties?—I believe it is to a certain extent.

3757. Then you have also a further suggestion about the detention of paupers?—Yes; that power should be given to Parochial Boards to detain paupers who are in the habit of going in and out the poorhouse for a longer period than at present (72 hours). The longest period we can detain a man at present, by the order of the Board of Supervision, is 72 hours, but only if he has been twice in in six months.

3758. And you propose to have power of detention from ten day, or even longer?—Yes, if possible. If we could keep him for ten days it would be a sort of punishment to him.

3759. That suggestion has been made elsewhere, but if a man on the verge of being able-bodied was detained, don't you think you might have some trouble with him?—I think not; because we could put him to work. We have test-labour departments in the poorhouse.

3760. Yes, but I see in one poorhouse there is a strike because the men don't get tobacco. Do you have any trouble with your people?—No; none what ever as a rule. Sometimes we have a rebellious inmate.

3761. Well, then, what do you do?—He is separated, and put to work by himself, and that very soon cures him. He generally leaves after being one or two days in a solitary place.

3762. He generally leaves, but these fellows you want to prevent leaving?—Quite so.

3763. And you cannot suggest that it should be made a crime on his part if he behaves in a disorderly manner?—We have no difficulty about that. If he does behave in a criminal way we hand him over to the police.

3764. We are told elsewhere that the taking out a disorderly inmate—ordering him to be put in confinement—is matter that gives rise to—? For a breach of discipline the governors have power to punish by confinement in a cell, or by taking dinner off; but where there is a case of assault or anything criminal they immediately send for the police, handing the offender over to the Civil Authorities. We have no difficulty in that.

3765. You have further suggestions?—I would also suggest that, in the case of inveterate vagrancy and idleness, they should be sent to a labour settlement, where they would be compelled to work for themselves and families.

3766. That is to say that in the younger class of able-bodied men there is more idleness than anything else?—There are numbers, I think, with whom there is nothing more wrong than idleness.

3767. We have not got any labour settlement. Have you any definite idea about that?—My idea is hazy; but I think there are settlements of the kind in Germany.

3768. That is so; but you cannot give any evidence about that?—No; I cannot give any information.

3769. We will assume we have had certain information on the subject. You then would require to enforce labour?—Yes.

3770. And that would bring about the necessity for punishment?—Oh yes, it would.

3771. Would you again send the fellows back to prison?—Well no; I think that in a settlement provision could be made for punishment.

3772. In dealing with your inmates do you get much work out of them?—A great deal.

3773. Have you any figures as to the value of the work?—I don't know that I have. Our firewood manufactory has been increasing very much of late. Our firewood account for last year shows that for wood purchased we paid £555, 3s. 10d., and the sales for the year were £759, 1s. 10d.

3774. That represents a good deal of work—it represents £200 towards expenses?—Yes. Of course, it may represent more, because there might be stock in hand. It represents £300.

3775. You would not feed your inmates on that?—It always helps.

3776. But what I mean to say is how far we should consider the labour of that class as contributing to the support of such a settlement?—Oh yes. Well, of course, I don't say that the settlement might be strictly self-supporting, but I think the labour to be got from these men would in a great measure help to support them.

3777. Then have you any system of awards?—No.

3778. You don't give tobacco?—We do give tobacco; but only to those above a certain age.

3779. You never give them any award?—Sometimes the governor has it in his power to give an extra bit of tobacco. Those who are hard-worked get beef, but in the stick-factory we have introduced a circular saw, so now there is no hard work. The cross-cut saw was considered hard work, and the men working it got beef.

3780. What other industries have you there?—That is the principal. There is hair-teasing, and stone-breaking to some extent.

3781. I suppose these are rather as tests?—Yes; and they are not profitable. Neither is oakum, which we have almost given up, it being so unremunerative.

3782. Do you find much difficulty in keeping them at work?—No, we have no labour tests.

3783. You let them amuse themselves?—Yes; I have seen them doing little else than that. In fact I have seen them falling asleep over their work.

3784. Now let us go on to your inebriates?—Yes. Of the 4,331 applications made for relief last year I would attribute 486 of these as being caused by drink.

3785. That is very small?—About 11 per cent.

3786. Is that an exceptionally high, or low, or an average year?—I think it is an average year. Out-door relief in St. Cuthbert's Combination is the rule; only those being sent to the poorhouse who have no home, and no one to take care of them, or those whose characters are known to be drunken and dissolute.

3787. And that would mean that you have to deal

Mr. Andrew
Ferrier.

23 Nov. 1894.

- Mr. Andrew Ferrier.*
23 Nov. 1894.
- with a better class of poor than in parishes where there is very little relief given?—There is a better class of poor in Edinburgh than what you find in Glasgow, or Dundee, or other manufacturing towns.
3788. Proceed with your statement?—When paupers are placed on the out-door roll they are visited and reported on at least four times a year, and in many cases where there is suspicion, oftener. Owing to the searching inquiries made before a pauper is placed on the roll, it is rare to find cases where lapses to drunkenness occur, but there are cases every year, although not many. Last year there were 5,158 cases chargeable on the out-door roll, and of these 23 were struck off on account of drink.
3789. Did they go into the poorhouse?—Some of them did. Some did not.
3790. About your indoor cases; you could not tell us what percentage of these were due to drunkenness?—Oh, I should think about the same. We have a great many respectable people in the poorhouse who go there through old age and disability.
3791. You have told us about those boarded-out children separated from their parents?—Yes.
3792. And it is with the consent of their parents. Do the parents ever give you any trouble?—They do very often. When they have been under our care for a time the parents turn up and bother us about their children. We invariably resist them as far as we can, but in many cases we have had to give them up.
3793. Do you suggest that any right should be given to you?—Yes. I think that where the parents are proved to be drunken and dissolute, we should have the power of taking and keeping the children by force until they are sufficiently able to work for themselves.
3794. That is to say you will take the trouble of going to the expense of bringing up the child when there is hope of its turning out useful. Would you like to be able to claim the custody?—Yes.
3795. Could you not get that custody under 'The Cruelty to Children Act'? I think there is some provision there?—Well, I am not very well acquainted with the Act.
3796. Who is your law-agent?—Mr. Addison Smith, S.S.C.
3797. You would get your law-agent to write our secretary a letter on that point?—Yes, I might do it myself, after looking at the Act.
3798. What I want to know is whether, under the Act in question, desertion of children, necessitating their removal to the poorhouse, might not be considered as justification for the custody of the children being transferred to the Parochial Board?—I will look at the Act and let the secretary know.
3799. And you would never think of claiming their custody except subject to the decree, if necessary, of the sheriff, or some other authority?—Quite so.
3800. Do your children turn out well?—Remarkably well. We had some who have taken respectable positions in society.
3801. Do many turn out to be paupers, or go to prison?—Very few; there have been cases.
3802. You have something to say about methylated spirits?—Yes; I have a statement that we find this drinking of methylated spirits is a cause of the great increase in drunkenness among the poor. Bottles of this stuff are taken from the applicants themselves. It seems to make them ill altogether.
3803. Is it 'finish'?—No; what I refer to is methylated spirits.
3804. In Glasgow they buy what is called 'finish'?—Yes; but it is not so bad as that.
3805. It has a mixture of shellac?—I think there is a mixture of that in methylated spirits too.
3806. It gives it a body?—Yes.
3807. Is that form of drinking more common among women or among men?—I think there are more women drink methylated spirits than men.
3808. Where do they buy it?—Either at the druggist or drysalter.
3809. Have you any suggestion to make as to how the sale could be regulated?—I really could not say.
- It is used for trade purposes to such an extent that really there is difficulty in suggesting what should be done.
3810. We have great complaints from Glasgow about men and women who, having gone into the poorhouse, leave in a day or two, get drunk, are taken to the Police Office, sent to prison for a few days, come out, and if they don't get drunk enough again return to the poorhouse?—We have many of these cases.
3811. Would your remarks about compulsory detention apply to them?—Yes, certainly; that is the class I have in view.
3812. You said in connection with vagrants?—But the class of people I mention now are not vagrants.
3813. Oh yes; living between poorhouse and jail. Have you many of them?—We have several of them.
3814. How many will you have?—I should fancy about a dozen or so. Perhaps more.
3815. Are they men or women?—They are pretty equally divided. We have both men and women.
3816. Are they very troublesome?—They are. They are of that class who generally know the working of the parochial law, and generally turn up after office hours at night.
3817. In Glasgow we were informed of the case of one notorious character—whom one of the officers had to devote a large amount of his time in looking after her?—I have one of my worst cases in my mind. It occurred some years ago. It was that of Arthur Boswell and his wife, a couple who were continually 'out and in,' or living between poorhouse and jail. We entreated them to give up their children—a family of three or four, but they would not. On one occasion, however, when both father and mother were in prison, we sent the children—the parents being Roman Catholics—to an institution in Lanark, where we detained them.
3818. How did you do that?—We had several applications from the father and mother after they came out of prison for the restoration of their children, but I referred them to the sisters at Lanark. That put them off for the time; or perhaps I would ask them—generally they were drunk—to send me a written application for their children and I would lay it before the Board; this application never came. The children are now in Lanark, and are doing remarkably well. Father and mother are still going on as before. At present the wife is in jail, and only yesterday I heard that Boswell had turned up at Dalkeith poorhouse and kicked up a row there. He deals in methylated spirits, and the stomach pump had to be applied.
3819. Did you thank the doctor?—The case does not belong to me now. I have no interest in him.
3820. As a matter of fact, can you tell me, could not you be held personally responsible for these children if the man chose to raise an action?—No. I think it would be time enough to give up the children when the Court ordered it.
3821. We were told in Glasgow that with a number of habitual paupers there was very little difficulty. They might refuse to take them in, but then, if they applied to the sheriff the Board had to provide an agent to conduct their application, and pay for its own defence, and the process of refusing assistance was so costly that it was almost impossible to pay it?—That is so. The order of interim relief costs 3s. 6d. to begin with, and after that the lodging of defences necessitates a legal process, and it is never done; because we have not only our own expenses to meet, but the expenses of the pauper's agent as well, whether we are successful or not.
3822. You have got a very varied sort of parish—Edinburgh, Leith, and the country?—Yes.
3823. Have you any remarks to make as to any differences you find in these different parts?—No. Our landward district is entirely agricultural or suburban, and there is no pauperism in it whatever.
3824. Leith?—Leith is much the same as Edinburgh.
3825. Have you much begging in the landward portion?—Sometimes; by parties coming into town.
3826. Except in the country districts the law is enforced against begging?—It should be as stringently enforced in the country as it is in the town. It might prevent vagrancy to a large extent.
- Mr. Andrew Ferrier.*
23 Nov. 1894.

Mr. George Greig.

23 Nov. 1894.

MR. GEORGE GREIG examined.

Mr. George Greig.

23 Nov. 1894.

3827. (By the Chairman.) Mr. Greig you are Inspector of Poor of Edinburgh City Parish?—Yes.

3828. And you have been an inspector for 40 years?—Yes.

3829. Firstly in St. Cuthbert's and lastly for 35 years in the City Parish?—That is so.

3830. Would you please explain why Edinburgh parish is such a hunting-ground for vagrants?—Well, we have almost the whole of the common lodging-houses in the city parish. Besides, we have the Night Asylum, which may be called a vagrants' hotel; because it is kept up by gentlemen for the purpose of supplying these vagrant travellers with a night's lodgings, and supper and breakfast, I believe.

3831. And the way you speak of it you think it does more harm than good?—Well it enables these people to continue their mode of living.

3832. It attracts them to your parish?—It certainly brings them to our parish.

3833. You mention also as among the causes of vagrancy that the parish has in its centre the police office and prison?—Yes.

3834. Have you many prisoners gravitating to you?—We have a number. They get railway tickets from the jail authorities to go home to the parish from which they came, but they frequently dispose of these tickets and try Edinburgh as a good begging ground.

3835. Have you any suggestions to offer on that point?—I have not.

3836. How many discharged prisoners have you just now?—We have not more than two or three of them at a time.

3837. And I suppose that unless they have got a settlement in your parish you have to send them home?—We have to claim on the parish of settlement, if we can prove it.

3838. You say that the vagrants have generally a good knowledge of the poor law?—They have.

3839. And they make a statement that they suffer from rheumatism or lumbago, and so cannot work, and you say that that is easily admitted without a medical certificate?—Yes; and the doctor in that case generally accepts their statement.

3840. Have you many people whom you suspect to be able-bodied foisted off on you in that way?—A good many.

3841. Can you give us any idea of the number?—No. They come only occasionally; but I may say this, that since they adopted in England the plan of putting paupers by themselves in the casual wards, some 10 or 12 years ago, we have had a good number of English beggars, and they appear to be thoroughly conversant in these questions, and in the mode of overcoming the doctor.

3842. But in England there is no necessity for doing that. They have a right to get into the casual wards?—Yes, but after that rule was adopted they thought they would try Scotland for a begging ground, and a large number came here. That first year I had as many as 20 English vagrants at one time.

3843. Have you any now?—We have a few still; but not so many. Before that I had no English vagrants.

3844. I should have thought that the provision made in England for their reception would rather have tended to induce Scottish vagrants to go to England?—Well the rule, I believe, was considered unsatisfactory by the vagrant class at first.

3845. What rule?—That for putting them into a private place by themselves, and making them earn their breakfast or dinner as the case might be.

3846. The work itself?—Yes.

3847. (By Miss Stevenson.) Within the last 15 years?—I think so.

3848. (By the Chairman.) When was the labour equivalent so introduced?—I cannot give you the exact date.

3849. You have made up a list of the number of the class included under vagrants, beggars, and inebriates?—I have made up a list of the general class, and I find we have 131 of that class with whom we have been dealing. Of these 27 were above 65 years of age, 73 between 65 and 45 years of age, and 31 under 45 years of age. These people have been chargeable to the parish for periods ranging from 150 times downwards.

3850. You have stated 150. Give us a few above 100?—We have Mary Glen, 64 years of age, a woman who has been perhaps 200 or 300 times chargeable to the parish, and who has had four illegitimate children. She was chargeable to the parish before I came to it, and she is still going out and in; a strong, sturdy woman. She has been a very serious burden to the parish. She just tramps the country when not in the poorhouse or in the jail.

3851. Does she take the children with her?—No. We took them from her. They are, however, all dead but one. We brought it up. She got a hold of it when about 14 years of age, and she dragged her down to her own level. That is to say she got her married to a man of her own stamp, a drunken blackguard, a very great trouble to the parish, and who ill-used her that she left him, and is supporting herself in the country somewhere.

3852. Give us another specimen?—Then we have two sisters—very notorious. Helen Dolan or Davies, and Ann Dolan or Hall, who migrate between the poorhouse and the jail, and who have both been chargeable to the parish upwards of 100 times; while I believe one of them has been at all events 200 times before the magistrate. One of them is 39 years of age, and the other 41. They are strong, healthy-like women, but they always go and get drunk, and the doctor certifies 'inability.' Sometimes he calls it 'alcoholism' that is the matter with them.

3853. And is that a qualification for getting in?—Yes. They are 'unable to work' he says, and we take them into the poorhouse then. After they get tired they go out, get drunk, and the police have them in the jail for a while. When the sentence is over they come back to the poorhouse.

3854. I suppose you have got a number of these cases where you have had them in the poorhouse hundreds of times?—I have 131 here, and they are of that class I have mentioned. You asked Mr. Ferrier of any instance of a man going to Inverness. I give you the case of the husband of one of the Glens—Charles Martin. He went to Inverness this last year. I got a claim for him. He told the inspector I knew him very well, which was quite true. I said that was so, but I could not find a settlement in Edinburgh; and therefore I refused to have anything to do with him—that if he was born in Edinburgh, I had no evidence, and Inverness could not get a settlement against me. He left Inverness. He tramped further. I got another claim. I gave the same refusal, and he had to tramp all the way home, applying to five or six parishes on the journey.

3855. Has he come to you now?—He came back, and is in the poorhouse again.

3856. Has he got a settlement in Edinburgh?—He has not; because we have no proof of it.

3857. You are not bound to keep him?—When he comes to me I am bound, but if he goes to any other parish in Scotland, I am not.

3858. I thought you had not to support him unless he had a settlement?—We are bound to supply relief to every person within the parish who is not able-bodied, whether there is a settlement or not.

3859. Then what is the use of settlement at all?—Oh, the settlement; of course it is a question rather between parishes. If a man goes to another parish, and has a settlement in Edinburgh, that parish has a claim on me.

3860. And if there was settlement question?—He could go to any parish he pleased then.

Mr. George
Greig.

23 Nov. 1894.

3861. Why would he get in?—Oh, well, he 'has 'rheumatism, and so on.' Or 'he has been in India,' and I daresay, as many others do, suffers more or less in consequence. He is a very useful man in the house.

3862. You have heard what Mr. Ferrier has said about tramps going about. Have you any recommendation to make, or do you approve of his recommendation?—I wish to say that I quite concur in all Mr. Ferrier has said, except with regard to admission to the poorhouse. We are rather better placed than he is, in that we have a resident medical officer, so that I can send in at any time. I have the sanction of the Board of Supervision to send in, provided I call attention to the fact that the party sent is not certified, but may consult the medical man at the house. I don't require to apply to the House of Refuge or any other place.

3863. Do you approve of the suggestion for compulsory detention?—I am afraid that compulsory detention would not do much good. As to punishment, the more you punish these people permanently, the worse you make them. The most desirable thing would be if we could take some reformatory measure.

3864. You don't ask for powers of detention?—I don't know that that would do any good, unless it were for a very extended detention. It would require to be for a year or two years as the case might be, in the hope of getting these people to work for their own support. I agree with Mr. Ferrier's suggestion that some reformatory arrangement might be adopted by which these people might be sent to an institution and detained there, similar to the Industrial or Reformatory Schools.

3865. But so far as you are concerned from a Parochial Board point of view you don't want powers of detention?—No.

3866. Mr. Ferrier wanted powers of detention, and he wanted powers of detention in the case of children of the tramps as against their parents when they turned up?—Certainly. We desire to have that too. We just now are acting on the Custody of Children Act, and we refuse to give children up to parents on the strength of it.

3867. Could you give me a reference to that Act? What is the Act?—The Act of 1871, I think.

3868. (By Miss Stevenson.) No; is it not 1892?—I am not sure at present.

3869. (By the Chairman.) What power does it give?—It applies to England and Scotland both, and it empowers the Parochial Board or the Board of Guardians to keep children whose parents do not manage them properly, or who desert them for a certain period—a year I think it is—unless the parents repay the advances.

3870. Could you give us a reference to that—the section of the Act which gives you these powers?—I could, but not at present, not having the Act before me.

3871. Will you then please fill in this when you get a copy of your evidence?—I will.

3872. You think that these are ample powers?—I don't say they are ample. Others wish to get an amendment.

3873. Mr. Ferrier has told us, and we have had other people making the suggestion, showing that they were ignorant of any satisfactory legislation on the subject. How does it happen that Parochial Boards and inspectors who are always having conferences and so on don't work on the same lines?—I cannot say, but the Act was made not applicable to Scotland at the time, and I got Lord Advocate Robertson to put in Parochial Boards in one of the operative clauses. It certainly gives good powers, but perhaps not powers to take the children in the initiative. It wants initiative powers.

3874. We may understand that your recommendations so far as they prove you to be concerned, do not agree with those of Mr. Ferrier. You don't want powers of detention?—That is so.

3875. Or you don't care, or ask for them?—What I say is this, that I doubt very much that any punitive action would not improve these people. If we are to have an improvement of them then it would require to be some reformatory arrangement.

3876. You agree with him in his reformatory arrangement?—Yes, I do.

3877. And it would not be any particular advantage for you to get powers to detain these people oscillating between prison and poorhouse?—I am afraid not.

3878. Do you find any trouble with them?—We have plenty of trouble with them.

3879. Would it not ease your trouble?—It would lessen our labour.

3880. And would it not lessen the public scandal?—Certainly; if we had the power of detaining and locking them up in the poorhouse. It would, and so far as it goes we have sufficient power to stem over a considerable period; but if it is only to be a few weeks more—we have 72 hours already—I don't think that would improve the people.

3881. Your proposals of improving the people are identical with Mr. Ferrier's, but you want to take them to some Reformatory?—Yes.

3882. From the Parochial Board point of view, are we to understand that you would or would not like powers in the case of these habitual frequenters to detain them in the way Mr. Ferrier has suggested, or for a longer period?—Yes; I should certainly say if we are to detain them it should be for as long a period as you could give. A few days makes nothing to these people. It must be for a considerable time if any good is to be done.

3883. We understand from both of you that there is no power of detention in the country poorhouse?—That is a privilege given to certain large poorhouses. We applied to the Board of Supervision for it.

3884. About methylated spirits; have you anything to say?—I don't think that has been so bad with us as it was. It was very bad at one time, and we applied to Government to make some amendment on the law, and I think there was some amendment made then as to not selling it on Sunday—some clause of that sort. With us it has very much disappeared. There are, perhaps, two or three of the very worst characters taking it still; but I do not find so much of it taken as formerly.

3885. What are your regulations about letting paupers out on Sunday?—They don't get out at all. A man must ask 24 hours before Sunday if he means to go out—either on the Saturday night or the Monday. I wish to say with regard to that class, that what we feel is this. They are the great drag to our machinery. We make all our arrangements at the poorhouse to meet that class. Mr. Ferrier has spoken about the stick factory, the breaking of stones, and all these arrangements, and therefore the great expense of the Parochial Board is incurred on their account; and if there was some arrangement by which they could be put into some reformatory, then the parochial machine would be much more simple and inexpensive.

3886. Do you think the Parochial Boards would be willing, in consideration of that, to consent to make a contribution out of the parish funds to such Reformatories as are spoken of?—I am quite sure the Parochial Boards would do that.

3887. And you, Mr. Ferrier?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I think so.

3888. Do you think they should have power to do so?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I think so.

3889. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is there any reason why one of the seven poorhouses within a radius of 12 miles of Edinburgh should not be utilised as a Reformatory?—No reason that I know of.

3890. Then you think that one of these institutions might be set aside as a Reformatory?—I think so.

3891. That would lead to little or no cost, as the institution already exists?—Yes.

3892. In that case, supposing one of the Parochial Boards were willing to give up one of the places for the detention of these people, would it be an easy matter for that Board to make arrangements with some of the

Mr. George
Greig.

Mr. George Greig.

23 Nov. 1894.

other Boards to send the respectable inmates to one institution, whilst they handed over their own building to be devoted solely for the purpose of vagrants and inebriates?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I think such an arrangement as that might be come to.

3893. Is there not some talk of amalgamation of the parishes in Leith and Edinburgh?—(Mr. Ferrier.) There is some talk of amalgamation, but I don't think any one would hold the poor of both towns.

3894. In introducing the circular-saw do you think it is a desirable thing to reduce manual labour? Don't you deprive the men of available work?—(Mr. Ferrier.) We still keep them occupied, but it deprives them of work by which they earned extra rations. We found that when they earned these they were willing to remain, rather than go outside. We find it is a greater test; wood-chopping by the hand entitled them to extra beef.

3895. If you had the power of detention you seek, would you think of associating dissolute people with the respectable poor?—(Mr. Ferrier.) No. Certainly not. They are not at this present moment associated. They are classed.

3896. I would like to ask Mr. Greig about the powers of detention—ranging from twenty-four hours to three days, what object had you in getting those powers?—(Mr. Greig.) Just to prevent these people running out and in.

3897. Would not that apply still more in asking further powers?—(Mr. Greig.) Certainly; so far as officials are concerned it would lessen labour; but what I am afraid of is that so far as the poor people are concerned it would do them really no good.

3898. What harm could possibly come to them confined for 12 months, say working in an open yard or in a field?—(Mr. Greig.) If you say 12 months in an open yard. I am quite agreed if you had such a period of detention. I thought you meant to confine them for 20 or 30 days.—(Mr. Ferrier.) The class particularly aimed at, in asking 72 hours, is one that would dismiss themselves to-day and be in to-morrow.

3899. The dissolute, worthless people?—(Mr. Ferrier.) And when they had to remain for three days they were more cautious.

3900. Do you know anything of the German system of dealing with vagrants and tramps?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I have heard of it and read of it, and it is from it I have taken the idea of a labour settlement.

3901. In Germany they utilise the poorhouse as wayside relief, a day's march between each station. Each tramp has to present himself there, and gets lodging, and then goes on to the next station, and after he has gone the round he is dealt with penally. Would you approve of that?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I would. I would hardly go the length of establishing stations; but if we found a man going round the circuit more than once, and becoming chargeable more than a certain number of times, he should be dealt with penally.

3902. Have you not got poorhouses near all the highways of Scotland at a distance of from 12 to 20 miles apart?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Well there may be at greater distances than that.

3903. (By Miss Stevenson.) I understand, Mr. Greig, that your Board was one of the first that adopted the system of boarding-out children?—(Mr. Greig.) Yes.

3904. And you have found it very satisfactory in cases where you have been able to retain the children long enough so that they could acquire good habits?—Quite.

3905. Is it your experience that, when they become of age to be of use as wage-earning boys and girls, the parents can reclaim them?—Yes; but we have refused to give them up; and since the passing of the Act I mentioned we have never been challenged, by any action.

3906. You have never had a parent demanding the custody of his children from you through the Sheriff Court?—Not since then.

3907. And for more than 20 years you have found in the City of Edinburgh Parish that you have had sufficient power to retain the custody of these children?—We have done so at all events. Our action has not been challenged.

3908. Then I understand in your parish, and in yours Mr. Ferrier, you have rather discouraged the sending of children of that class to the Industrial Schools?—(Mr. Ferrier.) We have.

3909. But under the Industrial Schools Act you could have had power to separate children from their immoral and dissolute parents?—(Mr. Greig.) We have that power certainly.

3910. But you prefer the boarding-out system?—(Mr. Ferrier.) We find it far more successful. The children turn out far better as a rule.

3911. Of course the evidence you would have is more negative than positive as to the subsequent career of these children; but I understand very few of them have ever again become chargeable to the parish?—(Mr. Greig.) Very rare cases.

3912. Except when they have been recovered by the parents?—Yes.

3913. Then with regard to another class, the case of unfortunate women. Do you have them going out and in very often?—(Mr. Greig.) Yes, very often.

3914. Do they come from prison?—Yes, generally.

3915. You have a separate ward for them, I understand?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Yes.—(Mr. Greig.) Yes.

3916. In the case of children boarded-out are a large number illegitimate?—(Mr. Ferrier.) There are a number of them.

3917. Have you a large number?—(Mr. Greig.) About a third.

3918. And in the case of these children do you require as a condition that the child should be boarded-out that the mother shall remain in the poorhouse?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Oh no.—(Mr. Greig.) We often board-out the child and dismiss the mother.

3919. But the mother must have become chargeable and been in the poorhouse?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Yes.

3920. You referred to the Cruelty to Children Act. You are aware that the police authorities are trying to carry out a scheme whereby neglected children shall be cared for in the way of clothing and so on, so that the drunken parents may be brought within the reach of the law. Is it in your experience that they have in any case ever punished parents for cruelty to their children?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Oh yes, we have had cases in which the police have punished parents; but not through this scheme.—(Mr. Greig.) I have no knowledge of that.

3921. Your opinion is, Mr. Greig, that these two institutions, the House of Refuge and the Night Asylum, are attractions to come to Edinburgh?—(Mr. Greig.) Certainly.

3922. And in St. Cuthbert's you use the House of Refuge?—(Mr. Ferrier.) Yes; and they know when coming to Edinburgh they have a place they can put up at.

3923. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is there any objection to utilise the spare accommodation that you now possess for the reformatory system, which you indicated, if you are allowed power for the confinement of these habitual offenders for long periods?—(Mr. Greig.) I see no objection to that, unless this, that it would be far better to separate them from the poorhouse—not to give them the poorhouse idea.

3924. But I am supposing you would classify the people, and have part of the establishment devoted to this particular class, and the other to the deserving poor?—Perfectly; but the detention in a poorhouse would have an injurious moral effect.

3925. On the people?—On the people. Rather put them in an institution which would not have attached to it the same stigma.

3926. Do you think going to a Reformatory would sound better?—Well, I would not like to call it a Reformatory, give it some better name.

3927. What name would you suggest?—Well, 'Home'.—(Mr. Ferrier.) Industrial Settlement. I am distinctly of opinion that they should not be dealt with in a poorhouse at all, but in a separate institution.

Mr. George Greig.
3 Nov. 1894.

3928. (By Dr. Farquharson.) As to the able-bodied tramps; do you think there is any chance of reclaiming these people?—(Mr. Ferrier.) I think so, if put to work.
3929. They are not incurable?—I think not.
3930. Do you think so by some forcible detention and keeping them at work for a while?—I have no doubt they would pick up and become useful citizens.

3931. Then idleness is not an incurable disease?—I think not. It could be made curable.

Mr. Daniel F. Story.
23 Nov. 1894.

Mr. DANIEL F. STORY examined.

3932. (By the Chairman.) You are Chairman of the City Parochial Board?—Yes.

3933. And you wish to add that it is your view in regard to vagrants that the only cure possible is compulsory detention?—Yes.

3934. What is your experience in the country life of vagrants?—We have them coming continually to our farm steadings, and we find fires taking place, and we can get no other explanation of these fires than that they are occasioned by the presence of tramps. The policemen just now can convict if they are found sleeping in an out-house, but not for begging, and unless they are found in these places nothing can be done.

3935. Have you any suggestions?—I think that the power we have in burghs as to begging should be extended to counties.

3936. Have you experienced anything in the way of masterful begging?—Only the other day I was asking the policeman, near our place in Peeblesshire, and he told me they are more than masterful. If tramps call in lonely districts when the men are absent the women are terrorised. These women even went the length of giving up their children's playthings when demanded.

3937. Did they ever take any of your sheep?—No.

3938. They are not sheep stealers or anything of that sort?—I have not heard that.

3939. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Are these fires, do you think, accidental?—I believe they are generally accidental; but it is through the carelessness often of tramps who smoke.

3940. Are they ever out of revenge?—That may be, the farmers and the cottars will not give evidence against these tramps for fear that they set fire to the place, and it is very difficult to get a conviction. There was a fire very near our place last year, and there were none of their own people near it, but there were tramps.

3941. (By the Chairman.) You have no evidence—no knowledge of wilful fire-raising in revenge for refusal of assistance having been done?—Only suspicion.

3942. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think the Parochial Boards in Edinburgh would have any difficulty in negotiating for the purpose of setting aside one poorhouse? Could that be harmoniously arranged?—I should expect so.—(Mr. Greig.) We would require leave or sanction.

3943. Would it not be desirable that the Boards should negotiate as to the setting aside of one of these empty institutions?—I am certain you would have the concurrence of the Parochial Boards if one could be dispensed with.

3944. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Would not your proposal for extending the burgh powers to the counties be productive of great expense? Would it not seriously increase the police force?—I believe the example of even a few tramps being convicted would have a good effect on the others. [The three witnesses then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TENTH DAY.

Edinburgh, Tuesday, 27th November 1894.

PRESENT:—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman.)
Col. A. B. M'Hardy, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Sheriff DOVE WILSON.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

LIEUT.-COL. A. BORTHWICK, called in and examined.

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.
27 Nov. 1894

3945. (By the Chairman.) Please state to the Committee what your duties are?—I am Chief Constable of the Lothians and Peeblesshire.

3946. How long have you held that office? About ten years?—I have been Chief Constable of Mid and West Lothian for ten years, and Peeblesshire about two years, and East Lothian one year.

3947. Have you had any experience of burgh administration?—There are small burghs. I have Portobello, Musselburgh, Dalkeith, &c.

3948. These burghs are under the Police Act?—Yes.

3949. Under what Acts are the petty offences, with which we have to deal, dealt with in the counties? Is there any Act applying to the different counties—any Act dealing with petty offences—or are they under the common law?—Under the common law.

3950. Well now, do you find any difficulties in the common law which might be remedied by the adoption of any of the provisions of the Burgh Police Act?—Yes; I should say it would be a great advantage if the Burgh Police Act, as regards vagrants and habitual drunkards, were added in the counties.

3951. What is the condition of vagrancy and drunkenness under the present administration?—Here is the Act.

3952. Will you just give us the reference. I think it runs up to 14 days' imprisonment in the case of habitual offenders?—It does. I have put it down here in pencil. (Reading.) 'Burgh Police Act, 1892, section 381, sub-section 24—every person who, in any street, and in all public places within the burgh commits any of the following offences, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. for each offence, or a month's imprisonment.'

3953. Or a month's imprisonment?—Yes.

Lieut.-Col. A.
Borthwick.
27 Nov. 1894.

3954. Among the offences specified are?—Shall I finish it? (Reading.) 'Habitual drunkenness.'

3955-56. (By the Chairman.) You are going to another section. Don't specify the whole number of offences. We only want to deal with drunkards and vagrants?—(The Witness.) 'Section 381 (24)—drunk and incapable, and not under the care of a proper person.'

3957. (By the Chairman.) That they shall be liable to a penalty of 40s., or a month's imprisonment, and among the offences is 'drunk and incapable.' Well, is vagrancy under that?—No. section 408, 409, 410, 'suppression of vagrancy.'

3957A. Yes; but instead of referring to the section, give us the specific penalty enacted with regard to the specific offence. The question is, whether there are any provisions in the Burgh Police Act which you would like to see incorporated in the law relating to counties? You have had experience of both?—I am reading it to you. It is what I have read—'section 381, sub-section '24—every person who, in any street, and in all public 'places within the burgh, commits any of the following 'offences shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. 'for each offence, or a month's imprisonment.'

3958. That includes drunkenness?—Yes.

3959. Yes; but does it include vagrancy?—No. We pass on from that.

3960. (The Witness.) Shall I read to you the habitual drunkard's section, 382. (Reading.) 'Section 382—'habitual drunkards. It may be charged as an aggravation of the offence of being drunk and incapable that 'the accused person has, within the 12 months preceding, been three times previously convicted of such 'offence, and if the accused person is convicted he may 'be fined in addition 40s., or a month's imprisonment; 'or without the option of a fine, 14 days' imprisonment.'

3961. Would you like to see both those incorporated in the county?—Yes.

3962. You and the Chief Constable of Berwickshire and Roxburghshire have had a consultation on the various offences that have been referred to?—Yes.

3963. During the six years past there has been a census taken of the number and variety of tramps in your counties?—Yes. All over Scotland.

3964. And have they increased during that time?—No; the number is stationary.

3965. Do you say it has been repeatedly attempted to identify individuals, families, and groups, but that all such attempts have proved futile?—Yes.

3966. And what attempts have been made? How have they been made?—We tried to identify them, but could not manage.

3967. You say only a few prominent facts can be laid hold of—of the number of males, females, and children; but that there is a tendency to group themselves in the towns in winter, and the country in summer. So many English, Scottish, and Irish, but that you cannot go beyond that, except that the children are wholly illiterate. That is your experience and Mr. Porter's?—Yes, sir.

3968. How have you had the opportunity of testing the children?—We could only ask them if they had been educated at all.

3969. Is that a question in the census?—No. Not in the bi-annual census, but I had a special census taken lately.

3970. Would you give us the results of that census?—It was a census of vagrants taken last week, on Friday, 23rd November 1894, between the hours of six a.m. and nine p.m., of vagrants, beggars, and migratory poor in the Lothians and Peebles.

3971. What are your results?—It is a long return.

3972. Give us the totals?—Local tramps or beggars in Midlothian—37 males; 13 females; 2 male children; 3 female children; total, 55. In West Lothian—10 males; 6 females; 3 female children; total, 19. East Lothian—4 males; 2 females; no children; total, 6. Peeblesshire—4 males; 1 female; total, 5.

3973. These are the local tramps?—Yes.

3974. Who keep within the county and don't go beyond it?—Yes.

3975. You have not got the total?—It is 85 local tramps or beggars.

3976. Do you think that is a great number in the four counties?—No. I do not.

3977. Then there are a number of others?—Yes. Stranger tramps. In Midlothian—98 males; 19 females; 2 male children; 1 female; that is 120. West Lothian—77 males; 23 females; 1 male; and 3 female children; total, 104. East Lothian—23 males; 5 females; total, 28. Peebles—11 males; 7 females; total, 18. Total altogether 270.

3978. And 85 odd local tramps?—That is so. Then persons on tramp, bona fide in search of work.

3979. That is another class?—Yes. I call the second class stranger tramps. Those on tramp in search of work are 117, and no children, in Midlothian; in West Lothian, 132, and no children either; East Lothian, 30; no children; and Peeblesshire, 7; total, 286.

3980. Is that number of tramps in search of work due to the recent trade disturbances, or is it your average?—It is about the normal. There is always about the same.

3981. Well now; first we will take your local tramps. Have you any information to give the Committee about them?—I think about Edinburgh, of course, a great many of them live in Edinburgh. They just go out for the day, and come back again at night. The census of those that have gone out of Edinburgh between the hours of six a.m. and nine p.m. on Friday, 24th November, was 140 of all sorts.

3982. Are they included in your other classes?—Yes. Then the ones at night came only to 46 who were challenged.

3983. Ones that went out of Edinburgh, or what?—Yes, went into the district. The first were the day ones. These are the night ones.

3984. You are now at the night census?—Yes. This is a different census. But the roads census round Edinburgh gave 140.

3985. Who came out during the day?—Yes; and then there were 46 during the night.

3986. Well, to take up the day classes. Have you anything to say to the Committee about local tramps.

3987. (The Witness.) You have not got the night census.

3988. (By the Chairman.) Well, would you go on with the night census as you have given the day?—From 9 p.m. on Thursday 22nd, till 2 a.m. of Friday 23rd November. Night census of the Lothians and Peebles. Midlothian, 240; West Lothian, 332; East Lothian, 126; Peeblesshire, 32.

3989. Making in all?—730.

3990. That will give you a great many more tramps at night than in the day-time. That would be accounted for by the fact that a number passed unchallenged in the day-time?—Yes; 641 during the day, and 730 at night.

3991. Well, then, how do you account for that increase of tramps at night?—Well, they are picked up. You find them in different places lying about.

3992. Yes, but it is simply that they have escaped you during the day?—Yes.

3993. How did you manage your census in the county at night?—We found them in different places—prison cells, houses of refuge, hospitals, poorhouses, in lodging-houses, and other houses, public parks, gardens, and outhouses.

3994. That is the point. That is what we wanted to know, because a gentleman of that profession that we have interviewed told us that they sleep about kilns, and all sorts of out of the way places where they probably escape observation.

3995. (The Witness.) But I order the police to go everywhere where we are likely to find them. We find them about brickworks and such places.

3996. Then do you think that is a very large allowance of tramps for these four counties?—It is about the same. If you refer to the annual census you will find it is about the same.

3997. Then what do you ascribe this number of tramps to? Do you think you have insufficient power for dealing with them?—I do not think we have a large number in comparison with other places.

Lieut.-Col. A.
Borthwick.
27 Nov. 1894.

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick. 3998. Have you had complaints about tramps in your county?—No; I cannot say we have.

7 Nov. 1894. 3999. You have no complaints of masterful begging?—A certain amount, but nothing to speak of.

4000. Do you desire any greater power for dealing with them?—I think it would be a great benefit if the provision of the Burgh Police Act as far as vagrancy and drunkenness—

4001. You have given us the provisions of the Act as to drunkenness, but you have not yet given us the provisions as to vagrancy. Perhaps you would give us them now?—(Reading.) 'Section 408—Every person 'found begging, or exposing wounds or deformities, or 'who shall cause or permit the exposure of children of 'tender age to the inclemency of the weather; or 'causing children to sing in any street or court, or 'common stair, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or 'for the purpose of inducing the giving of alms; and 'every person conducting himself as a vagrant, having 'no fixed place of residence and no lawful means of 'getting his livelihood, shall be liable for the first 'offence to a fine not exceeding 20s., or to be imprisoned 'for any period not exceeding 30 days; or to imprison- 'ment for such period, without the option of a fine; and 'for the second, or any subsequent offence, to be 'imprisoned for a period not exceeding 60 days.'

4002. Anything about fines?—Fine not exceeding 20s.

4003. You mention in this paper (vagrant census) 'classes one and two.' That is local vagrants and strange vagrants—'subsist chiefly by hawking cheap 'articles, mending umbrellas, street singing and 'begging'?—That is so.

4004. All over the four counties?—Yes.

4005. Do they require a hawker's license?—Yes. If they hawk they ought to have them. Of course a good many don't have them.

4006. Are many taken up for hawking without a license?—Yes; whenever they are caught.

4007. Have you any idea if that is a large number?—No; it is not.

4008. Class No. 3, that is of men in search of work, 'subsist chiefly begging as they travel along the roads, 'and occasional employment at public and other 'works.' Do they do much in the way of begging?—Yes; a good deal.

4009. On what authority do you class them as in search of work? Is it not a common practice of tramps of all sorts to say they are in search of work?—Yes, certainly, you just judge of their appearance, and if you look at their hands you see then if they are workmen.

4010. You mention in this analysis that the proportion of those who have got into trouble, that is of tramps of all classes, was in Midlothian, 30 per cent.; in West Lothian, 50 per cent; East Lothian, 15 per cent.; apparently none in Peeblesshire?—Well, a very small proportion indeed.

4011. How is it? Can you account in any way for the great disproportion that exists between these four counties—in West Lothian 50 per cent.; and East Lothian 15 per cent.; and Peeblesshire none?—Well, the one is a mining population, and the other is agricultural.

4012. Yes; but then the population is exclusive of the tramps?—Well a great many of them stay about mining districts.

4013. But these would be local tramps, and there are only 85 of them altogether?—Well, that is the number of local tramps, but all classes are found in mining districts.

4014. You have your analysis of tramps who get into trouble? How do you get your information about them?—Are you referring to the lot you have got here in the census?

4015. (By the Chairman.) The whole number?

4016. (The Witness.) Yes; the percentage is of the whole number.

4017. How do you get your information as to whether they get into trouble or not?—Well, we give an idea of what we think about them. It is simply an estimate.

4018. And it does not refer to these tramps, but is simply an estimate?—Yes, it refers to these tramps. Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.

4019. Yes, but you here single out 730 tramps, who are in these counties on that night, and you say the proportion of them who get into trouble is so-and-so. If you refer to this lot you bring a very serious accusation against them, unless you have some record by means of which you can substantiate it. We had in West Lothian 332 tramps on this night, and of these 50 per cent. or 166 got into trouble. Were they asked that?—No. It is just what I put down myself. What I mean is that 50 per cent. have been in trouble some time or other. 27 Nov. 1894.

4020. You say here that 'local tramps and beggars 'travel through Lanarkshire, Stirlingshire, Mid and 'West Lothian, Haddingtonshire, Berwickshire, and 'occasionally into the English counties.' This is, I suppose, from your own experience? Have you many genuine workmen? From your experience of 50 per cent. of the lot who get into trouble, they must be a bad lot taken as a whole. Do you think there are many genuine workmen in search of work among them?—There is a certain proportion, certainly. What do I state there?

4021. You mention here a large number—I think 186 workmen in search of work?—Yes.

4022. Nearly a half or a third of the whole. That is a large class. Have you any provision for their reception anywhere?—You will see it there. (Reading.) 'There is a night shelter house for a limited number 'of tramps at Stow, Fushiebridge, Musselburgh, Ratho, 'and Mid-Calder, where persons without means, and un- 'able to proceed further, are sheltered at the expense of 'the Parochial Authorities. Common lodging-houses at 'Portobello, Dalkeith, and Penicuik, where persons with- 'out means, and unable to proceed further, are also 'sheltered at the expense of the Parochial Authorities.'

4023. That will have to be done under all the formalities of the Scottish Poor Law? They have to apply to the Inspector of Poor?—Yes.

4024. And show that they are not able-bodied?—Yes, and probably go before a doctor. (Reading.) 'In 'West Lothian some of the Inspectors of the Poor 'provide females and children, or aged and infirm men, 'with tickets that entitle them to a bed at certain 'lodging-houses, the keepers of which have an agreement 'made with the Inspector. In East Lothian there are 'no shelter houses in the county, but Inspectors of 'Poor in the towns pay for lodgings for tramps who 'may break down on the way, and are not able to go 'further.' In Peeblesshire there is no provision in the county at all, except that the Poor Officers act in the same way. If tramps break down they put them into lodgings.

4025. Yes, but we have had even here, even in the case of large Edinburgh parishes, that the medical officer of the parish is only to be seen during certain hours, this certificate is necessary to enable a person to get relief from the Parochial Authorities, and there is no machinery for dealing with them—no vagrant machinery, under the Scottish law, if they apply after the time. Have you ever heard any complaints on that score?—No. I cannot say I have.

4026. Among those vagrants that were found sleeping out, about brick kilns, and hay stacks on this night, were there any women? This return does not distinguish between those who are in lodgings and those who are out?—I should not think so.

4027. If they had not money they would have to sleep out?—Yes.

4028. Have any cases been brought under your notice of children sleeping out in the same way?—No sir.

4029. If they were would you deal with them in any manner?—I think the Inspector of Poor—

4030. But the Inspector of Poor does not go about hunting up people in hay ricks?—I mean if the police find any of that sort, they would be handed over to the Inspector of Poor.

4031. But would they not deal with the parents for exposing their children?—Well, probably they would.

Lieut.-Col. A. Northwick. If the Inspector of Poor would not deal with them, I should say it would be the proper thing provided there is sufficient evidence of cruelty.

27 Nov. 1894.

4032. How are vagrants dealt with. For what offences in your counties? Is it for begging simply or for vagrancy?—We have no power to stop them from begging.

4033. No power to stop them from sleeping out?—Well, of course, if they are found sleeping in out-houses, and places like that, they are trespassing.

4034. Yes; but under the Scottish law of trespass how do you deal with them?—They are brought up under the Trespass Act.

4035. (Sheriff Dove Wilson.) A comparatively recent Act.

4036. (By the Chairman.) You don't deal with them at all in fact, except for trespass?—Just so. There were bye-laws passed by the sheriff and a committee some time ago, but there was a decision in the Court by which they were put aside.

4037. Bye-laws? Under what Act?—The 1889 Act.

4038. What 1889 Act?—The Local Government Act.

4039. Yes, but the Police Act does not apply to counties—the Burgh Police Act?—The Local Government Act of 1889 empowers County Councils to pass bye-laws for the suppression of vagrancy. There were bye-laws drawn up by the sheriff of this county, and a committee. They were sanctioned by the Secretary for Scotland; but owing to a decision of the High Court they were set aside.

4040. Can you give us a copy of the bye-laws, and decision which set them aside?—Yes. [Numbers and handed in.]

4041. The only two bye-laws that relate to vagrants are numbers four and five. (Reading proclamation No.

) 'Any street musician, or other person, who continues to sound or play any musical instrument, or sing in the neighbourhood of any inhabited house, after having been required by any inmate of such house, or by any officer of police to depart, and (5) every person found begging, or placing themselves, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing the giving of alms, and all persons conducting themselves as vagrants, having no fixed place of residence, and no lawful means of gaining their livelihood within the county shall be guilty of an offence under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 57, and shall be liable, on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 40s. in each case.' These are the bye-laws you refer to?—Yes.

4042. Have you got the Act there?—They are just on the lines of the Burgh Police Act.

4043. Yes; but I want to know what the power was.

4044. (Sheriff Dove Wilson.) I will bring it out when it comes to my turn.

4045. (By the Chairman.) What are the grounds on which these bye-laws were set aside?—This is the case. It is rather long. [No.]

4046. Would you tell us briefly?—This was a case of a man who pasted up bills on a place where he had not permission to do so. The bye-law provided that 'every person who writes upon, soils, defaces, or marks any wall, fence, hoarding, or building with chalk, or in any other way, or who without authority fixes or causes to be affixed . . . without the consent of the owner or occupier.' On 3rd May 1891.

4047. This is a long thing. I think if you would glance you eye over it.

4048. (By the Chairman.) I see the argument was that the bye-laws enacted that which was ultra vires of the County Council; that the bills did not fall under the head of nuisance. A nuisance was something offensive, and there was no proof that these bills were offensive. For the respondent it was argued that this bye-law was not in excess of the powers of the County Council under the statute. The powers given there were very wide. The bye-law in question was taken from the Burgh Police Act, 1862, sections 251-257 and 331, and Lord Young apparently upheld the contention of the appellant, that is on the bye-law referring to bill-sticking; but that has no bearing on the vagrancy?—Yes. They were upst together. If you go on you will see it.

4049. Yes, well, it does refer to it, but it does not seem to touch this at all. Lord Young says—'a notice put up on a fence by the roadside that a charity sermon is to be preached in the parish church for behoof of the destitute sick would be a bill put up in the County of Midlothian, and probably the owner and occupier of the lands enclosed within the fence might not have been convened to give their consent to the putting up of the notice, so that that would be an offence under this section. I may notice that the announcement of such a sermon would be of itself an offence under another of these bye-laws, namely the 5th, "that every person found begging," it is not said where except within the County of Midlothian, "or placing themselves, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing the giving of alms," is to be liable to summary conviction, and a penalty of 40s.' I think that is merely one of Lord Young's jokes?—I do not know. We took it seriously.

4050. The purpose of a charity sermon is to induce the giving of alms, and the notice might make the person who put it up liable for the penalty. Now, I think the provisions of the 5th section are just as clearly beyond the powers of the County Council as those of the first, although it is not necessary for the Court to decide that point. That is merely an obiter dictum. Has that point been tested?—I had instructions not to act on them at all, after that decision.

4051. (Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Practically that opinion is enough to stop them.

4052. (By the Chairman.) Do you know if any other counties have made bye-laws under this Act?—Yes. Most of the counties in Scotland, but then they are drawn up very much on the same lines as ours, and I fancy they don't act upon them on account of that decision.

4053. Well there was no decision in this case, because he expressly says 'although it is not necessary for the Court to decide that point.' Lord Trayner, who sits with him, simply declares that in his opinion this bye-law was beyond the power of the County Council, and the Lord Justice Clerk concurred. But you have not had any copy of bye-laws on the subject of vagrancy drawn up under this Local Government Act which are acted on?—No, I have not; I think on account of that decision no bye-law in any county is acted on. If we only had bye-laws it would do a great deal of good in the way of vagrancy, because we could get at begging in the county.

4054. What you want is this bye-law legalised?—Well, something of the sort. It was proposed to bring it in the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894.

4055. I see here it provides for a penalty not exceeding 40s. in each case. There is nothing said about imprisonment?—No.

4056. There would be a regular period of imprisonment considered equivalent to 40s. is there not?—Yes.

4057. I forget exactly the terms of the Burgh Police Act, but I think this is very much milder than the Burgh Police Act. The Burgh Police Act was 30 days, and on repetition 60 days. But can you tell the penalty in the way of imprisonment that is considered by the Summary Jurisdiction Act equivalent to a fine of 40s.? You don't happen to remember?—Well, I suppose a month's imprisonment.

4058. (Dr. Sutherland.) There is a regular tabulated scale under the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

4059. (By the Chairman.) That is true, but what I want to know is whether the county purpose such a heavy penalty as is proposed in that Act, or whether they propose something much lighter. I will put the question, and you can consider your answer. My point is—your county proposed a bye-law dealing with begging, and enacting that every offence should be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 40s. in each case. Beggars as a rule don't have 40s. to pay their penalty. We want to know absolutely and accurately what penalty in the way of imprisonment you would consider equivalent to a fine of 40s. ?—That is the usual thing—40s. or a month's imprisonment.

4060. You mentioned shelter-houses as being in a number of places. I see you and Mr. Porter recommend a State endowed Industrial School for the children of these vagrants ?—Yes.

4061. Do you wish a new form of school ?—Under the present system, somehow or other we do not get at the children. They are baffled backwash and forward between the Procurator Fiscal and the Parochial Boards. No one will take them in hand.

4062. If the children are arrested for vagrancy and brought before a magistrate he can commit them ?—They are generally sent back to the Inspector of Poor, who can place them in the workhouse where he cannot keep them against their will.

4063. Is not the machinery of the law such that if you made vagrancy an offence, they could then be committed under the machinery of State-aided schools ?—Well there is a difficulty about it. The schools must be written to and asked if they will take them. They can refuse them if they are Reformatories.

4064. (Mr. Stevenson.) They must be criminals before you can deal with them.

4065. (By the Chairman.) You propose to deal with the whole lot ?—I should not propose to deal with the children as criminals, certainly.

4066. You say the number of children in the Inspector's Report, for the year ending 15th March 1894, was 1,402 (summer census) ?—Yes; that is for all Scotland.

4067. You do not approve of shelter-houses ?—No.

4068. You think they only tend to draw a larger proportion of tramps to the district where they are situated ?—Yes. I can give you an instance. In East Lothian, where tramp-houses existed there, if you take the year 1884, there were 2,721 tramps put up at shelter-houses, and their names taken down. If you come to 1888, there were 2,584. The houses were given up then. We thought we would not go on with them, and the figures were reduced immensely. In 1892 there were only 849 tramps challenged in East Lothian, and in 1893 only 411. You would like to hear what the system was ? Up till May 1891, shelter-houses for tramps were provided at Dunbar, Haddington, and Tain, under the management of the police. The names and descriptions of each one getting shelter were taken and accounted for in the annual returns. Under the system, the Burghs and Parochial Boards contributed from £1 to £5 annually to the expenses for the upkeep of the houses, but in course of time some of the Boards dropped payment, and after the County Council came in the system was abandoned altogether. Hence the recent drop in the number of vagrants in the annual return. The figures for 1892 and 1893 show the number challenged. The other years show the number that got shelter for the year—that is the total number for the year.

4069. Yes, but the total number for the year getting shelter would be much greater than the total number challenged ?—Yes.

4070. Yes, but the police don't challenge every tramp they come across ?—They do. Each tramp is challenged by a great many police officers. The only way is to divide your number by three, or something of that sort, so that it is not at all very accurate.

4071. Do you know the sort of treatment they get ?—They got very fair shelter, fire, a blanket, and something to eat in the morning before they went.

4072. They were not luxuriously treated ?—No, but it was a great inducement.

4073. Did crime increase coincidentally with the admission of tramps ?—Certainly. It was most abject and squalid. There were a good many of these places, and the system was that in the morning the police officers marched them out of the place and in the direction they wanted to go, and often handed them on to another constable.

4074. Yes, but what business had the police to do so ?—The tramps found out that the police had no right to do this, and they all agreed that they would go to south, east, and west, and there were not enough of policemen to go with them, and they spread about, and begged and stole, and did a great deal of harm.

4075. Have you any statistics of crime on the abolition of the shelter-houses in the districts where the shelter-houses were situated ?—I have not got that here, but I could get it.

4076. What counties were these shelters in ?—East Lothian was the only county they were in.

4077. As a matter of fact in Haddington in 1885, when you had these shelters, and when you had these tamps—was not that the time when the tramps were at their highest ?—Yes.

4078. (The Chairman.) You had only 407 cases of apprehension for breach of the peace, petty assault, drunkenness, drunk and incapable, disorderly conduct, vagrancy and begging, prostitution and petty theft whereas in 1893, the number was 678.

4079. (The Witness.) Take 1886, there were 2,423 tramps challenged. That was the highest.

4080. (The Chairman.) Well in 1885 there were 851 apprehensions.

4081. (The Witness.) What were they in 1893 ?

4082. (The Chairman.) 678. When was the system done away with ?—May 1891.

4083. It was done away with in 1891, and you then considered that this decrease from 851 apprehensions in 1885, to 678 in 1893, is due to the suppression of these houses of shelter in 1891 ?—Well, I think so.

4084. Your attention has never been called to that point ?—I cannot say that it has.

4085. Well, were there any in any of your other counties ?—There was one at Stow, on Gala Water, Midlothian, but they found it such a nuisance there that they gave it up. Now the thing exists, but it is under the doctor.

4086. Do you know when it was stopped ? Four or five years ago. It was a small affair and could not influence the county ?—Yes, quite, but it was found to be a nuisance. A great many people came there, and when they went out they would beg.

4087. Well, of course, all these places must be a nuisance to people ?—And it brought people there. That was the chief reason.

4088. But you have also to consider there must also be a number of poor people, who are obliged, in seeking employment, to move about the country; who cannot afford trains and other conveyances, and whose case, in seeking agricultural employment, trains would not suit. Do you not think some sort of provision for them is desirable ?—It has been found that wherever they are, tramps have increased enormously. For instance, there is a charity by a man who died recently at Musselburgh, and the number of tramps there is very great—so much do the Musselburgh folks object to them that they applied to the Court there to get rid of it, and the decision was that they could not, and the tramps swarmed into Musselburgh, and the number gets larger every day.

4089. (The Chairman.) Charity covers a multitude of sins.

4090. (The Witness.) Would you like to get the particulars, they are interesting.

4091. (The Chairman.) Yes, certainly.

4092. (The Witness.) Mr. James McKelvie left £700 in trust to the Town Council, the interest of which was to be applied to persons passing through Musselburgh in search of work, who had no money. This money was invested, and the arrangement came into operation in 1892. The Inspector of Police looks after it, and gives tickets to persons who may apply for food and lodging. The interest received is £22 per annum. For this allowance the number of persons who applied from 1st February, 1892, till 31st December, 1892, was 505 males, 137 females, 173 children; in all, 715. In 1893 the total was 956; and to the end of October,

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.
27 Nov. 1894.

1894, 842 males, 152 females, and 130 children; total, 1,124; so that when it becomes known, it shortly goes up from 715 to 1,124. All these get a free ticket for a lodging-house for one night, and some get food also. Besides these, a good many were refused, chiefly because they had been relieved a short time previously—they came back, a good many of these people—and also on account of the money being done before the next instalment was due. About two-thirds of the people who apply for relief are common tramps, who go about the country pretending to be in search of work. They live principally by begging, and perhaps go into the poorhouse for a few months in winter. Tramps have greatly increased in Musselburgh since this arrangement came into operation. More want relief than can be supplied from this fund. The consequence is that they hang about the town, and either beg or steal. Numerous complaints are made to the police about beggars, but people as a rule decline to give evidence against them. This arrangement is not considered a good one.

4092. Musselburgh is under this Burgh Police Act?—Yes. I am of opinion that the tramps should not be relieved, without having a task to perform, and being under proper discipline. That is the English system, as you know, I daresay. I may state that owing to the numbers of tramps about town, the Town Council in 1892 took the opinion of counsel, with the view to get rid of this arrangement; but the opinion given was that the money could not be applied to any other purpose.

4093. You said 'I am of opinion.' That is your own opinion?—Yes.

4094. Do you then recommend the English system of casual wards?—Well, no. That opens a much larger question.

4095. You mentioned something about that?—Yes, I did; but I think the great thing for these habitual drunkards is if they could be put into some place of reformation, get a good long sentence, and be made to work.

4096. We are talking now about the vagrants. Vagrants get drunk when they can?—Yes. I think in that little report which Mr. Porter and I made, we touch on that. Under the English system they have these places at certain distances. The police give the tramp a ticket and pass him on. But what is the good? Thousands of tramps and no result.

4097. You do not approve of the English system?—No. They have not the same system in all the counties. Some treat the tramps better, and they all go there. The counties where they are not treated so well they leave.

4098. But it takes some time to make up their minds on that point. What I was going to ask was this. In Edinburgh they give a heavy sentence for begging—60 days. A man can with impunity beg in your counties. Do you find the heavy sentences in Edinburgh have driven out any beggars into your district?—It must have.

4099. But your attention has not been called to it?—I cannot say it has. I do not think a lot of the Edinburgh beggars would go out into the county.

4100. They scorn what they get there?—They take their chance of going on begging. I think the only way to do any good is to get at the children.

4101. You propose to deal with them under this Industrial School you proposed to us?—Yes.

4102. It is always a drawback to the nature of a proposition to have to start a fresh institution, and State aided. Do you see any way of getting at the children with what institutions you have?—Well, you see, it is optional for these schools whether they take them or not.

4103. Well, you have the Parochial Board?—Yes. But the worst of it is parishes do not work all the same way. It makes one think it would be better for the county to have one head Inspector of Poor, and have subordinates under him for each parish. Then there would be one system all through.

4104. Could not that be arranged by the present machinery, which gives the various steps from the Parish Council, to the District Council, and the County Council?—I dare say it will come, and it will make an immense improvement.

4105. There is no legal impediment to it?—Yes, there is at present, a great many cases of these children fall between the law and the Inspector of Poor. If a child is brought up, sometimes he is sent back to the Inspector of Poor for the parish. He won't do anything. The parish won't spend any money on the child.

4106. You say—re habitual offenders, vagrants, and the tramp variety, the men and women whose object is to live off the public by begging, cheating and purloining, and whose usual habit is to get drunk, and create disturbances in each village. You say that the way they are dealt with has no deterrent effect?—I don't think so.

4107. 'They generally plead guilty, and in nine cases out of ten the sentence does not exceed seven days.' Where are they sent to put in their time?—They are either sent to the head prison—

4108. What is your head prison?—Edinburgh. Or they have legalised cells for a certain number of them.

4109. Have you legalised cells in any of your districts?—Haddington.

4110. Are they much used?—Yes. At Haddington the number of cells is 18; and 14 days untried, and five days convicted. That is what we can do at Haddington.

4111. Are they much used?—Yes.

4112. Do you approve of the system of cells—of sending short sentences and petty offenders to these cells, as contrasted with sending them to prison?—Well, it answers in some places.

4113. But you have no distinct opinion on the point?—No.

4114. I have asked the question with regard to juvenile criminals?—I think the discipline is better at the chief prison at Edinburgh.

4115. In dealing with cases where there is assurance that the person has been previously convicted, there is a remand for eight days to give time to produce lists of previous convictions, and the magistrate might, under the Prevention of Crimes Act, sentence a man to three months' imprisonment, and you ask why not give a similar sentence to an habitual offender? That is your opinion and Mr. Porter's?—Yes. That would give them time to do some work in prison towards their maintenance.

4116. Do you propose to get over the difficulty in the way of women and children and dependents by sending them to State endowed Industrial Schools; and with regard to such schools you think they should be established and maintained by Government under the Prison Commissioners?—We only say Prison Commissioners because they are so efficient.

4117. (The Chairman.) They may be efficient, but I do not think they would be inclined to take on that special department.

4118. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) You were asked what penalty is attachable in the shape of imprisonment, where the money penalty does not exceed 40s. Is this the passage in the Act? (Reading.) '10s. but does not exceed £1, 14 days; exceeds £1, but does not exceed £5, one month.'—Yes.

4119. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you said you have not heard many complaints from the rural districts of the great invasion of tramps that go through the country, or of their bullying people?—I cannot say I have. I heard the other day of some complaints from Humble in the Lammermuirs.

4120. These complaints are not increasing?—Certainly not.

4121. We had evidence the other day from another witness about fires supposed to be caused by tramps. Have you had any experience of that?—Yes.

4122. Either by accident or by design. Do you think they are always accidental?—I should say so. What you are pointing at is, that if tramps do not get shelter at a farm yard, they might set fire to it.

4123. What I am pointing to is that if a farmer

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.
27 Nov. 1894.

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick. A. refuses shelter they might set fire to the farm yard out of revenge?—I have not heard of any such fires lately.

27 Nov. 1894. 4124. That is a popular opinion. I am only giving it here?—I may mention that I was at Cockburnspath lately. There is a sort of shelter there. There is a lodging-house in the top part, and most of the tramps who come there can pay. A few occasionally come who have nothing, but there is a sort of room down below where they put straw and wooden beds for them to lie on; and the farmer near there, Mr. Wyllie, says it relieves his farm of a great many people who used to go and put up there for the night.

4125. If your police had the power of arresting these tramps under the Vagrancy Act, for begging, would your present staff be equal to the necessities of the case? Would you not require a very greatly increased staff?—No. I do not think so.

4126. I mean you do not think the country would necessarily be put to increased expense on account of this change?—No.

4127. (By Col. M^rHardy.) You said you do not get very many complaints about tramps from the counties?—No. We do not.

4128. But apparently, at the same time, there are over 700 non-resident people marching about?—Yes.

4129. And of course they have food—must have food?—Well, yes.

4130. What proportion of these, would you say roughly—of these 780—earn their food and bed?—It is difficult to say.

4131. I am asking how many of these 780 who are continually moving—the nomads—how many of these would you say, at a guess, work for their food by honest merchandise, by selling things to earn their bread and bed?—Probably 20 per cent.

4132. That is 140. Then we have 640 persons moving about who do not earn their bread, but get it somewhere or another, else they would die?—Yes.

4133. What would be the charge for one person for his daily food and bed—what do you think a fair charge?—In the lodging-houses 4d. a night.

4134. For bed, and then for a day's food; three meals I suppose?—I do not know exactly. Fourpence or sixpence.

4135. A meal?—Altogether, about 6d. I should say.

4136. Sixpence or eightpence. If it were eightpence that would be a shilling a day for the keep of this population?—Yes.

4137. So that this migratory population is apparently drawing 640s., or £32 per diem from the population of the counties?—I should think not.

4138. And the people have come to submit to this because it is a custom without complaint—this tax of £32 per diem. Is that so?—I suppose so.

4139. About £10,000 a year?—That cannot be the case.

4140. It looks like it. Why is it not the case?—It seems such a large sum.

4141. But you see no other explanation but that £10,000 must be subscribed by the agricultural population of the four counties for the maintenance of these vagrants?—Well, they beg.

4142. Yes. That comes to be the means by which they raise the money. There is no other way for they do not work. We have struck off those who work; so that by a simple process of begging they raise this £10,000 a year, and the people submit without objection to pay this sum?—Well, I don't know. I should not say there was £10,000 got out of the Lothians and Peebles by tramps. I don't think so. But how they live I do not know. I do not know—if it does require a shilling a day to live for a man who does not work—or that he gets it out of the inhabitants of the Lothians and Peebles at all.

4143. How do you suggest he otherwise would get it. Why does he go tramping in the Lothians and Peebles?—There are a great many tramps who go through the counties, who never beg, and never do any harm. I do not know how they live.

4144. Do they come with funds in their pockets?—They like the life.

4145. Do you mean to say that partially moneyed men go out on tramp?—There is a certain few who do. Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.

4146. You mean that they have money in their pockets when they go into your counties?—I do not know. I suppose they have. They manage to get along. 27 Nov. 1894.

4147. How long would they remain in the county?

4148. (The Chairman.) I believe there is a way in which they get money. Some of these men belong to Trades Societies.

4149. (The Witness.) People who are in search of work.

4150. (The Chairman.) And they would get an allowance from the Trade Society as they went along.

4151. (The Witness.) I suppose they do.

4152. (By Col. M^rHardy.) Is it a frequent thing to come across a tramp who has a few shillings in his pocket?—I know this, that somehow or other they are always able to pay for their night's lodging.

4153. But I suppose you suspect that money is received by begging?—It very often is, certainly.

4154. There is a certain number of these tramps who are men honestly searching for work?—That is so.

4155-56. Do they come up from the south-east marching towards Edinburgh?—Yes, they generally come up, going out by the west and returning by the east; or going out by the east, and returning by the west.

4157. Well, I suppose, the main line of crossing these counties would be by the south-east to Edinburgh?—Yes.

4158. Could there be any difference made by the police, supposing they had power—could there be arrangements made by which they could relieve such as would appear to them after inquiry to deserve such relieve?—No, I do not think so. It would be abused.

4159. What would you do in the case of a man—a workman at one place falling out of work, and unable to reach another. How would you have him got to the other?—If he becomes sick, or unable to get along, or do anything for himself, the Inspector of Poor is the only person.

4160. Supposing he remains, at any rate for some-time, able-bodied. The man has lost his work in one locality. He wants to get to another. How is he to reach the other?—He must get some one to help him.

4161. Would you allow him to march?—If he is able.

4162. How would he subsist as he is marching along?—He would have to provide for himself somehow or other.

4163. But you would not approve of him begging?—No, I do not approve of him begging, certainly. Still, all the same, as I point out to you, these shelter-houses are so much abused. It is the least of two evils.

4164. That is the very expression I want to take up. The shelter-house is abused; but by the use of that expression, you would grant that it had a proper use?—No. I do not approve of them at all.

4165. You would not even approve of them for an honest working man moving along the road penniless?—It is so difficult to find the truth of an honest working man. You cannot. It is impossible.

4166. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) I would like to clear up one or two points about these penalties. Would you please look at section 381, sub-section 24, of the Burgh Police Act. Am I right in saying that the penalty for being drunk and incapable under that is a fine of 40s.?—Yes, for each offence; or a month's imprisonment.

4167. A month's imprisonment is section 501?—Yes.

4168. Now then, would you look a little more closely at section 382. You notice that, in the case of three offences, there is to be an additional penalty for the aggravation of 40s.?—Yes.

4169. Is the meaning of that, that a person brought up under it, is liable to the first penalty of 40s. under section 381, and then to a further penalty of 40s. under section 382?—(Reading.) 'Section 382—' Habitual 'Drunkards—It may be charged as an aggravation of

Lieut.-Col. A. Barthwick. 'the offence of being drunk and incapable, that the accused person has, within the 12 months preceding, been three times previously convicted of such offence, and if the accused person is convicted he may be fined in addition.'

22 Nov. 1894.

4170. That is right. The penalty there is really 80s.—Or a month's imprisonment.

4171. Would you kindly look at section 501, and see what the alternative of a penalty of 80s. is?—If it exceeds £1, but does not exceed £5, one month. He may be fined in addition 40s., or a month's imprisonment; or without the option of a fine, 14 days' imprisonment.

4172. Now, in the case of persons brought up for these offences, is it the case that as a rule they are very poor?—Yes.

4173. Is it the case that they are seldom or never able to pay the fine?—Yes, I may say so.

4174. The meaning of this is that a man, for the first offence of being drunk and incapable may, if the magistrate thinks right, be sent to prison for 30 days?—Yes.

4175. Does it not strike you that that is much too severe a sentence for the first offence?—It does seem so, certainly.

4176. Do you think it would be right to trust every Justice of the Peace, over the country, with a power like that?—Well, I think if these people could be sent to some sort of place, where they would be made self-supporting, made to work, and kept there for some time, it would do a great deal of good; but the mere fact of being imprisoned, it does not do much, but they recover their health.

4177. But 30 days' imprisonment, does it do anything to take away the craving for drink?—I do not think so.

4178. Now would you look at section 498. I think I am right in saying that that authorises, for the first offence for begging, 30 days without the option of a fine, and for the second offence, 60 days without the option of a fine?—Not exceeding 20s., or imprisonment for any period not exceeding 30 days; or to imprisonment for such period without the option of a fine; and for the second or any subsequent offence, to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding 60 days.

4179. My question is—is it not the case that that section authorises for the first offence of begging, imprisonment without the option of a fine, for 30 days; and for the second offence imprisonment for 60 days?—Yes.

4180. Does that not again strike you as being an extremely severe penalty?—Well, the full sentence is rarely—never given.

4181. Is there any use in giving magistrates power to impose such sentences?—I suppose it was well thought over before the Act was drawn up.

4182. I think you said people do not inform for begging?—Well, they are not inclined to, certainly.

4183. Does it not occur to you that the possibility of a person receiving far too severe a sentence, has something to do with the reluctance of people to inform?—No, I do not think so. There are a great many people charitably inclined, and they will give whether you want or not—a great many ladies.

4184. Am I right in saying that the same penalties apply for the first and second offence of being a vagrant?—No. The first is not exceeding 20s., or to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding 30 days, or to imprisonment for such period without the option of a fine; and for the second or any subsequent offence to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding 60 days.

4185. Does not that come to this, that, if the magistrate chooses, he may give 30 days for the first time, without the option of a fine, and 60 days for the second?—Yes.

4186. Well, is not that exceptionally severe?—It is a legal question.

4187. I am not asking about law, but for your opinion as a man who is accustomed to see vagrants every day of his life?—It is severe; but I repeat again that such sentences are not given.

4188. Is it not the case that some of the unpaid magistracies take very extreme views of what their duty is?—As a rule, they are very fair and lenient in their sentences.

4189. Have you never known such a thing as 30 days' imprisonment given for an offence of that kind?—No; never.

4190. If you were to suppress begging and vagrancy with such stringent laws as that, do you not propose to make any provision in the way of shelter for people who have to wander over the country in search of work?—I can only repeat what I have said, that, by experience, whenever there have been shelters the increase of tramps has been enormous.

4191. Have you ever had shelters where a person was obliged to give work in exchange for the shelter and food that he got?—No; never in Scotland. I have not heard of anything of the sort.

4192. Have you heard that such things exist in other countries?—Yes; in England on this system they are taken in for 48 hours.

4193. (The Chairman.) Are your sums of the 48 hours?—Yes.

4194. (Sheriff Dave Wilson.) You may take it from me that in certain parts of Germany there are shelters provided, where a man gets shelter and food for the night, but is compelled in return to work for it. Would you think it a good thing to have such shelters here?—No; I do not think so. If I may show you what is done in England—it is pretty much that system.

4195. Have you thought of any system of registering tramps?—Do you mean taking their names down.

4196. Yes?—I am afraid you would not get a truthful register at all.

4197. Has it ever been suggested that it would do good, if the police were to take down the names of all tramps as they entered the villages, and left?—That was done in East Lothian when they had these tramp houses.

4198. Did that do any good?—No.

4199. I am asking the question because we were told the other day that it had been found to do some good?—Have you heard of the system of that Mendicity Society in Ayrshire where they give tickets for lodgings and bed, and there are certain places where they can put up—they go to the police, and they are given to them—but it does not work.

4200. Do they work in exchange for these tickets?—No.

4201. But the point I want particularly to address your attention to is, whether if you are to put down begging and vagrancy, you must not find some way for people who are obliged to wander the country, to obtain shelter and food in exchange for work?—Then it comes back to the English system where they have these unions ten miles apart.

4202. Do you find that these tramps have always some place where they live more than at others—a sort of head-quarters?—They always go where they can get some place where they can put up.

4203. Do they wander all over Scotland?—I think so. They generally go up one side, and down another. Up west, and down east, or vice versa.

4204. Are they not accustomed to make their summer quarters in one particular district?—I can only say they are out in the country more in the summer, and in the towns in winter.

4205. Do you ever find vagrants here whose head-quarters are in the north of Scotland?—Yes. They come round this way.

4206. Now about the children of the vagrants; what kind of education do they get?—Very little. They are hardly educated at all.

4207. Can you tell me why so little use is made of the wandering cause of the Industrial Schools Act of 1886?—Yes, we have that, but some how or other we do not get at the children, between the Inspector of Poor, and the law; and as I said, if some Government school—

4208. Would you be surprised if I told you that in Lieut.-Col. Barthwick.

27 Nov. 1894.

Lieut.-Col. A. Borthwick.
5 Nov. 1894.
 my experience I had used that clause very extensively, and had found no difficulty in doing so?—How did you work it. I should like to know.

4209. I shall be glad to tell you afterwards. Can you give me any reason why they do not work that here?—You cannot get at tramps' children in that way.

4210. That is a matter of construction. You say they are children of persons who are wandering?—I wish I had brought it over—I could show it to you—a case of a boy who was found wandering. He was sent by the Procurator Fiscal to the Inspector of Poor. He would have nothing to do with him.

4211. You were asked a while ago about the penalties for persons trespassing in Scotland. I show you the Act, 28th and 29th Vic., Chap 56, and you see under that—, would you just read what the penalty is under that?—'Every person who commits any offence against the provision of this Act, may, if found in the act of committing the same by any officer of police, or constable, be apprehended by such officer, or constable, and detained in prison, police station, lock-up, or other places of safe custody; and not later than in the course of the next lawful day after he shall have been so taken into custody, shall be brought before a magistrate; and every person charged with the commission of any such offence, may, if not so taken into custody, or if he shall have been liberated on bail, or pledge, be summoned to appear before a magistrate, and on being convicted of such offence on his own confession, or on the evidence of one or more credible witnesses, shall for the first offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s., or to imprisonment for any period not exceeding 14 days; and for a second, or other subsequent offence, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s., or to imprisonment for any period not exceeding 21 days.'

4212. Would you just read now from section 3 what the offences are that are liable to that punishment?—'Every person who lodges in any premises, or occupies, or encamps on any land, being private property, without the consent, or permission of the owner, or legal occupier of such premises or land; and every person who encamps, or lights a fire on or near any private road, or enclosed or cultivated land, or in or near any plantation, or on or near any turnpike road, statute labour road, or other highway, shall be guilty of an offence, punishable as herein after provided.'

4213. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is it not a fact, Col. Borthwick, that children who are proposed to be committed to an Industrial School under section 16 of the Act, which describes them as wandering—in the case of these children, the Parochial Authorities decline to send them into the Industrial Schools; because, in the first place, if they are chargeable to the parish the parish has to pay for them there; and further, that the Industrial Schools being at a distance, they object to the expense of sending them; and also that the managers of the Industrial Schools can refuse; because under the 16th section the Treasury allowance is only 2s. as against 4s. sent under the 14th?—Yes. There is a difficulty certainly about it.

4214. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You do not believe in these way side shelters?—No.

4215. You do not think it possible to discriminate between the honest tramp and the worthless idler?—No. It is most difficult.

4216. But you suggest no remedy as to what provision is to be made for the honest tramp whose existence in considerable numbers you admit?—I have thought about it, but I think the less done the better.

4217. In the County of Gloucester these wayside shelters are said to work remarkably well, and have reduced the cost of charity very considerably. Are you aware of that fact?—Yes; but they have gone to another country. I forget how it was done.

4218. Yes, but if all counties did the same and protected themselves, and if you made it a rule that if a tramp appeared on circuit at six or seven different shelters, and had not found work; he was not to receive any further existence, would not that check vagrancy and the evils to which you refer?—I doubt.

4219. Would not that be likely to check it—say that an inquiry was made into his character, antecedents, &c., and he was found undeserving of relief, would not that stop vagrancy?—It would certainly tend to it.

4220. Are you aware that 494 apprehensions have been made by the police during the past year?—Of course a great many are taken up for drunkenness. The sentences are either 6s. or one day. The sentences never alter the same as in other cases.

4221. It is within your knowledge that this proportion is very much higher than is the case among the ordinary population—something like four times?—Yes. They are the needy class. They must live somehow or other.

4222. You have said you have no power to apprehend them for begging, so that it is not for begging they are arrested, but for trespass, and drunkenness?—That is so.

4223. (By the Chairman.) I find here that the ground on which Lord Young overthrew these reasons about bye-laws was that they were expressed in such terms as not to be limited to vagrancy, but as to the case of the Convener of the County asking for something for the support of some worthy object. But there has been no further attempt to redraft them?—No. [The witness then withdrew.]

SIR JOHN COWAN, Bart., of Beeslack, called in and examined.

Sir John Cowan.

4224. (By the Chairman.) I understand, Sir John, that you have taken an interest in a number of institutions devoted to the reclamation of vagrants and other people with whom we are dealing here. Would you please to mention some of them?—Throughout my life I have taken a deep and large interest in the treatment of children, and in the rescue of the young who have gone astray in the general sense, and especially in the case of those who have fallen early into crime, or fallen into drunken and dissipated habits. I studied the subject very much, both at home and abroad; and latterly, for the last 30 years I have given great attention to the Reformatory Schools, being chairman of the Wellington Reformatory; and I look upon that, though it came through very great difficulty that often seemed to overwhelm us and crush us altogether; as having attained a measure of success, which I think quite unparalleled in the history of Reformatories.

4225. How many inmates have you there?—About 110 at present. I think we are licensed for 120.

4226. Boys or girls?—All boys, and all protestant boys. I consider now, from my past experience of the Reformatory, that it is a perfect success; and I look upon it without exaggeration as turning out a number of boys every year quite equal to those who are turned out of the ordinary schools of the country. I think they are quite to be compared with, or better than the ordinary schools of the country.

4227. Up to what age do they come in?—We do not keep them after they are 20, and we do not accept them under five years, and therefore we would not take them after they are 14 years of age.

4228. Do you keep your eye on them after they leave?—Oh yes. The Home Office requires that at our hand.

4229. For how long?—Three years, I think it is.

4230. Have you any statistics of the number of them you find gravitating into jails?—Yes. Sometimes we have only one or two in the year's report who have gone back to crime. At other times they have been as many as eight or nine.

4231. Do you happen to have by you any statistics on that subject?—I can easily supply them. I have not them with me. The great feature in our institution is the work. We employ them chiefly in boot-making. The boys attain such a love of work that the greatest punishment we can inflict on them is to turn them for a day or half a day from their bench,

*Sir John

and the consequence is that we have no trouble. When we discharge our boys, in getting situations for them, they readily find admittance into the shoe shops of the country; and although they are not taken on as journeymen, they are taken on at a wage which quite well supports them.

4232. You find no outcry from the union shoemakers?—No; we do not supply the public.

4233. How do you utilise your work?—We utilise it through large dealers; and some of the hospitals we have supplied.

4234. Do the shoemakers never complain of your underselling them, or competing with them?—No; never.

4235. Have you any opinion as to the amount which the inmates contribute towards their keep—as to the profitable nature of their work or the contrary?—Oh yes. Our report shows that. Unfortunately I have not got it with me.

4236. Have you any amendments or improvements to suggest in connection with the treatment of juvenile offenders?—Well, till lately we had a very strong objection to that ten days' detention in prison before they were committed to our charge. That has been abolished, and we have no further complaint to make. We thought at that time that it stamped a boy a criminal to have been committed to prison before being sent to us.

4237. You spoke of it as abolished. But sending to you immediately is not abolished. It is only optional?—Optional.

4238. But in practice it is always followed?—Yes.

4239. In Edinburgh?—In Edinburgh, the sheriffs when they can send us boys; but the burgh magistrates, very often from that very cause would not commit a boy to the Reformatory.

4240. But they send him to an Industrial School?—I do not know. I think they often birch them, or fine them.

4241. Have you any experience in Industrial Schools?—No.

4242. You mentioned birching; what is your idea regarding birching as a punishment for juveniles?—I think it is sometimes necessary, but not ordinarily. When we have had any great outbreak at the Wellington, I have once or twice had to get half-a-dozen boys and birch them most severely. Once, on an occasion when they attempted to burn the whole establishment down.

4243. That was rather a strong step to take?—I was summoned in the evening to go up to the Reformatory, and found there had been detected under the floor of the workshop a quantity of rags and tow, and other inflammable matter steeped in oil, and a candle burning. In a very short time it would probably have burned down the whole establishment; and after a night's work of bringing one after another out of their beds, I found out that the guilty intention was known to the whole school. There were certain boys who took an active part, but no one seemed to me more guilty than another.

4244. What was the motive?—There had been dissatisfaction with one of the teachers—some trivial thing.

4245. You simply had them birched?—I summoned one or two of the directors, and publicly birched them. A very painful matter it was, and I was hooted, and cried down by the other boys, upon which I stated that I would remain there and birch every boy in the school if there was not perfect order, and so on, and I got complete mastery over them.

4246. Were there any of the boys prosecuted criminally for attempted fire-raising?—We sent three or four of them in to the sheriff, and they were imprisoned for a short time, and then sent back to us.

4247. Can you tell us what is done with boys in bad health? We saw a boy in prison the other day, who stated that he had been in an Industrial School and in the Reformatory, and that he had been dismissed from both in consequence of some malady from which he suffered?—We require a boy to be of healthy condition before we admit him, but I am not aware that we have ever dismissed one for ill-health.

4248. You mention that you have taken a great interest in the reclamation of drunken and dissipated persons?—Yes; I have taken that into my own hand very much from an early period of my life, and I have put people in asylums on voluntary application, and put them into Retreats and all sorts of places. But it is most desirable and necessary, I think, that there should be some legal power to commit these people to confinement. I remember Sir Andrew Clarke speaking to me several times on that subject, and he said it was a very great loss that in our christian country there were no institutions to which such parties could be sent.

4249. You say you sent them as voluntary patients to asylums. Do you find they stay long there?—Yes.

4250. With what results?—Sometimes with good results, and at other times with disappointment.

4251. I think that at present you have got an old woman at Queensberry House?—A woman that I put in—yes. That was a terrible failure. I put her into the christian institution in Peeblesshire carried on by Edinburgh ladies. I had great difficulty in inducing her to go. It is her own family who provide for her. But she at last went off, and she stayed there nine months. She never was a hopeful case. There was never any real desire for reform on her part.

4252. Did she go out and relapse?—She came out immediately after a very earnest letter I wrote her, urging her to remain. I found out these christian women were willing to keep her still, notwithstanding her carelessness and indifference to work, and whenever she got my letter, the matron told me afterwards she just walked off to Peebles.

4253. How did you get her into Queensberry House?—She came into Edinburgh, and some christian women here provided her with a room and sewing material. I found her there perfectly sober, and cleanly, and respectable. I told her I had no confidence in her. She said she was very much obliged to me for what I had done for her, and assured me she was thoroughly reformed now. But in a day or two she took to drink, went out, and pawned some pieces of cloth. I put the question to her on that occasion—'Have you any craving for drink now?' 'None, I never have it till I taste it.' But I had no confidence in her. And eventually she was dead drunk, and was put into a cab and with the help of a policeman they got her down to Queensberry House.

4254. How long has she been there now?—She has been there only about two months, I think.

4255. How is she induced to stay there?—She is quiet and orderly, but they don't feel they could trust her outside.

4256. Yes; but how is she induced to stay there when she would not stay in Peebles?—Oh! she feels herself in restraint under Major McCartney.

4257. He has a good deal of personal character?—Yes.

4258. Have you any other case of that sort on hand just now?—There is one case that went into the asylum—a respectable tradesman. He seemed a very hopeless case, and after staying a month or six weeks in the asylum, he has come out apparently quite cured, and is now at his ordinary work. I put the doctor of our village into the asylum a good many years ago. That was the most hopeless case I ever knew of. I just went to his house; I was afraid he would burn it down—he had the whole practice in Penicuik—I drove him out to the asylum before day-break, and drove back to my own house before any one knew what I had done.

4259. Did he go voluntarily?—He went under my orders. I appealed to him to sign an application for admission, and I paid for his board for three months. Eventually he died in the asylum a few months ago.

4260. He did not stay there?—He got out for a time, and eventually the parish put him in, and he became a pauper inmate.

4261. He took to drink?—He never ceased to drink. It was the most extraordinary case of drink I ever saw. The doctor at the asylum, because he was a doctor, took a great interest in him, and employed him in his laboratory. He drank the spirits out of the bottles in which the specimens were kept.

*Sir John

4262. He never got a fair trial of treatment?—He was quite hopeless from the beginning.

4263. Have you any more hopeful cases you can tell to the Committee?—No, I don't think so; but I think if one had the power to commit these people, and there was a place authorised to receive them, it would be a very great benefit. I think we ought not to abstain from doing it because of the difficulty of accomplishing it.

4264. Have you ever taken any interest in the management of Queensberry House?—Not in the management, but I have often admired its system, and I have been all through it frequently, and in that other house of a higher class—I forget what they call it.

4265. Queensberry Lodge. You mention you have taken an interest in the case of the young who have gone astray—I presume in the reclamation of fallen women?—No. Weak-minded children. I take a very great interest in that Larbert Institution.

4266. You spoke of their going astray?—That was more with reference to the Reformatory, and also privately.

4267. You think you could give us a record of the relapses in the Reformatory cases?—Yes.

4268. You don't consider them more than three years?—Five years.

4269. No, but you don't keep them in the institution?—It is the Government that gives account of relapses. The Inspector of Reformatories gives it every year in his report. You see it there, and you can compare one Reformatory with another.

4270. Have you ever had any other outbreak in your Reformatory?—Oh yes, once we had a terrible outbreak of the whole school running away, every one of them. Sheriff Cleghorn was then our chairman—who originated our Reformatory. I got notice of it in the morning. I went out with a policeman. I saw they had gone off in a body, 80 or a 100 of them, away in the direction of Howgate. I drove across there, and we could hear nothing of them. Nobody had seen them. But when we got to the Moorfoot Hills, about five miles off, we saw certain specks on the hill. I said to my coachman—'are these sheep on the hills.' He said—'I think so, sir'; but I thought they looked odd, and as we got near them, these were our boys all scattered, at a great height; and when we got to the farm house, I found a dozen of them had come down all foot-sore and bleeding, of the younger boys. I waited there till they all came down, and marched them home.

4271. What was the cause of that break-out?—Dissatisfaction with a teacher also.

4272. Was there any punishment inflicted in connection with that?—Yes, but the great difficulty was to restore order. They were very very miserable when they got home. They had no food all day. I got two hay carts for the younger boys, and marched the others, and my difficulty was to keep them from stealing the turnips, or something of that kind, because they had a long march home. I got them completely under order.

4273. I should ask you how you would punish the ring-leaders there?—It was by selecting half-a-dozen, and sending them in to the sheriff; but I do not remember what the punishment was.

4274. You did not try the birch on that occasion?—No.

4275. Were there any other outbreaks?—No. These were the only two serious outbreaks.

4276. There is just one point I should like your opinion on, as to whether young boys sent to the Reformatory do not suffer from the contamination of older and more hardened offenders?—Oh no.

4277. Do you classify them?—No; but we are very watchful of them. They are always under sight. There is a warder for each of the dormitories, who can see from the window.

4278. How are they paid for? Government pays how much?—Four shillings, I think.

4279. And where do you get the rest?—It is 6s., I think, and after they have been a certain time with us—after two years and a half, Government reduces it to four shillings, as an inducement to us to cure them, and send them out before that time.

4280. Do you often do so?—We often send them out.

4281. Are they not committed for a certain period?—Yes; but with the consent of the Home Office we can always send them out at an earlier period.

4282. As a matter of administration, do you find any inconvenience from being connected with the Home Office, instead of the Scottish department?—Quite the contrary. We find everything we can desire from the Home Office. We are rather favoured by the Home Office. We are looked upon as one of the pattern institutions.

4283. Can you tell how many Reformatories there are in Scotland?—I cannot tell.

4284. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You do not think any advantage would come by having the Reformatory, like everything else in Scotland now, under the administration of the Secretary for Scotland?—No. I do not think so. Our relations with the Home Office are of so agreeable a nature, we find them very ready always to keep us up.

4285. But as the prisons in Scotland are under the Secretary for Scotland now, does it not seem strange that the Reformatories should be kept out?—Yes; I should think all Scottish things should be under the same hand.

4286. If the Home Office deal with you in an agreeable way, there is no reason to suppose that Dover House would not do the same?—No.

4287. And it might be more convenient as coming under the general administration of Scotland?—I quite agree with you there.

4288. There is an arrangement now, under a recent Act, whereby a boy may be sent direct to the Reformatory. That is optional; but sometimes it requires time before the arrangements can be made, between the pronouncing of the sentence, and the selection of the Reformatory to which the boy is sent?—Yes.

4289. I do not know if that is felt much in Edinburgh?—I do not think so; but we have always that certain delay. They are submitted to us to get our approval.

4290. In some parts of the country that delay, I think, occupies two or three days?—Yes; I should think generally.

4291. Where are the boys that you are keeping now—where are they kept during these three days?—I do not know.

4292. Is it the custom of some magistrates to commit to prison, simply on the ground that if the boy is committed to prison, that is a certain place where he can be detained with security, and also no expense falls on any local body during the three days?—I am sorry to say I am not aware of these matters.

4293. Do you think the reformatory principle and organisation, which has been so successfully applied in the case of boys, could be utilised in the case of older people—those we have to consider on this Committee as habitual offenders?—That is a matter which has engaged my thoughts very seriously—I mean the reclamation of adults, but I did not understand that came under your Committee.

4294. That is the matter we have to deal with. The people we have to deal with are what we call habitual offenders—people who are taken up for drunkenness, breaches of the peace, prostitution, bagging, and such like. Can you use this engine which has been discovered, this Reformatory for such people as these?—I have a strong belief that we could. I do not know what was the result of that interesting procedure in Ireland, where they were employed on the moors, and reclaiming land. Did they fall through afterwards.

4295. Do you refer to the intermediate system of Luak?—Sir Arthur Crofton's.

Sir John
Cowan.

27 Nov. 1894.

4296. How long would you deal with an habitual offender in such an institution as your Reformatory at Wellington?—I could not answer that. I think it would depend entirely on the offender himself. One might do with one period, and another with twice as long. I remember being very much impressed with the views of Captain May, whom I admired very much. When I visited Perth Prison he was exceedingly anxious to get liberty to take his criminals out to one of the islands in the Tay, and employ them there in agricultural labour, and bring them back to the prison at night; but he understood it was quite against the view of the Commissioners.

4297. I suppose you know that no very strong approval has been expressed of the intermediate system in Ireland, and that now indeed it has almost entirely, if not wholly ceased. But we are thinking of dealing, not with what you call the criminal so-called, but with the offender, the troublesome man of the disorderly class. How would you deal with him?—I think it is of very great moment to treat them as we are treating our boys. Keep them at diligent work; teach them to love work; and keep them sober and upright.

4298. In order to learn to love work you must give them work they love to do, you cannot give them work to which they have an instinctive objection, such as teasing onkum?—Yes.

4299. It would have to be work which would lead them to a desire to work?—Yes.

4300. The result of work in Reformatories is very promising. I think it is up to 75 and as high as 90 per cent.?—We boast of over 90 per cent.

4301. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Do you have many children who are admitted under the age of 14?—Yes.

4302. What proportion of your inmates may be admitted under 14?—I should say probably a third.

4303. And what proportion is licensed out.

4304. I should have mentioned that before; that we send the boys out when we come down to the lower grade of payment from the Home Office, and it is our object to send them out. We send them out on license, and there are generally of our 110 boys about 10 or 15 out on license.

4305. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you tell how many cases are sent on from Industrial Schools, for offences committed in the Industrial Schools, under the Industrial Schools Act?—There are now very few. At first we got a very large number, and it gave us the feeling that in the Industrial Schools they were not doing good.

4306. That is what I want to get at. But you have not so many now?—No; we have very few now.

4307. (By the Chairman.) You spoke about sending your boys out on license when they are in the Reformatory. You have statutory power to detain them?—Yes.

4308. What power has the license?—We have only power with the licensed boys to visit them, and see they are conducting themselves well, and report that to the Home Office.

4309. What I want to know is as to a licensed boy sent out to a shoemaker, we will say at Portobello—has the shoemaker any power to prevent him from walking off?—He can only report him to us.

4310. After he has run off?—Oh no. He has no control over him. We would not license a boy till we had confidence in him.

4311. But you could then recall the license and bring back the boy?—Bring back the boy.

4312. You mentioned you had experience of work done abroad?—Yes.

4313. Do you wish to say anything on that point to the Committee?—No. It is only that I think our system a better one. I visited the Rauter Hous of Hamburg and also the celebrated Reformatory of Mettray in France, and saw the extraordinary military discipline and order there. It is very showy, but when I was last there they were instituting a large distillery, and it frightened me when I saw that the boys were to work this distillery. I don't know how it turned out.

4314. Have you anything to do with the Mars?—I visited it, and I think it is admirably conducted.

4315. How are the boys selected?—They come chiefly sentenced from Dundee, and a good many from Edinburgh too. The Mars is the same as an Industrial School.

4316. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it not the case that no boy can be sent to the Mars from a prison?—I was not aware of it.

4317. The magistrate has no choice. Do you send any boys to Canada?—Yes.

4318. What results have you got?—We have got good results; splendid results. We have boys in the States and Canada at the head of shoemaking establishments, with incomes of many hundreds a year. We send very few to the navy, or to the army, but some we send to the band. We have a good band, and a good many go into the bands of the Highland Regiments.

4319. When you inflict corporal punishment, is it recorded?—It is recorded, but it is very rare,—perhaps once in a year.

4320. (By the Chairman.) I will ask you to read the provision of the Reformatory Act?—The managers of a certified Reformatory School, may at any time after the expiration of 18 months of the period of detention allotted to a youthful offender, by license under their hand, permit him to live with any trustworthy and respectable person named in the license, willing to receive and take charge of him. [The witness then withdrew]

Mr. Alexander
Blair.

Mr. ALEXANDER BLAIR, Advocate, Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles, called in and examined.

Mr. Alexander
Blair.

4321. (By the Chairman.) You are the Sheriff of Midlothian?—Of the Lothians and Peebles.

4322. How long have you been in that position?—Since 1891. I was previously, for about 18 months, Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton and Clackmannan; and I was previously for a considerable time Advocate Depute.

4323. Have you anything to do with the work which we understand is performed by your substitutes here, in connection with the Police Courts?—I do not take Police Courts connected with the city, but I do occasionally take the Summary Court, in the Sheriff Court. But the Police Court work proper does not come before me.

4324. And then do you regulate the attendance of your substitutes at any Court?—Well, I do to a certain extent, considering their convenience, and arranging the work that should be as far as possible done by the substitute who is more acquainted with it, and is specially detailed for that work.

4325. In connection with that do you consult, or do they consult the magistrates of the city?—With regard to the Police Court, the City Police Court, which is taken on alternate months by a magistrate, and a sheriff substitute, the sheriff substitutes who take it are Mr. Rutherford and Mr. Orphor.

4326. The sheriff has nothing to do at all with the Burgh Court?—There is a separate Court called the Burgh Court, but the sheriff has nothing to do with that at all. That is something different. It is distinct from the Police Court.

4327. You were good enough to send in some suggestions?—I sent in two memoranda [Appendix . . .]

4328. In the first place with regard to habitual offenders, do you come in contact with them at all here?—I do not come much in contact with these offenders, until they have been convicted several times, and then they are probably remitted to me to try, in what we call the Sheriff and Jury Court.

4329. There you have apparently a different law?—It is not police.

4330. We shall take first of all the petty offender. We are told that it is the practice in Edinburgh that previous convictions are stated in the charge in these

Mr. Alexander Blair.
 27 Nov. 1894. Police Court. I suppose you are advised of previous convictions too by the fact of the cases being remitted to the Sheriff Court?—When an indictment is prepared for trial by sheriff and jury, the indictment shows on the face of it that there have been previous convictions. If there are any, that is the form, but the indictment is not laid before the jury, so that the jury when they dispose of the case from the evidence, know nothing of these previous convictions at all. I see that they are there.

4331. As you have nothing to do with guilt or finding guilty, that does not make any matter; but in a case where there is no jury?—In a case where there is no jury, if the case is sent to be tried by sheriff and jury, then I dispose of it. Then I have the previous convictions before me in determining the amount of punishment. There also, when the case is disposed of under section 31 the Act of 1889, which enables the offender who is resolved to do so, to plead guilty.

4332. That is Lord Kingsburgh's Act. But take an ordinary case tried by you as sheriff, without a jury?—The charge shows that there are previous convictions.

4333. And the judge knows beforehand the fact of previous convictions?—Yes; but they are not proved till the evidence in the charge is led.

4334. Would you state what are your suggestions with regard to petty offenders?—My first suggestion is that, after three convictions, the amount of punishment which may be awarded by imprisonment should be increased so that it should not exceed four months. After a fifth conviction, in addition to imprisonment, the person convicted should be subjected to police supervision for a period not exceeding two years. Persons convicted on summary complaint, while subject to police supervision, should be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months.

4335. Do you refer to the same class of offences as we have to deal with here—for instance, drunk and incapable, petty assault often combined with drunkenness, breach of the peace, solicitation?—I refer to aggravated cases of this kind, where the offender has been convicted again and again. Where I say the third conviction, I merely noted it as a possible limit which might be taken; but then in my second suggestion I provide that where the person has not been convicted for two years at all, that previous convictions should not be brought up against him; or heard of in the course of punishment. If the person were not convicted for two years, he would, as it were, fall out of the class of petty offenders.

4336. But in the matter of being drunk and incapable, we were told by magistrates, and police chief constables, that there were many men who got drunk every big pay day, and who were respectable and hard-working men?—I admit that in preparing this, I considered cases of assault and theft.

4337. But you don't mean petty assault, such as a man getting drunk and kicking the police?—Any slight assault; but I put this as these maximum periods.

4338. Do you include solicitation?—Not cases of that kind, unless the person was convicted again and again.

4339. Don't you see there is some difficulty in defining your habitual offender by the number of convictions in this way?—I don't propose to define the habitual offender by the number of his convictions. What I propose is with regard to the habitual petty offender, having in view these classes mentioned in the memorandum, that the magistrate should have power to impose a higher penalty.

4340. But we have had suggestions made to us on the same point, and the suggestions have generally taken this form, that after a certain number of convictions, the magistrates or the police authorities should have power to remit the case to the sheriff, who would decide whether a man was an habitual offender at all, and decide according to the weight of evidence?—That would come to the same thing, keeping, however, this in view, that if the offender is tried summarily before the sheriff, he cannot award a greater penalty than 60 days' imprisonment. If a penalty exceeding 60 days' imprisonment is to be imposed, as the law now stands the person accused must be tried on indictment by Mr. Alexander Blair.

4341. But in any proposal of special treatment of these habitual offenders—I do not know if you had that in your mind at all—legislation would be necessary, and it would be easy to empower the sheriff?—Certainly. My proposal would give the power to the police magistrate.

4342. But don't you think the police magistrate has generally power enough—take an untried man who is elected bailie yesterday, and who sits and exercises these powers?—I quite see that it might be desirable, if the power of imprisonment is increased, that it probably should be exercised by a judge who has had more experience and training.

4343. Well now, you have some further suggestions—No. 3?—When a person subject to police supervision is proved, to the satisfaction of the sheriff, to have no visible means of support, and to be unable from age or state of health to earn a living, the sheriff shall have power to ordain such persons to live while subject to police supervision, with any suitable person willing to receive such person, or if no such suitable person can be found, or if the person subject to police supervision, fails or refuses to live with such suitable person, then in the poorhouse liable to receive such person, if a pauper; and until such poorhouse shall be ascertained, in a poorhouse to be named by the sheriff. The object I have in view is that where a person is convicted again and again as an habitual offender, and been sentenced and is subject to a period of police supervision, if he is in bad health, or old and unable to work, he should be obliged to reside with some responsible person. If that is not done there are two courses open. Such persons cannot earn a living. They must either beg, or they must steal.

4344. Would you give that responsible person any powers of detention there?—No. I think if the person who is subject to police supervision refuses, or absconds, then he must be brought back by the police. I think, in the case of the poor law authorities, you might give them the power, but I think it would be difficult in the case of a private person.

4345. That is just what I was going to ask. In the case of the poorhouse, unless you give such power, the person subject to police supervision can bolt whenever he likes.

4346. Yes, but it only applies to the case of a person in bad health, or old, who is not likely to go very far.

4347. We have seen a number of persons who are not able-bodied, but who preferred every now and then a little outing, a round of beggary, and probably imprisonment at the end, to the monotony of living in a poorhouse?—I am aware of these cases, and it is seeing one or two of this kind that made me suggest this remedy.

4348. We have many suggestions from persons connected with parochial administration, that Parochial Boards should be given power of detention, in certain cases of persons who oscillate between the poorhouse and the prison. Do you approve of that?—Yes. But if a person who is subject to police supervision had friends—sons or daughters—willing to receive them, and who are fit persons to have charge of him or her, I should be disposed to allow these persons to undertake this duty if they pleased.

4349. About police supervision—that is a novelty except in the case of convicts?—It is. I beg pardon, the Supreme Court have power to sentence to penal servitude, or to imprisonment and police supervision. A person might be sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and five years' police supervision. At the end of four years he would be liberated from penal servitude, and then he would be under police supervision until the term of his sentence and the period of police supervision had expired.

4350. You speak of the case of persons who are subject to a period of imprisonment, for a shorter period, and afterwards to police supervision?—There are certain cases in which that is my proposal.

27 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander
Blair.

27 Nov. 1894.

4351. At all events this keeping of these petty offenders under police supervision would add to the supervising power of the police, would it not?—If it were carried out in the way in which police supervision is at present carried out. But I propose that the Secretary for Scotland should have power to make such rules and regulations as he would consider advisable to give effect to proposals of that kind embodied in an Act, because there is no doubt that the dangerous period for a person who has been in prison is immediately or soon after he is liberated.

4352. Is it not said that police supervision rather increases the difficulty of getting anything to do?—It does. There is that difficulty in the way of police supervision.

4353. Would you please pursue your recommendations?—I think it might be of consequence that persons who are liberated, if they are not subject to police supervision, if nothing further were done, that they should be required to reside with some suitable person, in some particular place. I know in connection with the society for giving relief to discharged prisoners, that it has been found of service sometimes to find a respectable lodging for a prisoner, and that that has enabled him to obtain work, when he probably would not otherwise have done so. I am chairman of a society of that kind, but the practical working of that kind is done by a committee of which I am not a member.

4354. We will go to number four of your suggestions?—‘Persons sentenced to a term of imprisonment, whether on indictment, or summary complaint, but who are certified by two medical men to be named by the Secretary for Scotland, on account of age, or state of health, not to be fit subjects for prison discipline, shall be subject to a like provision with regard to residence, till the term of their imprisonment shall have expired.’ There is a small but very deplorable class of criminals who are brought before one again and again, old persons, or persons in bad health, who seem to be quite unable to earn a living, but who are strong enough to commit frauds or thefts. I have one or two cases specially in view. I am told such persons will not enter a poorhouse. I have myself begged them to enter. They promise, but when they are liberated they commit another offence and go back. I know, after I have committed them to a long period of imprisonment, they get into better health. They spend their time in the infirmary, and they prefer that, because they get more comforts in the prison infirmary than in the poorhouse.

4355. What sort of people are these?—I have in view an old man who has been brought up again and again for frauds, what one calls long-firm-swindling. He is imprisoned. He gets out of prison, and just begins again.

4356. What sort of sentences has he got?—He has had some very long sentences of imprisonment. I am not quite certain whether he has not had a sentence of penal servitude. But he is an old man—upwards of 70.

4357. I suppose there is not much chance of reforming him?—I am afraid there is very little chance. There is another case of a woman brought before me. She has been several times sentenced. I have asked her through her agent whether she would go to the poorhouse. I have sentenced her to short terms in the hope that when she got out she would go there.

4358. What is her crime?—Theft. Now persons of that kind under this regulation would not spend their time in prison, but under a proposal of this kind would be detained in the poorhouse. I ought to point out that these cases I have spoken of latterly scarcely belong to the class of petty offenders. They are all cases tried before me under an indictment.

4359. I suppose, as a matter of fact, it is only very serious, or serious cases that come before you. Magistrates in petty cases can give very big sentences?—Putting aside certain cases that come under the Prevention of Crimes Act—assaults on the police, and so on, a magistrate cannot pronounce a sentence on a summary complaint over 60 days’ imprisonment. Cases by sheriff and jury are either serious in themselves, or serious because the person accused has been convicted several times before. For instance, yesterday, I had a man before me, and sentenced him to three months’ imprisonment. He had been already convicted three times this year, and twice in 1892. He had stolen a quantity of lead.

4360. You have paid attention evidently to the question of the treatment of habitual drunkards?—My attention has been drawn to that in connection with Queensberry House, of which I am one of the governors, or directors ex officio; and I have frequently applications made to me as sheriff, by persons resident there who desire to leave the institution.

4361. Why should they make any application to you if they desire to leave?—Because the governor, I understand, does not generally allow them to leave without communicating with their friends, or getting the authority of the directors, and if they have any complaint to make they come to the sheriff.

4362. As a matter of fact that is illegal?—They cannot be detained there.

4363. And there is no hindrance to persons leaving when they wish?—There is no power of detention. Only in many cases persons are placed in that institution by their friends, and it is, of course, desirable, if possible, that their friends should be communicated with before they leave. For instance, take the case of a wife or husband.

4364. I am not talking of the desirability, but simply of the legal power?—There is no legal power.

4365. We had the governor, Major McCartney, before us, and he told us he did not care for more power than he had. That is to say, he appeared to find he had all the power that is necessary. Has he ever asked the Board, or laid before the Board anything to suggest the necessity of such powers?—I am not aware that he has. At least I cannot recall any application. He could not obtain any greater powers from the Board. We could not give him them.

4366. No. But he might have suggested that you might take an action to try and obtain greater power. However, you bring forward this not as the suggestion of the Board?—Simply as my own. These are my suggestions, that occurred to myself, and more with regard to the form in which things should be done; because I thought the regulation of a place of that kind is rather for medical than for legal advice.

4367. In the first place, do you think that institutions of that kind should be inspected?—I certainly think that if a magistrate or sheriff is to have power to ordain a person to reside in any place—what I would call a Retreat—that place ought to be inspected by some responsible person, selected and appointed by the Government.

4368. What I was going to ask your opinion on is this—do you think that any place to which rich people can be sent at the instance of their friends, or others, and where there may be a reasonable suspicion that they may be detained, with respect to their liberation, do you think that ought to be under inspection, or not?—I think any institution or person who receives inebriates, without an order which compels them to remain, ought not, or need not be subject to inspection; but I think a person or a place to which a sheriff or a magistrate can commit a person, or ordain a person to reside, ought to be subject to such inspection. I draw a distinction between a place where a person can reside voluntarily, and a place where residence is compulsory.

4369. Would you let us have your suggestions here. You accept the definition of habitual drunkard as given in the Act. You have no suggestion as to its amendment?—No. Institutions or places authorised to receive habitual drunkards by the Secretary for Scotland should be licensed.

4370. You propose that they should be licensed by the Local Authority?—I do so because it is they, in many cases, who would have the control. ‘Third, such institutions and private houses—hereinafter called

Mr. Alexander
Blair.

27 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Blair. 27 Nov. 1894. 'Retreats—to be subject to inspection, and to be conducted subject to such regulations as may from time to time be made by the Secretary for Scotland, under provisions of Act of Parliament.' Then 'upon an application by a relative of the person regarding whom the application is made, or the Procurator Fiscal, or by an Inspector of the Poor, or by such person himself, setting forth that such person is an habitual drunkard, and upon production of a certificate by two medical men, setting forth that such person is an habitual drunkard, and that detention in a Retreat will be for the benefit of such person, and after giving due notice to the person mentioned that such application has been made, and certificate produced, and after giving such person an opportunity of being heard, and after such further inquiry, if any, as the sheriff may consider necessary, it shall be lawful for the sheriff to find that such person is an habitual drunkard, and to ordain such person to be detained in a Retreat for a period not exceeding one year. If such person, after discharge, is again proceeded against, and found to be an habitual drunkard, the detention to be for a period not exceeding three years. The Secretary for Scotland to have power, at any time, to direct a person to be detained in a Retreat, and that either unconditionally or under conditions. Lord Advocate to have power to direct Procurator Fiscal to appear in any application. Application to be heard in chambers, unless sheriff shall otherwise direct.'

4371. That is founded on the procedure under the Lunacy Act?—To a certain extent it follows the proceedings in lunacy. In that case it may be made by the Inspector of the Poor.

4372. You leave the sheriff power to judge as to whether a person is an habitual drunkard or not?—Yes, subject to this, that the sheriff must have a medical certificate, stating, first, that he is an habitual drunkard, and secondly, that detention in a Retreat is advisable.

4373. Would you not have other evidence besides that?—Certainly; unless he was going in voluntarily.

4374. If he was going in voluntarily, you would not require to strengthen the provisions of the English Act?—A voluntary patient may, if he pleases, go into a voluntary institution, but if he needs to be detained under an order by the sheriff or magistrate it is advisable.

4375. At present a patient going voluntarily is ordered by two Justices of the Peace to go for 12 months, and the complaint is that the fact of requiring two Justices to act in that case makes this voluntary submission rather too difficult?—I propose it should be done by the sheriff, or sheriff-substitute—by one.

4376. And in that case you would have the form throughout, and require the sheriff and not the Justices of the Peace?—I should be disposed to recommend that for the same reason as in the case of habitual criminals, and that the case of such persons should be disposed of by the sheriff and not by the Justice of the Peace.

4377. Only in one case, the case of persons applying on their own account, the law makes certain provisions, and you would go the length of altering those provisions for the sake of uniformity?—I would make it uniform; but I do not hold to that.

4378. You make two medical certificates the statutory sine qua non?—Yes. I follow the Lunacy Act, that the certificate be signed by two medical men.

4379. But you do not follow the Inebriates Act which does not require any medical certification at all?—My reason for thinking that a medical certificate is necessary, or advisable, is this, that I have seen cases in which I had reason to think that drunkenness had been the effect and not the cause of insanity—cases in which insanity has appeared, and there are a great many cases in which I think it would be desirable that a medical man should be called.

4380. What I wish to get your views on particularly is this, that we have generally found that the gentlemen connected with the legal profession wish to throw the whole responsibility off themselves, on to medical experts, as far as possible, and the medical experts have thought that the sheriffs or the judge is the person to take the responsibility?—I should rather combine the two, and if necessary that further evidence should be obtained; but I should say the sheriff or magistrate should be the judge. Mr. Alexander Blair. 27 Nov. 1894.

4381. Then you propose one year for the first, and three for the second?—That is rather a medical question, but I propose that one year should be the first limit—'not exceeding'—please observe that. (Reading.) 'Fifth—if person detained in Retreat has private means, or his friends are able to provide for him, expenses to be borne by him or them, otherwise expenses to be defrayed out of rates or Government grants. When the person detained, or his friends, pay the expenses of detention in Retreat, he or they to be allowed to select Retreat, subject to approval of sheriff. In other cases sheriff to determine Retreat.'

4382. Here we come to a knotty point,—'expenses to be defrayed out of rates or Government grant.' I should like to pursue that a little closer. There are many towns that would like to have a Retreat if the expenses were defrayed out of Government grant, and many a Government would be glad to have them if they were defrayed out of rates?—I do not express the opinion whether the expenses should be borne by the rates or by Government grant. My own view is that where there are friends they should be called on to pay.

4383. Friends is an elastic term. You could not come down on them except in the case where they could be come down on for alimentary allowance?—I mean it in that sense. (Reading.) 'Sixth—The rules and regulations of the Retreat to be framed so as to give as much liberty to persons detained as may be consistent with the proper discipline of the Retreat, and the reformation of the persons detained. Seventh—Persons absconding from a Retreat, or wilfully and persistently violating the rules thereof, to be subject to imprisonment. Persons knowingly and wilfully aiding persons detained in Retreat to abscond therefrom to be liable to fine or imprisonment, and further to pay all expenses incurred in discovering and bringing back to Retreat persons who may have absconded. Eight—Sheriff to have power at any time to enter and inspect Retreat.'

4384. There again you require more machinery? You have inspection provided, and I am not aware of sheriffs acting in that way?—They are acting as inspectors of prisons and lunatic asylums. I am only putting that in, in order that the Secretary for Scotland might have an officer who could go and see what was going on. I merely adopt that from the Lunacy and Prison Acts, but I have no wish that the sheriff should be employed.

4385. Persons absconding from Retreat should be subject to imprisonment. In the case of persons whose friends were paying for them, how would that work? Supposing you take a case in this report given by a departmental committee appointed by the Home Office. In the licensed Retreats in England, where they have compulsory powers of detention, they always take payments before hand; but a patient wishes to get out, and a case is given here where he was obstreperous, broke a lot of windows, and kicked up a row. You would require some supplementary provisions to prevent the owner of the Retreat from letting him out?—If the owner of the Retreat let him out, or acted in such a way as to drive him out, he would be acting in such a way as to deprive himself of his license.

4386. Such institutions as private houses, you propose to license. What is your analogy for that? Lunacy?—At present I know that there are resident in different parts of the country persons who do receive and treat inebriates. I think, in many cases, such treatment may be attended with good effect. I believe it has been found to be attended with good effect. I would give a license to such persons, if they could show that their houses were in a proper situation, and their arrangements satisfactory.

4387. Have you any special knowledge of the provisions of the Lunacy Acts for license?—I have not.

Mr. Alexander Blair.

27 Nov. 1894.

4388. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But do you think the sheriff should on trustworthy information take the initiative in cases of habitual drunkenness, ultimately terminating in grave assault or murder?—They have not hitherto come into the hands of the police, but their habits are notorious, and well known. In such cases the persons who must take the initiative are the police. I presume they will be acquainted with the character of the person in question, and I think the necessary steps might be taken by the Procurator Fiscal.

4389. In regard to a private Home, such as Queensberry Lodge, where the persons enter voluntarily, you do not think Government inspection is a necessity at all. At least I understood you to say so?—I think that where the institution is intended to receive persons who are sentenced or ordained to remain there, they ought to be under Government inspection. But I do not think that Government inspection is necessary where the house or institution is one to which persons may go voluntarily, and from which they may voluntarily depart.

4390. Take the case of a weak-minded person who may be taken to a Home. In such a Home may not the manager be peculiarly interested in detaining such a person? Don't you think it would be advisable to have inspection likewise, so as to make illegal detention an impossibility?—I certainly would be pleased to see inspection in such a case, but I put it as a necessity in the case of an institution in which persons may be confined; but I do not think it is absolutely necessary in the case of an institution or a house where a person may be living for treatment voluntarily.

4391. The cases are hardly on all fours, but in the interests of all concerned, do you not think the periodical inspection of all Retreats by an independent authority is desirable?—It is very difficult to draw the line between houses which must be, and need not be inspected, unless you take such a line as I propose.

4392. Regarding the people who now voluntarily sign away their liberty for months before two Justices of the Peace. I understood you to say that you thought inspection of Retreats such as these was desirable?—I think so; wherever they must reside, their residence there is compulsory.

4393. Whenever they sign away their liberty. Now with regard to that class of inebriates whose friends are unable to pay for them, and who are not themselves able to pay. They are neither paupers nor police drunkards. On whom should the burden fall of their maintenance?—It must be borne either by the rates or by Government grant; but I am not prepared to say whether it would be more justly borne by the one or by the other.

4394. If you had Government inspection would not that imply proportional expenditure on the part of the Exchequer?—The inspector might be paid by the Exchequer, and the remainder of the expenditure be borne by the rates; or it might all be borne by the rates.

4395. Would not that raise a fresh crop of litigation as to the settlement of inebriates if the cost was to be entirely borne by local rates?—Yes. You might have questions similar to questions regarding settlement under the Poor Law.

4396. (By Miss Stevenson.) I understand you to say that in cases where inebriates would be sent by order of the Court, you consider it would be desirable that such cases should be under inspection?—I do.

4397. Do you not think that in institutions where people are practically detained against their will, by relatives withholding their means of living, it is desirable that these should be under inspection?—I think it might be desirable.

4398. In the case of Queensberry House, the people are so far voluntary prisoners there, as they usually, I understand, sign a paper expressing willingness to remain in the institution for a month or two months, as the case may be; but practically they are detained there, legally or illegally, because they have no means of getting away, because their friends withhold all money from them?—They are entitled to go away, and do go away when they please. They cannot be detained there. Mr. Alexander Blair.

4399. Practically they are detained from the fact of their having no means of getting away?—You may say they are detained in this way, that their board and lodgings are paid for there, and it would not be paid for unless they stayed there.

4400. I understand the gate is locked, and no one can go through there without a pass from the governor. The gate-keeper has instructions that no one can go through there without a pass from the governor?—There are certain rules like that.

4401. And with regard to such institutions, is it not desirable they should be under inspection?—I am not at all opposed to inspection. My view is, that where a person is sentenced to remain in an institution, such institution ought to be inspected.

4402. Do you think it desirable that a person so detained should be detained under a legal form?—If they are to be detained in a prescribed retreat for a certain time; but if they go to an institution voluntarily I do not think that in these cases a legal form should be compulsory, or that, in all cases, inspection may be necessary; but I have no objection to it. Only that if the sheriff or magistrate is to have power to order a person to be detained in a certain institution, such institution should be under inspection.

4403. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I understand your proposal comes more or less to this—you would have different systems of treating habitual offenders—boarding-out in private institutions, poorhouses, or wards in poorhouses, and ultimately, at the back of all that, prison for the refractory?—I would send habitual offenders to prison, except in those cases where from age or ill-health they are not fit subjects for prison discipline; and in those cases, instead of allowing them to go free, I would send them to the poorhouse, unless there was some suitable person willing to undertake their care.

4404. How would you deal with the ordinary habitual offender who is in virtually good health?—I would sentence him to imprisonment and to police supervision. You cannot provide for him after he is free from prison.

4405. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Are you keeping in view that we are dealing here with habitual petty offenders?—I have rather, perhaps, in view cases of theft and assault. These are cases which the chairman mentioned.

4406. Habitual serious offenders?—Yes, but offenders whose offences become more serious on account of the number of previous convictions.

4407. (By Col. M'Hardy.) There are offenders who have 100 convictions against them for breach of the peace, and so on, and some 500 previous convictions. How would you deal with these men, if they were men who were able-bodied?—I think if an able-bodied man has been so often convicted it shows that a short term of imprisonment has no effect upon him, in such a case I would award a longer term of imprisonment, and couple that in certain cases with police supervision for a term.

4408. Do you think persons given to offences of disorder, through drunken habits, would be improved by the punishment being lengthened?—Assuming that the person to whom you refer would belong to the class of habitual drunkards, then I think he ought to be treated in that way as an habitual drunkard.

4409. In all these institutions, I suppose the administration that you contemplate would be more or less local?—The administration would be local, but the inspection, I think, should be under an inspector appointed by the Government.

4410. Therefore it would be natural that the maintenance of these places would be to a certain extent from the local funds—the rates?—I say at once that I have not considered at all whether they should be laid on the local rates, or the Imperial funds.

4411. Would you consider it desirable that the numbers in these institutions should be large, or that it would be desirable to keep them as small as possible?

Alexander—I think, in many cases, it would be desirable that the number should be small. But I quite see that if you multiply the number of these institutions it would add so much to the cost, that it would create difficulty and objection.

4412. We are inquiring, among other classes, into the class of the vagrants. I suppose you have something to do with that class?—I have very little to do with that class; they are not brought before me.

4413. But looking to the general order of the county, the fact of their existence must be considered?—It must be.

4414. You are familiar with their existence, and conditions of life, I dare say. Do you consider that any system of houses of shelter would be desirable, or otherwise, for these people wandering over the county?—There are in large towns institutions somewhat of the kind you mention, such as the House of Refuge here. There are similar institutions in Glasgow and Dundee. I think, with regard to the country generally, a well organised system of inspection in lodging-houses would do more than anything else.

4415. We are told that in one of the Lothians, at one time, there was a number of houses of shelter for vagrants; but after experience of them, the County Council found it undesirable to keep them up, as they thought that they increased the number of vagrants?—I cannot speak to that.

4416. Is there any reason why the law stands as it does at present in regard to begging, that it should be an offence in the town, and not an offence in the country?—On principle there can be no reason why the law should be different in one place from the other.

4417. One can scarcely think it would have accidentally happened. There is no reason you know?—I suppose the reason is that begging is more frequent in towns than in country places.

4418. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What is your object in wishing these increased powers for the treatment of habitual offenders?—Because I think experience shows in the case of these offenders that the present law has no effect.

4419. Do you think the increased sentences would be deterrent or reformatory?—Both.

4420. Or is it only to get them out of the way?—No; it is to get them away from their surroundings and temptations for a longer period than can be done at present.

4421. Do you think if they knew they had to undergo a cumulative sentence it would deter them from committing crime?—I think it would in many cases.

4422. Do you think a longer period of detention would be reformatory?—I think it would, coupled with the supervision. There may be a difficulty in working out police supervision, because, on the one hand, I know that the supervision of the police does hinder persons sometimes from getting employment. On the other hand too much may be done.

4423. You would let them out on a ticket-of-leave?—Not that; because a ticket-of-leave is a remission of the sentence of imprisonment. I would rather place them under the control of the police, to a certain extent, after the term of imprisonment has expired.

4424. Could you recall them to prison?—If they committed an offence I would make them liable to sentence for a longer period.

4425. It would practically be a ticket-of-leave?—To a great extent.

4426. As regards your No. 3 class—those persons who are old and infirm—you mean they should be put under a compulsory charge; they are not to be allowed to escape?—What I propose is that these persons should be placed, either in charge of a suitable private person, or in the poorhouse. If they refuse to reside with, or abscond from such suitable private person, then I would make them reside in the poorhouse, and give the authorities of the poorhouse certain compulsory power.

4427. In both cases there is compulsion?—But in the case of the private person I do not give him that compulsion; the person placed with him Mr. Alexander knows that if he or she does not live there, he or she Blair will be placed in the poorhouse, and compelled to reside there. 27 Nov. 1894.

4428. Then the expense of residence with the private person would be borne by the Poor Law?—I have in view there the case in which there might be relatives or friends who would be able to provide for them. If the payment is to be made out of the rates, then I should think the poorhouse would be the proper place, unless the Poor Law Authorities think it a case in which the person might be properly boarded out. That is done in the case of children, and there might be cases in which, for some sufficient reason, the Local Authority might think that a case of the kind I refer to might be properly placed under the care of some private person.

4429. You told us you had been occasionally appealed to by inmates of Queensberry House—judicially appealed to. Might I ask you what action you took?—I have always made some inquiry as to the person. I have directed a communication to be made to their friends if they have been placed there by friends, and also brought to their own notice that they have been placed there for their own welfare, and that if they did go away they might lose the advantage which their friends were endeavouring to secure for them by residing there. In many cases their friends have provided for them, and brought under their notice that it was possible that the provision made for them might be lost. But I have no power to compel them to remain. In short, they are entitled to go if they please.

4430-50. Do you consider that one of the proofs of habitual drunkenness must be a certain number of convictions before a magistrate?—Not necessarily. I think habitual drunkenness might be proved without such convictions, of course there are cases where there might be no convictions, where persons are habitual drunkards who are to a certain extent watched over by their friends, and prevented from showing themselves.

4451. Domestic cases?—Yes.

4452. In that case you would accept the evidence of friends and relations?—What I propose is that there should be a certificate by two medical men, and such further inquiry as the sheriff may consider necessary. I don't call for convictions in any case.

4453. May there not be some cases in which the proofs are in no respect medical? Purely social cases.—Would not medical men have still to report in those cases, where there was no representation that it affected a man's health?—I think in almost all cases in which a person is what I may call an habitual drunkard, there would have been opportunities for medical men seeing him in that state.

4454. Supposing medical men were to refuse to undertake this responsibility? You know that medical men decline to give certificates in cases of lunacy on account of the great dangers to which they are subjected?—I do not anticipate that medical men would refuse to give a certificate.

4455. You know in cases of lunacy many decline to do so?—I am aware that in some cases of lunacy medical men who have not made that particular form of disease a special study, are unwilling to grant certificates.

4456. Then is it not the case that the first thing the habitual drunkard would do when he came out, would be to bring an action against the medical man?—I do not think he would, because he is detained by order of the sheriff.

4457. The medical men would get behind the sheriff?—The sheriff pronounces the order, and he pronounces it on evidence led. That evidence is partly to be medical, and if I had to deal with any such cases, I would attach great importance to that evidence.

4458. If the medical men refuse?—Then these medical men would not be witnesses.

4459. In that case you think the sheriff would be the sole judge?—No, pardon me, I require a certificate of two medical men, or if it be too many, one medical man; but in the case where there would be medical as well as legal considerations, the sheriff or magistrate

Mr. Alexander Blair. who deals with the case ought to have information from medical experts, not only that the man is a drunkard, but that detention would be an advantage.

27 Nov. 1894. 4460. (By the Chairman.) You live in Edinburgh?—I do.

4461. You have nothing to do with the administration of the Police Law?—As sheriff; but the work is done by my substitutes.

4462. Theoretically you are engaged in the work, but in practice it is done by the substitutes?—It is not the department I deal with.

4463. I should like your opinion as to the state of the Edinburgh streets with regard to decency, and absence of disorderly conduct of all sorts. Do you think it can compare with other towns in Scotland?—I can say, from my own recollection, that it is much better now than it used to be. I cannot say much about other large towns, such as Glasgow and Dundee.

4464. My reason for asking you is that there is a very great difference in certain cases. Take the crime, or the offence of prostitution. There are three and a half times as many persons per 1,000 of the inhabitants arrested in Glasgow as there are here, and the sentences pronounced here are very small, compared with the sentences pronounced in Glasgow; and I wish to have the opinion of an impartial person in an official position, as to whether the result of such an administration of the law was what would be desired, or whether the system leads to any offensive scenes on the streets?—

So far as Edinburgh is concerned, as far as my recollection goes, and I have lived here all my life, I think the streets are much better now as regards that matter than they used to be. I speak particularly with regard to the New Town. I am not so familiar with the High Street, and that part of the town at night, but I think they have improved also.

4465. As to 'drunks.' We understand that 'drunk and incapables' are very leniently dealt with under the Edinburgh Police Act; that no man can be drunk and incapable who has a friend who can look after him. Is that state of the law compatible with a decent state of the Edinburgh streets, as compared with other Scottish towns, or do you see much drunkenness?—I do not know much about other large towns.

4466. Does drunkenness obtrude itself if you are going along the street?—It does not. Perhaps at certain times—at New Year time it does, if you are going along the street, for a day or two; but going along the town generally I do not think drunkenness does obtrude itself very much to one.

4467. And you think prostitution does not exceptionally obtrude itself?—I think not, and much less than formerly. To put down that, you would require if possible to go to the houses.

4468. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You don't propose a long term of imprisonment for habitual drunkards and prostitutes. Your replies had more reference to grave assaults?—Yes. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Donald Miller.

MR. DONALD MILLER, Chief Attendance Officer, Edinburgh School Board, called in and examined.

Mr. Donald Miller.

4469. (By the Chairman.) You are compulsory officer of the Edinburgh School Board?—Yes.

4470. How long have you occupied that position?—For 21 years.

4471. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you tell us how many parents have appeared before the School Board since 1872?—I have taken 12 years, from 8th April 1882, to 15th February 1894. There appeared 4,307 parents.

4472. How many have appeared more than three times?—169.

4473. Can you tell us anything about the number of children represented, and what was done with them?—5873. Of that number 557 were sent to Industrial Schools.

4474. How many of these parents brought before the Board were subsequently prosecuted before the sheriff, and how were they punished?—Between the same dates there were 1,161 parents brought before the sheriff, of that number 351 were fined or imprisoned, and there were attendance orders issued in the case of 793; and 17 cases were otherwise disposed of, or departed from.

4475. How many were imprisoned?—I cannot say exactly, the number is not more than one third. In the last two years I made up a statement. During two years ending October 1894, the number of defaulting parents before the Board was 1,072, of that number the percentage of intemperate parents was 52·7—fathers 30 per cent; mothers 35 per cent; and both parents 33 per cent.

4476. In reference to these parents, were they what you would call habitual drunkards?—They were parents that took drink possibly every day, less or more, but they were not altogether away from work.

4477. In reference to the children of the Industrial Schools, will you tell the Committee what the procedure was in the case of these children?—I will go over the number sent to Industrial Schools in connection with our work. During the first five years of the Board's existence there were 199 boys and 42 girls, in all 241, sent to Industrial Schools. During the second five years 287 boys, and 65 girls; total 352. During the third five years, 361 boys, and 117 girls; total 478; and the fourth five years, 512 boys, and 107 girls; total, 619; the total of the whole being 1,359 boys, and 331 girls; boys and girls 1,690 in 20 years.

4478. Will you tell what was the procedure with reference to these children?—They were principally brought under the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act, not having proper guardianship. There were different circumstances in connection with each of them. Some were illegitimate children left with parties who had nothing to do with them, whose parents paid for them for a little, and then deserted them. Others were children of intemperate parents, who neglected them, and allowed them to run about the streets, night and day, for weeks at a time. These children were those under the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act. The section is:—'Any person may bring before two justices, or a magistrate, any child, apparently under the age of 14 years, that comes within any of the following descriptions; namely, that is found begging or receiving alms, whether actually, or under the pretext of offering for sale anything, or being in any street or public place for the purpose of so taking or receiving alms; that is found wandering, not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or possible means of subsistence; that is found destitute, being an orphan, or having a surviving parent who is undergoing penal servitude, or imprisonment; that frequents the company of reputed thieves.' That section was interpreted in a pretty wide sense by the magistrates for a number of years, and was very much amalgamated with the 16th section of the Act, which deals with children beyond control; but in 1892 there was an order came out, and the sections were defined by the Government in such a way that children could not be dealt with in that way. The sections were put in this way. The part of the section under which the child was being sent had to be defined. The child must be found begging as one of the reasons why he should be sent under the 14th section; and then, secondly, the child must be found wandering—not only that he was without proper guardianship, but he must be found wandering, before he was eligible under the 14th section. That was since 1892; and then he was to be found destitute. That is the circular from the Crown Office. [Appendix No. .] I have a warrant here that was sent to London very lately, a child not having a house or proper guardianship; and because that child was not found wandering, he was refused by the Treasury. The position of the child was this. He was illegitimate, brought up by an old woman who died a year ago, and left the child with a daughter who is a very questionable person. She did not want to keep the boy; she had no control over him. It was thought this child was without proper guardianship, but because he was not found wandering, the Treasury refused to accept the warrant.

Mr. Donald
Miller.
27 Nov. 1894.

4479. In consequence of this you have found great difficulty in disposing of these children under the provisions of the Education Act?—The greatest difficulty.

4480. As a matter of fact, it is the case that a number of these children, who might have been sent—if they could have been sent—to Industrial Schools under this section, have subsequently got into the hands of the Police?—That is so.

4481. And in consequence the number of juvenile offenders has increased—the number of children sent from the police as convicted of petty offences has increased in the past years?—That is so; very largely. I have made a statement to show that. Of the 113 children sent during 1893, there were 70 of them sent from the Police Bar. During the previous five years, there were 84, or 13·68 sent from the Police Bar. The others were sent before they fell into crime. They were taken earlier, and sent to Industrial Schools.

4482. Will you tell the Committee what is your procedure in dealing with the case of a neglected child, whose parent incorrigibly neglects his education, to get the child sent into an Industrial School?—The first thing is to cite the parent, after he has been visited several times, before the Board. I hand in forms of citation.

4483. If he fails to satisfy the Board that he has a reasonable excuse, he is warned. If he is summoned a second time, he is ordered to be provisionally prosecuted. If within a month, the child does not attend school regularly, he is sent before the sheriff?—That is so.

4484. You produce evidence in reference to the neglect, and if you prove that the child comes under one or other of the sections of the Industrial Schools Act, you then get the case remanded, and bring it before the Burgh Court?—That is so. The sheriff, after hearing evidence in the case, where the child seems to him neglected, delays the case with the view of having it disposed of in that way. I hand in the form of complaint before the Burgh Court.

4485. You bring the case before the magistrate in the Burgh Court, and he orders the child to be detained in a certified Industrial School, unless it is a case that may be sent to the Mars Training Ship?—That is so; until he attains the age of 16.

4486. From what you have said it appears that the effect of the new interpretation of the Clause of the Act of 1866 by the Home Office is, that a large number of children, formerly sent to the Industrial School through the action of the School Board, now fall into crime, and are sent from the Police Bar?—That is so, and I have given the percentage.

4487. Do you think there is an improvement in the general condition of the class in the community among whom you work since the Education Act came into force?—I think the improvement is very marked.

4488. You prepared a statement some years ago for one of the masters of the Mars Training Ship. Comparing your report then with your report now, I think you stated there is a marked improvement in the condition of the class among whom you work?—That is so. There were some 56 cases got up in 1874, and they were all very well known to me. Here is an example—'The house of this family is in a very 'miserable state, and when visited, the mother was lying 'sick among some rags on the floor. There is no 'furniture. There are four children . . . ' and so on. Most of them were in a most destitute state. The houses are certainly very much improved in the last 20 years.

4489. You know Campbell's Close?—Very well: every house in it.

4490. The Committee walked through Campbell's Close in going to the House of Refuge. You can confirm the statement I made that it is one of the worst closes in the Canongate?—I should say the worst.

4491. (By the Chairman.) What I wish to ask you is—would you not find in that close just as bad as you spoke of?—The very same sort of case. But they are scarcely so bad as they were 20 years ago. It was rather a danger to go up some stairs in that close 17 years ago.

4492. For the compulsory officer?—Yes, for the compulsory officer. Although they never interfered with myself personally, still it was somewhat dangerous.

4493. From your experience, can you give us any results, in the case of girls, of their employment in selling newspapers in the streets?—I think the employment of girls in selling newspapers has had a very bad result.

4494. You have known cases where it has led to their being lost?—Several cases where they have been entirely lost, and that was the commencement of their downfall.

4495. Have you many cases of children, who have come under your notice, who have been sent to Reformatories rather than Industrial Schools?—There are, but not many; a very small percentage of the cases we have had to deal with. They were generally sent to Industrial Schools. They must be twice before the Court before they can be sent to a Reformatory School. They cannot be sent for the first offence.

4496. It is within your knowledge, I believe, that nearly all those cases of boys brought before the Police Court, for any offence whatever, have sometime or other been brought under your notice; and in nearly every case their parents have been brought before the School Board for neglecting the education of their children?—That is the case, almost all over. I have seen cases of boys before the Court for playing football and getting into places where there were trees, but these were good attenders, and they were merely admonished.

4497. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Do you find that the introduction of Free Education made much difference in the number of parents brought up?—Not very much.

4498. Do the children of vagrants come under your cognisance?—Yes.

4499. Are there many children of vagrants?—A good many go through Edinburgh. Generally in winter a good many come into town.

4500. Do they give you much difficulty?—Very often. We only can see them once or twice when they leave the town. Some of them do remain if they find something to do. If we can manage it, we get them into school, but it is only a short time when they are away again.

4501. What do you do in that case?—For a number of years I sent a large number of these children to Industrial Schools, when they were going about without a father or a mother—not both parents, but a man or a widow going about. They were sent under the 14th section into Industrial Schools.

4502. Do you know that this section was so interpreted that if you found a child wandering, but having parents with it, but the guardianship of these parents not being proper, you could nevertheless not send such a child to an Industrial School?—We did formerly, but it is very difficult to find a child wandering without any home. If it has a parent we cannot exactly say it is found wandering. But we reach it under the part of the section which says, 'without any proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence.'

4503. Do I understand you that the child is not held to be wandering if the parents are wandering also?—I am afraid that is the interpretation.

4504. That is how the Treasury interpret it?—Yes.

4505. Is there some difficulty in Parochial Boards sending children to an Industrial School?—It is very difficult for them to send children to Industrial Schools. In fact they are the parents of the children themselves, and the children chargeable to the parish never want parents or guardians, because the parish becomes their guardians, and the magistrate would refuse to send them to an Industrial School; although there have been cases where children were boarded-out by the parish. They ran away to friends in Edinburgh; and with the consent of the Parochial Board I took them out as wandering, and having no one to look after them.

4506. Did you find any difficulty in dealing with the Parochial Board?—Never. The Parochial Board was willing to do anything to help children in that state.

4507. If the children would not stay in the poor-house, they were quite willing that you should get them put into an Industrial School?—Yes.

4508. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What would be a definition of the term wandering?—No fixed abode, or no home whatever.

4509. Of course these tramps may remain in one place for weeks?—They live in the lodging-houses.

4510. Or they may camp on the ground for a month?—They are really wandering, but the child is not wandering alone when it is wandering with its parents. It is under the guardianship of its parents.

4511. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you assure the Committee that you have had as many prosecutions of defaulting parents since Free Education was introduced as before?—We have not more. I think we have less, if anything.

4512. The reason of that being that before Free Education—one of the greatest boons of the century—became a fact, parents were not able to furnish their children with decent clothing and food?—That is so.

4513. Therefore you would expect that there would be fewer defaulting parents?—That is so.

4514. What sentence as a rule does the sheriff pass on a defaulting parent?—It depends very much on the amount of neglect—from 5s. up to £2.

4515. Do you find it does any good?—It does very little good to the parent that is punished, but it does a great deal of good to others as a warning that they may be punished.

4516. Do you institute a second prosecution of the parents?—Certainly. He gets more if he comes up a second time. But that is only in a case where the parent is really to blame, and where a man is perfectly able to attend to his family, if he only had the desire to do so.

4517. What class of people generally are defaulters?—They are out of a number of classes—labouring people, some in a good way.

4518. Do you find many in a good or comfortable way of living?—Not many.

4519. Do you mean people whose work is uncertain?—That is the most numerous class.

4520. From your experience, what is the bodily appearance, or physique of the persons who are up before the magistrate?—Very neglected themselves.

4521. Poor, miserable, half-starved looking creatures?—Very many.

4522. What is generally the cause of neglecting to educate their children?—Intemperance in the most of cases.

4523. Is the intemperance more frequent in the male than in the female parent?—In the cases I went over the female predominates.

4524. And it becomes a difficult matter for the father to educate his children with such a wife?—That is so. There is not much danger where there is a respectable, sober, industrious mother.

4525. Do you ever come across defaulting male parents who are separate from their wives, and live in lodging-houses?—Very many.

4526. What is your idea about a man who lives in a lodging-house? Do you think he is better there than going back and living with his family?—I have come across some cases where the man was obliged to leave his family, but in most cases there was blame on both sides.

4527. You would not think of restoring family relations?—In some cases it would not be good to do so. They would be better apart; but the woman alone with her children suffers.

4528. Where the parents are incorrigible, what becomes of the children ultimately?—If they are not taken from the parents, they ultimately go wrong.

4529. Are they taken?—A number are taken.

4530. Where are they sent?—Sent to Industrial Schools.

4531. Have you any opinion on the subject of children who are allowed to go to pantomimes?—I have opinions on that. It is only four years since the Edinburgh School Board took the matter in hand. I have seen nothing myself of bad result from the licensing of children. They were very carefully looked after. I went once or twice myself to see that the children were properly treated; also the houses of the parents. I reported to the Board as to the state of the parents, and the children, their education, and also the physical fitness of the children.

4532. What is the minimum age that you would allow for a girl?—Not below eight.

4533. And the maximum?—We have not fixed a maximum.

4534. Is the danger not greater the older the girl is?—It is. We have no power to fix a maximum.

4535. (By the Chairman.) Under what circumstances are children sent to Reformatories in contradistinction from the Industrial School?—The child has to be convicted on a previous occasion. It may be a conviction of stripes, or a short term of imprisonment. If that is so and he comes back a second time, and is under 12 years of age, it is a question for the magistrate whether he should not be sent to a Reformatory School. You cannot send a convicted child to an Industrial School. A child to be sent to a Reformatory requires to commit some offence punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment.

4536. In many places they imprison for kicking a football in the wrong place?—There is the option of a fine there.

4537. Have you any experience of children coming back to you from Reformatories or Industrial Schools?—I have seen a large number of them, and followed them very carefully for a large number of years, and my impression is that 80 per cent. of them turn out well.

4538. You state a close percentage. Is it formed on your own idea. Is it taken from facts collected, or from the reports?—It is from the facts collected by the Industrial Schools, and my own knowledge corroborates these reports.

4539. You mention you brought these children up under the Industrial Schools Act. You brought them before the sheriff in the first place, with a complaint that they should be sent to prison—that they should be found liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s., or imprisonment not exceeding 14 days. He remanded them to the Burgh Court?—What the sheriff did in the case where it was proved to him that the fault was very much the child's, or the child was so situated that it would be better for him to be sent to an Industrial School, was to delay the case for a month to enable us to deal with the child under the Industrial Schools Act.

4540. Then you summonsed him to the Burgh Court?—We did not exactly summons him. He was asked to come, under the Act of 1866.

4541. The Act gives power to search for and open lock-fast places?—That is not acted on.

4542. How did it come here? [Form of citation No. .]—I do not know; it is not put in force.

4543. I would like some definite information about this if we could get it. I want to ask about the Day Industrial Schools?—We have not any in Edinburgh as yet.

4544. (By Miss Stevenson.) How many children would be dealt with in a Day Industrial School, if such an institution would be established?—I think a very large number could be dealt with in a very short time by being sent to a Day Industrial School; because the children of parties who have to go out early in the morning, and children who are truants could be dealt with in Day Industrial Schools. They could be brought there at six in the morning, and kept till six in the evening.

4545. (By the Chairman.) If they are truants?—They are under an order from the sheriff to be sent to that school. If they do not go, an officer is sent and they are brought. [The witness then withdrew.]

28 Nov. 1894.

4546. (By the Chairman.) You are superintendent of the Night Asylum here?—Yes.

4547. How long have you held that post?—I have been there about two-and-a-half years.

4548. Have you had any previous experience of similar institutions?—I was for nearly eight years with Mr. Quarrier in Glasgow.

4549. In his Night Asylum?—In the City Orphan Home.

4550. You have heard it suggested that the Night Asylum was merely an asylum for beggars and a home for those who prey on society instead of earning an honest livelihood, you believe that is entirely untrue?—I believe it is entirely untrue. A great many of the people who are there are men who actually want to work.

4551. You say the loafers and beggars who are known are not admitted?—No.

4552. And that the directors of the society endeavour as far as possible to confine the benefits of the society to those for whom it was instituted?—Yes.

4553. And the class for whom it was instituted are artisans, labourers, women and children?—Yes.

4554. You say the loafers who are known are excluded?—Yes.

4555. There is some arrangement is there not between you and one of the Parochial Boards here under which paupers are sent to you?—If paupers make application to the Parochial Board too late for admission on that day they are generally sent to me for a night's lodgings before they are admitted.

4556. Of course these are to a very large extent loafers?—Not necessarily.

4557. You have no choice in connection with them?—Oh certainly, I can exercise my own discretion as to whether I take them in or not. Several come from the Board asking admission whom I refuse. I know them to be loafers.

4558. Does the Board pay you?—No. There is no agreement. There is an agreement between St. Cuthbert's Board and the Refuge in the Canongate.

4559. Take first the class of artisans. Have you many of them?—Not a great many. At particular times when there is great depression of trade there may be more than at others.

4560. Have you any classification?—No. We don't make any classification of the inmates, but I think skilled labourers amount to 15 per cent. perhaps of the whole.

4561. These are men who are really in want of work and who are on the tramp looking for it?—Yes.

4562. These are only casual?—Very casual these are.

4563. Do they stay with you more than one night?—They may stay two or three, or perhaps four nights according to circumstances.

4563A. Do they get a bed and something to eat?—They get porridge at night and in the morning, and their lodging.

4564. Do they pay anything?—No; only those who are absolutely destitute are admitted.

4565. The artisans, I see, are divided into two classes—the really good workmen who are casually out of employment, and men who have never really mastered their trade, and without any perseverance to casual work.

4566. You have got a considerable number of them?—There are quite a number of them.

4567. Among both these classes of artisans you find a large proportion who have been reduced to destitution by intemperate habits?—A large proportion I am sorry to say.

4568. Your next class includes labourers, navvies, farm-servants, &c. Have you many of them?—The greater bulk of those who come there are labourers, farm-servants and navvies, mason's labourers, foundry labourers and iron workers.

4569. And these again are divisible into good men who are simply casually out of work, and shiftless fellows who are the last to be employed and the first to be dismissed?—Yes.

4570. How many do you shelter in the course of a year?—Last year it was over 23,000. Those who applied numbered 25,818 an average of almost 71 a night.

4571. Which is the average?—Seventy-one per night is the average of those who applied.

4572. How many per night were housed?—Sixty-five, altogether 23,612 were admitted.

4573. Divide these first into males and females?—There would be an average of 50 men per night.

4574. And how many women?—Fifteen women and children.

4575. You don't separate them?—No.

4576. You don't subdivide them in your statistics?—Yes. Here is a table showing that the number of men admitted was 17,653, the number of women 3,991, and the number of children 1,968.

4577. You have told us about the division of the men into artisans and labourers, &c., and you have told us the artisan class constitutes about 15 per cent. of the whole—of the whole men and women, or the whole men?—The whole of the men.

4578. Now we come next to the women and children. You say they are laundry women, charwomen, and out-workers unable to find steady employment, who shift from one place to another in search of work?—Yes.

4579. Do many belong to Edinburgh?—Not many of them. We take as few residents in Edinburgh as possible. Originally no person belonging to Edinburgh was admitted, but that was modified in a great degree.

4580. Then I see you have a class of women with children, either deserted by their husbands, or only fitfully supported by them, and you say this division includes those never married but who have lived in concubinage. What are the relative percentages of these two classes?—The percentage of women with children is actually small. Perhaps 15 to 20 per cent. of women with children. A great many of these accompany their husbands who are in search of work.

4581. Those who have been deserted by their husbands and are only fitfully supported by them? Have you many of them?—A good many of these come.

4582. What do you do with them?—I can simply

Mr. William
Gilchrist.

28 Nov. 1894.

take them in, and recommend them to apply to the poorhouse so that the parochical authorities may prosecute their husbands, and make them maintain them.

4583. Is that done?—Sometimes they do. At other times they shift somewhere else.

4584. Do you keep any women for any length of time?—No; not for any length of time.

4585. How many nights?—It all depends on circumstances. If a woman has got a prospect of employment she may be kept for a week, perhaps longer. If we wish to make inquiries with the idea of sending her home, she may be kept three or four weeks.

4586. Have you any funds to enable you to do this?—Yes. The Strangers Friend Society instituted for that purpose was amalgamated with the society in 1871, and the funds of that society are available for that purpose.

4587. I suppose you apply them in the case of men as well as women?—Yes.

4588. You state that your experience in working among this class has brought before you many facts regarding vagrants, beggars, and prostitution, and you believe these are greatly increasing?—I do. I may state that a great many of the men who come to the night asylum eventually become beggars—those shiftless fellows who get a bit of work here and a bit of work there, and who are never employed regularly. They either become beggars or a burden on the parish.

4589. You say that many of the women live in habitual idleness, and on making inquiries you find that they make begging and even theft a profession. Is that after they have ceased to be your inmates?—They come to me for admission but are not admitted; for the simple reason that very possibly they come when drunk, and I have some knowledge of their antecedents and mode of livelihood and refuse to admit them.

4590. You say they profess to have some occupation when they are beggars and thieves? You must harbour a lot of these unknown before you detect them?—It is possible I may harbour them once or twice, but if I get to know them they are never admitted. It is a difficult matter to know a person's occupation when you see them once. If I have any doubt at all about them, I endeavour to make inquiry, so as to learn something about them.

4591. When do they come in?—At seven o'clock.

4592-93. How many are licensed hawkers. Are not the poorest class those who do not pay licenses?—Yes. There is a class that has no licenses. They go about the country selling laces, &c.

4594. They are very frequently run in by the police?—Yes.

4595. For not having licenses?—Yes. But a number don't require licenses.

4596. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Are there a number who sell things that they make themselves who do not require licenses?—Yes.

4597. (By the Chairman.) Do you think begging is much encouraged by the alms giving habits of the people of Edinburgh?—There is not the least doubt about it.

4598. You mention a man who lives by begging, and who when refused charity by ladies frightened them by oaths and threats?—That is a common enough occurrence, more especially in the quieter districts of the town.

4599. Have you any facts that would lead you to think that many of those beggars who come purporting to be destitute have money in their possession?—Yes; I have found them with money in their possession.

4600. Do you search them?—No.

4601. I saw a fellow arrested in Edinburgh recently on whom £9 was found?—Yes. He is a chronic case.

4602. He is not one of your friends?—No. I don't think I have ever seen him.

4603. You say the main cause of beggary and vagrancy in your opinion is drunkenness?—I think so.

4604. Do you have many prostitutes, or do you admit them at all?—It is a difficult matter to say. I could not say whether there are many prostitutes come or not. There have been women whom I have found out to be earning a livelihood as prostitutes, but having never seen them before, I was not in a position to tell. But after I became acquainted with these facts on the next application for admission, they were refused.

4605. I ask you because you refer to cases, and the method of dealing with prostitutes is one great problem to be solved. What are your ideas about it? In the first place do you speak from experience in connection with your asylum?—I speak from experience gained during the past 14 years as missionary and as superintendent of Mr. Quarrier's Home. Many cases with which I came into contact then were fearful.

4606. Give us your ideas on the subject. You say many of them take to the life, not from starvation, but from lack of appreciation of its immorality?—That is true.

4607. I suppose the only way to bring that appreciation is through missionary efforts?—I think something else is necessary. I think their homes should be such as to enable them to cultivate such a moral appreciation. One-roomed houses are distinctly against any person cultivating a sense of morality.

4608. Are one-roomed houses against a sense of decency in your opinion?—I think there is nothing that so much tends to create prostitution as one-roomed houses.

4609. Are they decreasing in Edinburgh?—It is hard to say. There is a project before the Town Council just now for building one-roomed houses, I am sorry to say. But there are a great many one-roomed houses in which men and women live in continual prostitution.

4610. You can hardly call that continual prostitution. Our business is with police offences, not with offences against morality. What you speak of is concubinage?—No, I do not mean concubinage, but direct prostitution—women who go out into the street and accost men with the purpose of getting them to their homes.

4611. We were told these brothels had been to a large extent rooted out?—Yes, that is true; but these women get rooms of their own.

4612. Well, what do you propose to do there from a legislative point of view. You have got laws against over-crowding?—Yes, that is true; it is a difficult matter.

4613. You have got laws to enforce sanitary arrangements. Do you propose the law should follow the individual into his or her house, if it were not conducted as a nuisance to the neighbourhood?—It is difficult to say what creates a nuisance to a great many people in Edinburgh. Their moral sense is so blunted they will take no notice of it. I quite understand it is a difficult matter for the police to take these cases up except they receive notice. There is no doubt that in a great many of the lower quarters of the town, houses are so conducted that they are not only a nuisance to the neighbours, but a direct source of vicious training to a great many young women.

4614. If they are a source of nuisance, the neighbours have it in their power to complain to the police?—They do not; their sense of morality is so blunted.

4615. Do you mean there are so many of them in the same way themselves?—Yes. That's about it.

4616. You have been both in Glasgow and Edinburgh a good deal. Whether do you think the city of Glasgow or Edinburgh is superior in the matter of decency in respect to public prostitution?—I have often thought both very bad.

4617. Do you think one is worse than the other?—I think Glasgow is worse than Edinburgh.

4618. That is to say in the matter of women obtruding themselves on the streets, and in the matter of these disorderly classes you refer to?—Just the same open prostitution.

4619. You say many of them are married women, who from intemperance and from similar causes have drifted into sin, and young women who have slipped into prostitution as a means of livelihood. Have you come across many of them. It was mentioned to us by one of the witnesses that in many cases these married women are driven into the streets by their husbands for the purpose of earning money by prostitution?—There is not the least doubt of it. I know a great many cases are true. I could not bring up an actual case just now, but while in Mr. Quarrier's Home, I know from facts we have gathered in searching out the histories of children admitted to the House, that the husband has driven the wife out to commit prostitution.

Gilchrist.

4620. You refer in your notes to some experiments in Bohemia for the institution of State Labour Depots. Do you know anything about them?—I have just read an account of them.

4621. I notice from your report that the number of admissions into your Home has greatly increased from 1888 to 1893. It has risen from 14,000 to 26,300 odd?—Admissions in 1891 were 16,592, and in 1892, 20,817.

4622. In 1893, they were 23,000?—This year they will probably be less—between 21,000 and 22,000.

4623. When you give persons shelter for a week or more do you feed them?—Yes.

4624. Do you give them all their meals?—Well, if it is a woman she possibly gets all her meals; if it is a man, no.

4625. You speak about your experience with Mr. Quarrier. Will you explain briefly the working of his Home?—Its working is simply to take orphan and fatherless children in and educate them.

4626. It is not a night refuge?—Yes, but the establishment of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children very much mitigated the night refuge work when I went there.

4627. Have you ever had anything to do with juvenile delinquency?—Not a great deal.

4628. Do you take in boys?—Yes.

4629. Have you many, or do you distinguish them in this report?—Yes, we have a great many. Some are in charge of their parents, but those who are not, we detain until some inquiry is made regarding them, and until something can be done for them.

4630. You have in 1892 781 boys?—Yes.

4631. You say they are often with their parents?—Yes.

4632. You don't have much to do with boys of an age that would be driven into crime on their own account?—Not a great deal. There are not many boys of that age come. Of course there are a great many lads come from 12 to 21 years of age, but these are not of an age to be detained or done anything with. I got two boys into Mr. Quarrier's Home, one of whom is now in Canada, and there are several others that have been in the asylum that have been sent to Reformatories, not directly through me, because they were with their parents when they came.

4633. But who have afterwards been sent to Reformatories?—Yes, and Industrial Schools.

4634. (By Dr. Farquharson.) How long has the asylum been established?—Since 1840.

4635. How long have you been connected with it?—Two-and-a-half years.

4636. There has been a large increase in the admission. Are these 23,000 all fresh admissions?—Not all fresh admissions. Men are eligible once in three months, but sometimes that rule is mitigated if a man wishes to go and look for work, or if he has found work.

4637. Is there any limit to the number of times a man may be admitted?—Four times a year is the limit. There is no limit to the number of times except in so far as my own discretion guides me, and my knowledge of the applicant.

4638. These 23,000 admissions don't mean actual admissions, but so many re-admissions?—So many re-admissions. There is a note stating how many re-admissions took place. We don't count as a re-admission a man who comes at an interval of three months. The number of original admissions in the course of the year might be perhaps 50 per cent. who have never been in the night asylum before to my knowledge.

4639. Can you suggest any other reason than the annual increase of vagrancy and beggary for this great increase in the admissions?—There has been a good deal of depression of trade, but things are beginning to look better, and the admissions are decreasing. Last month we had a decrease of 400, and the quarter before a decrease of the same.

4640. You think it has to do with trade?—Oh yes. Depression of trade and industrial strikes bring a good many, not only of the people actually on strike, but of people put out of occupation indirectly through the strike. A great many iron workers and others who are dependent for work altogether upon the supply of coal, were thrown idle by the recent coal strike in Scotland, and went to England to see if they could find occupation there, and that has perhaps something to do with the decrease. They went to England, and did not return owing to the prolongation of the strike. A great number of the admissions came from England—about one-fourth of the whole.

4641. Do you think the benefits of your institution are becoming more widely known?—There is not the least doubt of that. One communicates with another, and a great many are sent to me through the police.

4642. Do you extract any work from them?—No, we have no labour test. I am sorry to say I tried to get the directors to establish a labour test, but it has not been done.

4643. You prefer something of the kind?—I should think it would be a guarantee of a man's willingness to work.

4644. What sort of labour would you consider best adapted to the purposes—outdoor or indoor?—It is a difficult matter to say. It would require to be some occupation that could be easily begun, and finished at almost any time. It would need to be some merely temporary work such as stick-breaking, or stone-breaking, or the manufacture of firelights, or something of that sort.

4645. Would agricultural labour be suitable?—Agricultural labour would be suitable if the conditions were favourable, if you had a place to set them to work upon; but the trouble is that a great many of the men who come are not acquainted with agricultural labour—only a very small percentage except during the months of July and August.

4646. (By the Chairman.) But you have no power to enforce a labour test?—Of course it would be altogether optional. But you could compel them to labour before they got lodging. If they did not want to do it you could say there is no admission.

4647. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is the sole qualification for admission destitution?—Yes.

4648. Do you have a great many of the tramp class coming to you?—Doubtless there are a few, but as I said, when I know them, they are not admitted. We include these in the genus loafer; because they do nothing but beg.

4649. You say a great many of the prostitute class remain in the occupation for lack of appreciation of its immorality. Does that apply to the first stage, or to the continuation?—Sometimes.

4650. You mean to say they continue in it because they do not see any harm in it?—Yes.

4651. Not because they find difficulty in getting out of it?—There would be no difficulty of getting out of it if they chose. They are so trained they have no moral sense left, either as to theft, prostitution, or anything else. I have in my observation children at play even at the back of the asylum—I have seen things too horrible to relate. These were little children from seven to twelve years of age, and the only conclusion I could come to was that they had been in actual contact with vice because they were so well acquainted with it.

4652. Is your institution entirely kept up by voluntary contributions?—Yes. The town gives a subscription of £30.

4653. (By Col. M'Hardy.) As to the real number of admissions to the institution, if you deduct re-admissions, it seems to me you have to knock off about 23 per cent. ?—Yes.

Mr. William
Gilchrist.
28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. William
Gilchrist.

28 Nov. 1894.

4654. You said that about 15 per cent. were artisans?—Yes.

4655. Good artisans I understood, and that did not include the number of those who were poor workmen, or hardly workmen at all?—I would not like to say that. The number of really good men who apply might be 10 per cent., including printers, founders, joiners, blacksmiths, tinmiths, &c.

4656. So that there would be about 1,500 really good workmen in search of work arriving at your place?—1,500 good artisans—men thoroughly capable.

4657. Where do these artisans come from?—From all parts.

4658. Do they come from the south or the north?—South, north, east, and west. A great many come from Glasgow, and from Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hull, Hartlepool, and Sunderland.

4659. But Edinburgh itself is hardly a centre of manufacture, and you would hardly expect that workmen would crowd to Edinburgh. Are they passing through to some other place?—A great many are passing through, and they may look into the engineers or other shops, and if they don't get any work here they pass on to some other great centre of industry, such as Manchester, Newcastle, Birmingham, or Carlisle. They go through Haddington and Galashiels probably.

4660. But in regard to the number, I think you said one-third of the artisans came from the south?—One-fourth of the whole number come from the south.

4661. What induces that migration? Are they in the position of the workmen you have referred to?—Yes; I should suppose so.

4662. Have they explained to you why workmen should come from such centres as the Tyne to Edinburgh?—Depression of trade in some instances. Sometimes trade strikes have caused them to be sent adrift. There is no doubt a great many of them are on the tramp merely because of intemperance.

4663. The good workmen even?—Some of them.

4664. The majority or otherwise?—No, not the majority. There are not a great many sent adrift by intemperance. They may drink a little, but they are not habitual offenders. They may take a little too much on a Saturday night, but they have not been dismissed from work owing to intemperance.

4665. The numbers altogether have very largely increased. Have the numbers from Edinburgh increased?—Not materially.

4666. You reduce the Edinburgh numbers to a minimum as far as you can?—Yes. A great many of those who are from Edinburgh, are, I regret to say, women and children.

4667. As regards the times that they came to you, the quarters seem to be on the whole fairly divided, except that the first quarter is the least?—Yes.

4668. That would be the time you would expect people would be in sorer straits. How is that the case?—It may be that they can't go about so freely in the winter time. The roads are blocked by storms, and walking is difficult. In the summer the number is increased by people who seek work in the country. For instance in June, July, and August, there is always a large incoming of Irish labourers who come for the hay-making and the harvest.

4669. So that the small numbers in the winter time arise from the fact that the population which is tramping in the summer is resident in the winter?—Yes.

4670. What do they cost per head?—About 4½d. per night.

4671. Including breakfast?—Including everything; taxes, gas, superintendence, fire.

4672. (By the Chairman.) You have not to pay rent. Your house is your own?—Yes.

4673. (By Col M'Hardy.) There is no capital charge included there?—No.

4674. Do you do anything for these people except giving them their night's lodging, in the way of advice for instance. Have you any system of getting them information as to work?—Yes. Any one who wishes to ask me I give him all the information in my power.

4675. Have you the means of collecting the necessary information?—Sometimes I get information from the directors. I have no other means.

4676. Have you any organised system of collecting information?—No.

4677. The men I suppose go out during the day?—Yes.

4678. They must have some food during the day. Where do they get it?—They get it by begging, or from some person they know who has work. On Sundays they go to the free breakfast in the Drill Hall, or some other place where free breakfasts or free teas are provided.

4679. You imagine that a good many of them beg their dinner?—I suppose a good many of them do. In coming through the country there is no doubt these men beg at farm-houses on the way.

4680. You have got a benevolent institution that is going to look after these people—but during the day you don't see any occasion for providing a man with a meal?—The society is simply to give them a night's shelter and help them on their way. At one time meals were supplied at the cost of 1d., but these have been stopped.

4681. Why was that stopped?—I really could not say.

4682. (By the Chairman.) You said you gave them money?—If I found anyone was deserving. We had the funds of the Strangers Friend Society.

4683. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The Strangers Friend Society?—Yes, the society steps in and gives him an order on the railway or the steamboat company to help him on his way.

4684. If it is a deserving case?—Yes. People are sent to Glasgow, Hull, Newcastle, Sunderland, Liverpool, Dundee, and Aberdeen, and sometimes even as far as Shetland.

4685. If a man is simply a tramp do you send him to any of those places?—No.

4686. It is only men in search of work?—Not merely that, but men who have got work and are on their way to it, or if a case had been in the Infirmary and wanted to go home, and had no means of getting. Then the Strangers Friend Society stepped in and helped him.

4687. I suppose one of the objections to introducing a labour test is that the financial result, does not cover the cost of imposing it?—It would not cover the cost.

4688. So that would constitute another charge on the establishment?—Yes.

4689. However desirable it might be in the way of suppressing mendicity?—Yes.

4690. Is there any society in Glasgow that does there the same work as you are doing here?—Yes; there is an asylum there.

4691. Is it a large place?—Yes; much larger than ours.

4692. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) How many can you take in?—About 110.

4693. How many of these men, and how many women?—Between 30 and 40 women, and the rest men. Of course it might depend. I might take in 50 women and 60 men.

4694. Have you any reason to suppose that a number of the people who come to you could afford to pay if they liked?—No; I don't think they could afford to pay. The simple reason is that the accommodation we give is so meagre, that no one who could afford to pay for his bed would come.

4695. Then have you any doubt that all of them are really poor?—I don't think there is any doubt about that.

4696. What proportion do you suppose of habitual vagrants manage to get in?—Well, I don't think more than 5 per cent., if even that. Those I know are not admitted; those I don't know, of course, are admitted until I do know something about them.

4697. It is merely by accident they have got in?—Yes.

4698. Have you any idea how the inmates would look upon a labour test?—They would be very much against it, I have not the least doubt.

Mr. William
Gilchrist.

28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. William
Gilchrist.
Nov. 1894.

4699. Do you not think there is a proportion of them who would prefer doing some work in return for their shelter?—I have had men offer to do work for me in return for shelter.

4700. Does it not occur to you that the respectable workman would feel more independent if he could do something in return?—There is not the least doubt about that, but the difficulty is just to hit on those who are respectable, and who are not. I think the French system of dealing with workmen is a very good one to separate the two classes very distinctly—that is men who are really out of work, and men who earn a living by vagrancy and begging. Each workman in France has a little book in which is stated his name and occupation, when he was last employed and where, followed by the signature of the master with whom he was last employed.

4701. Do you take their names when they come to you?—Yes.

4702. And where they come from?—Yes; and where they are going to.

4703. And what occupation they profess?—Yes.

4704. (By Miss Stevenson.) From that register you keep can you find out if the same people come back year after year?—Yes; I keep a black list of names—of those whom I suspect are not altogether honest.

4705. But you would not refuse a person admission because he had been in two or three times the previous year?—No. The rules of the institution give a man admission once in three months.

4706. On what principle do you make the selection?—I know a good many of them.

4707. And you would rather take in one you knew in preference to a stranger?—I would not. It would be altogether the other way. Strangers who come for the first time are always admitted in preference to any one else.

4708. You say you have admitted parents with children. Have these people as a rule tramped?—Sometimes they have tramped, sometimes they have been in the town.

4709. How many of a family have you taken in at once?—Seven.

4710. As many as seven?—Seven children. Nine of a family altogether.

4711. You said you had admitted boys, but that as a rule they were with their parents. Have you found that boys whose parents are resident in Edinburgh ever came asking for admission?—Very often.

4712. Do you admit them?—Never.

4713. You don't?—No.

4714. But since you have come you have not found them?—There were two boys belonging to Leith came to the institution and said they belonged to Peterhead. I detained them and wrote to Peterhead about them, and got back word that nothing was known about them at all. Eventually a man from Leith came up and claimed one of them, and said he knew the other. It turned out that one of them had stolen money.

4715. You have not found that a common occurrence among the boys resident in Edinburgh?—No. Very seldom.

4716. Will you explain to the Commission the kind of bed these people have?—It is simply an inclined plane of boards.

4717. A continuous long board?—A continuous inclined plane.

4718. There are divisions?—No. There are no divisions.

4719. And they get a blanket?—They get a rug to cover them. The place is heated up.

4720. Are they not expected to attend divine service?—Yes. Every night.

4721. That is a condition?—You may say it is a condition. There is worship every night.

4722. And in the morning?—Not in the morning except on Sundays.

4723. You admit people on Sundays?—Sometimes.

4724. When they come in on Saturday you keep them over Sunday?—Yes.

4725. (By the Chairman.) You must have a good many Roman Catholics?—Yes, a great number.

4726. Do you get into collision with any of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in connection with them?—No. No trouble at all. I have not heard any complaint.

4727. Do the police ever come to your place in search of criminals?—Sometimes.

4728. Do they ever catch any one there?—Sometimes they bring me criminals against whom they have no direct charge, but about whom they are making inquiry.

4729. But you have no power to detain the criminal?—No. They bring him at their own risk.

4730. You are registered as a common lodging-house, or something of that sort?—No. We are not in the same category. We make no charge of any kind.

4731. I suppose that does not preclude the police from having free entry?—They can come in at any time.

4732. Do they avail themselves of that?—Sometimes.

4733. Have the police made any arrests, and if so, how many during last year?—I never saw any direct arrests made there.

4734. Do the artisans that come belong to unions?—Some of them do.

4735. Do not the men connected with these unions apply to them in the first place for assistance?—There are some of the societies give no pecuniary benefit—some of the trades unions.

4736. You mentioned the trade of a printer and that of an engineer. In Edinburgh they have unions have they not?—Yes.

4737. Do you send them to apply to their unions for assistance?—Yes. Very often.

4738. I ask this question because you apparently accept their statements about their trades and their desire for work, many people declare that tramps—I do not wish to disparage your inmates—but that tramps give very erroneous statements regarding their trade and their willingness to work. I wish to know whether you test these artisan cases by any reference to unions?—They show me their union tickets. These men who belong to unions are generally very ready to show their union tickets.

4739. Do you not send them to the secretary of the union?—I can't do that before the morning.

4740. How is it they don't apply to them?—It may be that they got into town too late to apply.

4741. You mentioned that some volunteered work. Do none when they get into employment send you pecuniary acknowledgment?—Sometimes I have received something.

4742. How much in the year?—It differs.

4743. Do you get a £5 note out of them?—Oh no! The most ever I got I think was 2s.

4744. Out of the lot?—Yes; 2s.

4745. In one year?—Yes.

4746. From all the people?—Yes. Some solitary cases whose fares have been paid have returned the fares.

4747. These respectable men who form 10 per cent. of the whole, say 1,700, don't send anything to you to vindicate their independence?—I am sorry to say they don't except they put it into the box.

4748. How much do you get out of the box?—Some years £3 or £4.

4749. The public put into the box too?—Very likely. I could not say who puts in.

4750. Where is the box?—It is in the window, just at the outside as they pass down the Lane.

4751. Do you often catch any fellow putting money into the box?—I have never by any possibility seen any one put money into the box yet. Once it was found open, but there was nothing taken out of it as far as I could see.

4752. You mentioned that there were 65 people per night in the Asylum. In reply to Professor Wilson you said you could accommodate 110. That is 45 per night more than you actually have. How is it you don't fill up?—Sometimes there are a great many more applicants

Mr. William
Gilchrist.
28 Nov. 1894.

than I take in, but those who are dismissed are generally people I know, either drunk or habitual frequenters of the institution, who are not eligible for admission.

4753. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You speak of 10 per cent. of the artisan class coming for relief. Does your total represent so many different persons?—Those persons very seldom come back.

4754. Now are these 1,700 separate individuals, or do you have the same people appearing more than once?—I mentioned that a great many of these were shiftless fellows, who had never thoroughly mastered their trade, and lacked application. Mr. William Gilchrist.

4755. But does that observation apply to 1,700 individual persons?—No. 28 Nov. 1894.

4756. What is the longest time you keep one of these vagrants?—I have kept one for a fortnight.

4757. Don't you keep some of them for months?—No. We have no such establishment as they have in Glasgow where they have a Home in connection with the Asylum. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. R. C. Gray,
Mr. John
Macdonald,
Miss Hepburn.

MR. R. C. GRAY, S.S.C. (with whom was associated MR. JOHN MACDONALD and Miss HEPBURN), called in and examined.

Mr. R. C. Gray,
Mr. John
Macdonald,
Miss Hepburn.

4758. (By the Chairman.) You are the honorary law agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes, and also a director. Mr. Macdonald is the honorary secretary of the society and Miss Hepburn the assistant secretary.

4759. Explain to the Commission on what legislative basis the society stands?—The position is this. From 1886 when we commenced the society we had no special Act—we simply had the ordinary Police Acts—to entitle us to interfere at all, and until the Act known as the Children's Charter was passed we had very slender powers indeed. In 1889 that Act was passed, and gave us very great assistance.

4760. Tell us about it?—The main provision of the Act enabled us to prosecute and punish parents for ill-treating their children by neglect, that is to say, by leaving them without proper attention, food, clothing, lodging, &c. And now we have the Act passed in August last which amends and consolidates the previous Acts.

4761. What was the amendment?—Some of the provisions were found unworkable, and we desired also to change the age of the children—the age at which we could interfere with parents for neglecting their children, and other provisions.

4762. You wished to change the age from what to what?—The present state of the law is that 'if any person over the age of 16 years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of 16'—before it was 14—'wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes.'

4763. Do I understand you to say 16 in both cases?—Yes. That is to say the parent or guardian to be prosecuted for ill-treatment of a child must be a person over 16 years of age. We sometimes have prosecution of guardians who are not parents—elder brothers or sisters in charge of the children. We cannot under this Act prosecute any guardian not over 16 years of age, and the child in respect of whom prosecution takes place must be under 16.

4764. What other amendments were there?—In Scotland the prosecutions are confined to the sheriffs, and many of the sheriffs before whom prosecutions were brought were not clear about punishing parents for a single assault. They held it must be habitual ill-treatment. That was cleared up in this Act.

4765. By what words?—The words in section 1, 'wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child, or causes or procures such child to be assaulted, ill-treated, neglected, abandoned, or exposed in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering or injury to its health (including injury to or loss of sight, or hearing, or limb, or organ of the body, and any mental derangement), that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.' There are some words different from the former enactment.

4766. Does that repeal the former enactment?—Yes. It not only repeals the Act of 1889, but an Act passed a few weeks before this one. A Bill was promoted in Parliament for the amendment of this Act, and when it went to the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor and others considered it more necessary to consolidate the law on this subject, and they proceeded to pass the Act I have quoted from—Chap. 41–57 and 58 Vict.

4767. Have you had any prosecutions under it?—We had 13 or 14 in the month of October.

4768. Give us a few specimens?—We had one in which the father was punished with imprisonment for ten days for neglect; another in which Sheriff Hamilton admonished the parent; another where Sheriff Rutherford sent the mother to prison for 30 days; another where Sheriff Orphoot sentenced the father to 21 days for neglect.

4769. For neglect?—Well, we call it neglect. In many of these cases there is some active ill-treatment, but we charitably often call it neglect. The punishment indicates where some of the cases may be aggravated. In another case where the mother and father were both charged, the father got 30 days, and in another the mother got 14 days. One child was sent to the Mars. That is a case in which the prosecution takes place before the magistrate. We have numerous cases like these. In another one the father got for neglect, 21 days, and in another for neglect and ill-treatment, the mother got 30 days' hard labour. With reference to that may I observe that at our last meeting of directors, the chairman, who was also a visiting Justice of the prison, said he doubted whether the hard labour which was added to some of the sentences was unacceptable to the prisoners. His understanding was that they got better attention. We resolved to make inquiry into that matter.

4770. Have you any personal evidence to give on that point?—We have simply the statement of the chairman made at the meeting.

4771. Have you any further cases?—The next case was one of assault, where the father was fined £3 with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment. The next was one of neglect, where the child was sent to an Industrial School. That was before the magistrate.

4772. What status have the Protection of Children Societies throughout the country in connection with this matter?—In Scotland they have not the same status as in England to institute prosecutions.

4773. They have no status in England beyond that of the ordinary individual?—But in Scotland the ordinary individual has no status. However, there is this important element, that the judges and sheriffs recognise our Shelter and Home as places to which children may be sent under a custody order which they are entitled to pronounce under this Act.

4774. You have a legal status in that way, but not a legal status in initiating prosecutions?—No, we have not.

4775. If your officers hear of any case they make a report?—Yes.

4776. And you recommend the Procurator Fiscal?—Yes.

4777. You recommend that information should be lodged with the Procurator Fiscal?—We lodge the information ourselves, and some of the Fiscals have this confidence in us, that they take straight from our hands the information we have got up, and straightway commence the case.

4778. That is of course very creditable to you, but is that Scotch law?—It is for the Fiscal, as an officer of the Court, to judge. He may be satisfied or dissatisfied with the manner in which we have got up the case, and it is open for him to deal with it.

4779. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) He is entitled to proceed on what he believes to be trustworthy information?—Quite so.

R. C. 4780. (By the Chairman.) Let us come to the place where you have a status. You have got a Shelter?—Yes.

Mr. John Macdonald, Miss Hepburn. 4781. The sheriff can order the children into your custody?—Yes.

Nov. 1894. 4782. What are the powers?—They are contained in section 6 of the Act, which is as follows:—‘Where a person having the custody, charge, or care of a child under the age of 16 years has been—(a) convicted of committing, in respect of such child, an offence of cruelty within the meaning of this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the schedule of this Act; or (b) committed for trial for any such offence; or (c) bound over to keep the peace towards such child, by any Court, that Court either at the time when the person is so convicted, committed for trial or bound over, and without requiring any new proceedings to be instituted for the purpose, or at any other time, and also any petty Sessional Court before which any person may bring the case, may, if satisfied on inquiry that it is expedient so to deal with the child, order that the child be taken out of the custody of the person so convicted, committed for trial or bound over, and be committed to the custody of a relation of the child or some other fit person named by the Court (such relation or other person being willing to undertake such custody) until it attains the age of 16 years, or for any shorter period, and may of its own motion, or on the application of any person, from time to time by order renew, vary, and revoke any such order; but no order shall be made under this section unless a parent of the child has been convicted of, or committed for trial for the offence, or is under committal for trial for having been or has been proved to have been party or privy to the offence, or has been bound over to keep the peace toward the child.’

4783. I notice you speak of committing the child to the custody of proper persons. To whom is the child committed?—Instantly on the conviction being pronounced, our secretary, or some one representing us in attendance, asks the sheriff to pronounce a custody order in favour of the society.

4784. It does not mention the society in the Act?—It may be any fit person.

4785. Whom do you put forward as your custodier?—Our secretary.

4786. The fact is your society has no legal status?—Orders are made out in the name of the secretary, but we have asked an order in favour of a brother of the child.

4787. Supposing you get that order. Take the case of a child three years old. Is your secretary bound to look after that child?—We have children under six months in the Shelter at the present moment. We have had them three weeks old.

4788. How long do you keep them?—As short a time as we possibly can.

4789. What is the order the judge gives you. Supposing a sheriff commits a child to your custody two years old, let us know the length of time for which they are committed?—(Mr. Macdonald.) Always till they are 16, and 14 in the case of boys.

4790. What is your duty in the matter. Does it involve the duty of providing for the children?—Yes.

4791. And the responsibility in case of neglect of being pulled up under the Act?—Of course it will.

4792. What becomes of the children committed to you?—They go to our Society's Home at Corstorphine, a permanent Home, where we have accommodation for 100.

4793. How many have you?—We have about 95. We can take in about ten children a year.

4794. In the event of anything occurring to you, or a new secretary being appointed, what would be the procedure?—I suppose they are committed to my custody officially as secretary of the society.

4795. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) The Court may renew or revoke the order at any time?—Yes.

4796. (By the Chairman.) Is there any provision for incorporation?—(Mr. Gray.) No. The facilities to which Sheriff Wilson has referred are quite sufficient, for though the order is pronounced at the time of the conviction, it may be done at any other time.

Mr. R. C. Gray, Mr. John Macdonald, Miss Hepburn. 4797. Take another case. Mr. Macdonald is made personally responsible, and if these children were neglected he might have to bear the entire responsibility. Is there no provision under that Act for the incorporation of such a society, under the Limited Liability Acts for instance, or anything of that kind?—No.

4798. You don't feel any desire that it should?—No. We do feel we should have a much larger and better status for the work we do.

4799. You are dependent on voluntary subscriptions?—(Mr. Macdonald.) Yes. Our revenue last year was over £2,000, and in 1886 it was £508. That refers entirely to the eastern district of the society. The society is named the Scottish National.

4800. Where are the head-quarters?—In Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the accounts are kept entirely separate.

4801. You are simply platonically associated?—We meet alternately in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

4802. Do you know as to the Glasgow society?—The subscriptions are hardly so large as ours.

4803. Are they equally elastic?—For the last year £1,040 was the amount of the receipts, and it has been about that sum for the last five or six years.

4804. You don't pass on the children. You have no power to pass them on unless you get another judicial order?—They send the children to us.

4805. The sheriff commits them to your custody?—Occasionally. This matter of the custody of children is only done in a very small number of prosecutions, only where the offenders are habitual offenders, or where it is very much in the interests of the child to be taken away.

4806. I presume your Shelter affords a place into which wives and children may come during the imprisonment of their husbands?—We don't take the mothers; we take the children. The jurisdiction is restricted to a child. A child may be taken to any place registered as ‘a place of safety.’

4807. That is what I want to know; what does the Act say?—‘A constable may take to a place of safety any child in respect of whom an offence under paragraph (a) of section 2 of this Act has been committed, or in respect to whom an offence of cruelty, within the meaning of this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the schedule to this Act has been, or there is reason to believe has been committed.’ And further ‘a child so taken to a place of safety, and also any child under the age of 16 years who seeks refuge in a place of safety, may there be detained until it can be brought before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and that Court may make such order as is mentioned in the next following sub-section, or may cause the child to be dealt with as circumstances may admit and require until the charge made against any person in respect of any offence as aforesaid, with regard to the child has been determined, by the committal for trial, or conviction, or discharge of such person.’

4808. Then as to the Shelter being a place of safety?—Our place is registered as a place of safety by the magistrates of the city.—(Mr. Gray.) We sent application to the magistrates to have it so recognised.

4809. How does it work in Glasgow and elsewhere when there is no place of safety?—(Mr. Macdonald.) Under this Act a poorhouse is considered a place of safety.

4810. Under that Act a judge could consider the master or superintendent of the poorhouse a proper person, so that no legislation is required to enable Parochial Boards to take custody?—I am speaking now of what happens before conviction, where a child can be taken at once without the consent of parents.

4811. What private places of safety are registered in Scotland?—Simply the three shelters, and all the poorhouses all over the country.

4812. How long can you keep the children?—Until the parents have been tried before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

Mr. R. C. Gray,
Mr. John Macdonald,
Miss Hepburn.

23 Nov. 1894.

4813. Supposing the mother is sent to prison, what is the position of the father?—If the father were unable to look after the children we would remove them to the Shelter.

4814. But supposing you consider them in danger at home, and the father is of a different opinion, who carries the day. Can you remove them without his consent?—If the children have been very much neglected and we can get a doctor's certificate.

4815. What powers have you?—We really take such powers.

4816. You take children in the case of one neglecting parent and retain them against the will of the other?—We have children in the Shelter now to whom that applies.

4817. (By Sheriff Doug Wilson.) You have legal power under section 5?—Yes.

4818. (By the Chairman.) What is the legal power?—The powers are in the following 'a constable may take to a place of safety, any child in respect of whom an offence under paragraph (a) of section 2 of this Act has been committed, or in respect of whom an offence of cruelty within the meaning of this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the schedule of this Act, has been, or there is reason to believe has been committed.'

4819. What I want to know is this. A police constable brings you a child in respect of which an act of cruelty on the part of the mother has been perpetrated. The father comes to you and says 'I want my children home'?—We can refuse under this section to give the child up until the question is tried.

4820. But you said you have no power?—(Mr. Gray.) We exercise powers in taking the children.

4821. You don't want any increase of powers?—No.

4822. In Glasgow I understand they send them to you?—(Mr. Macdonald.) That is only in the case of very young children. We endeavour as far as possible to send them to Industrial Schools. The magistrates have power to send them to an Industrial School—children over seven.

4823. How many of them go to Industrial Schools. I want to know how many have become a charge on Imperial funds?—I am sorry I have not got the information.

4824. But you could send it in to the secretary?—Yes.

4825. In the country districts you think the superintendent of the poor would be a suitable person to have custody of the children?—Yes, if they would do it.

4826. But they say they want powers and that they have not got powers. They say they want powers to deal with the very sort of children this Act was meant to deal with. Does not this Act give them power to keep the children?—Yes it does.

4827. Would it not be a proper function for your society to enlighten Parochial Boards as to their powers?—So we do as far as possible in parts of the country where we have opened branches.

4828. Yes; but by means of circular, I mean. You say they have this power?—Yes.

4829. I suppose most of these cases are cases of neglect?—All the neglect cases, but not all the assault cases; not in the worst cases of cruelty.

4830. What are they cases of?—Sheer brutality. —(Mr. Gray.) Savage temper.

4831. Have you had occasion to interfere with many of the richer classes?—(Mr. Gray.) Not a great many, but we have had a number. We had one child of a man who possessed £7,000 and lived in a house in Polwartha Gardens. It was the only child of its parents. Its mother was prosecuted, and we took the child and by arrangement with us it was sent to Abofeldy. It was sent to board there on the condition that the school-master would not part with it without informing us.

4832. You will have much greater difficulty in getting information in regard to these?—Yes.

4833. Do you find increasing readiness on the part of the public to inform you of cases of cruelty?—Certainly we do.

4834. You have branches in Edinburgh and Glasgow?—Yes. There are some sub-branches in Montrose, Dumfries, Kirkcaldy and various country districts.

4835. You work them from Edinburgh?—That is so.

4836. Let us know the number of cases inquired into in Edinburgh?—In Edinburgh last year 862 cases were inquired into. Of these 228 were sheltered and clothed. There were 4,457 meals given to them. There were 68 cases of parents or guardians prosecuted; 219 parents cautioned and kept under supervision; 59 children sent by order of the Court to Industrial Schools, Training Ships, and other Homes, including our own Home at Murrayfield.

4837. These are cases with which the parents have been unpunished or convicted?—Yes, that is so.

4838. You have also had 105 cases visited by the officers from Edinburgh in the surrounding district?—Yes, at Kirkcaldy, Alloa, Stirling and so forth.

4839. Do your officers ever get a warm reception?—They do occasionally. On a very few occasions they have been assaulted. Our senior officer was very seriously assaulted on one occasion.

4840. You speak of a great number of meals. That is when the children have been kept a long time?—Yes.

4841. Can you give the numbers in Glasgow?—They had 1,044 cases inquired into; 906 children sheltered; 344 children clothed or partially clothed; 6,111 meals given in the Shelter; 1,175 children placed in Industrial Schools, etc.; 875 parents remonstrated with and cautioned where prosecution was not expedient; 62 convictions have been obtained—rather fewer than Edinburgh.

4842. Can Mr. Macdonald give us any information as to the over-lapping of charities for the protection and care of children in Edinburgh or Glasgow. You have got here a very large number of meals given to children. What are these?—These are meals given to children who are in the Shelter.

4843. There is no over-lapping here?—No. There is none.

4844. The revenue is entirely from voluntary subscription?—Entirely; and £35 from the Town Council of Edinburgh.

4845. Tell me, Mr. Gray, how it is the Edinburgh Town Council is able to give so many grants to different charities?—They have a fund called a Common Good, from which they annually vote a sum to a number of charities, with a right to nominate one or two of their number to sit in committee with the management of the institution.

4846. You are connected with them through that?—They of their own will recognise us as one of the city charities.—(Mr. Macdonald.) The police send to the Shelter many children whose parents are locked up from Saturday night.

4847. Is not the proper place the poorhouse?—No; they went to the cells with their mothers.

4848. Do they often come to you in the case of children whose parents are locked up for a longer time?—No.

4849. Now the annual statement of accounts?—Subscriptions and donations last year amounted to £1,023, 18s., and board received from parents £129.

4850. How for board?—That is in the case of children whose board we have been able to recover.

4851. Are there any conditions for that?—Yes, along with the custody order.

4852. Do you often get it?—It is very difficult. We find it the best way for the officers of the society to call on the parents and endeavour to get money from them in that way.

4853. If you get all you are entitled to recover how much would you get?—I have never gone into that, but about £700.

4854. So you don't get more than a third or a fourth of what you should get?—Yes.

4855. Is an order made that something should be paid to you?—Yes.

4856. What is it usually?—4s. a week per child. It depends on the man's wages.

Mr. R. C. Gray,
Mr. John Macdonald,
Miss Hepburn.

28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. R. C. Gray, Mr. John Macdonald, Miss Hepburn.
28 Nov. 1894.

4857. Have you ever tried to recover any?—(Mr. Gray.) We have never been able to carry out a decree.

4858. It would be an alimentary debt?—Yes. It would be recoverable by imprisonment.

4859. How does it come you have never attempted to recover?—Because they are invariably utterly worthless characters.

4860. Up to what age have you had to step in for the protection of children?—Sometimes to the limit of 16, but not frequently. The cases are more frequently about 10 or under 10.—(Mr. Macdonald.) We have had to interfere in cases of girls where they have been in dangerous surroundings.

4861. There is an Act regarding the custody of children in immoral surroundings?—(Mr. Macdonald.) The Industrial Schools Act.

4862. You can interfere?—We do interfere, but that is not for us.

4863. Under this Act you rarely interfere up to that age; what are your general ages?—I should think from infancy up to 12 and 13.

4864. And Miss Hepburn, how long have you been connected with the society?—Since March last, as assistant secretary.

4865. You have nothing to do with the management?—I am in the Shelter the whole day. I superintend the management of the cases there, getting up the monthly report for the directors, looking after the officers, and investigating cases that come in.

4866. Do you go out?—No, I don't require to do so. I do visit occasionally.

4867. Have you any additional information to what has been said by Mr. Gray and Mr. Macdonald?—No. (Mr. Gray.) May I say in regard to habitual offenders we have not many cases of that kind for this reason; that, as we take the custody of the child, we do not hear any more of the offenders.

4868. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you recoup yourselves in the case of rich parents neglecting their children?—(Mr. Gray.) We occasionally do. We have cases where the children are taken from a wicked mother, the father being at a distance, and in such cases we may get it.

4869. In the case of the child you sent to Abergeldy?—The father cheerfully paid. He is a man of means.

4870. Is there any Shelter in Glasgow?—A Shelter, not a Home.

4871. Can you explain how it is that there should be so much more work done in Edinburgh than Glasgow in connection with neglected children?—The explanation is that our branch of the society is very much more active. We have four officers continually about, and we are on very good terms with the police. I suppose we are more active and earnest in the work.

4872. Does Mr. Quarrier do much of the work you do?—Yes; but it is remarkable that one of the sheriffs in Glasgow will not send the children to Mr. Quarrier's Home.—(Mr. Macdonald.) Mr. Quarrier works along with the society, and refers cases of cruelty to the society.—(Mr. Gray.) But one of the sheriffs in Glasgow prefers to send them to our Home at Corstorphine.—(Mr. Macdonald.) One reason is that Mr. Quarrier will not undertake to retain a child in this country.

4873. Mr. Quarrier, I am assured, is doing in Glasgow a fair share of the same kind of work you are doing?—(Mr. Macdonald.) Mr. Quarrier's work is entirely a charitable work, relieving destitute children, not necessarily cruelty, and our work is not charitable work at all.

4874. You spend money on the child?—Yes.

4875. It is to a certain extent charitable?—(Mr. Macdonald.) It is, but these children sent to the Home at Corstorphine comprise a very small portion of the work, and even these children are sent there by order of the sheriff.

4876. What do you look upon as a neglected child?—(Mr. Gray.) We have cases sometimes difficult to distinguish as they are so different in kind and in degree. But extreme filthiness of the child's person or surroundings, or if it is emaciated from want of nourishment, we would consider indicative of neglect in the sense of the Act. We have many such cases. Sometimes, however, the sheriff has remarked of a very poorly kept child that it was in that condition because it had to follow the poor fortunes of its parents.

4877. Would filth per se constitute neglect?—In an aggravated degree it would.

4878. (By Miss Stevenson.) You say you work along with the police. I understand that the police in connection with the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor have inaugurated a scheme for clothing children, and that one of the strong reasons they give to justify the employment of public service in the administration of charity is that it gives them the power of prosecuting parents in cases where the want of clothing is due to the neglect of the parents. Can you give us any instance in which any parent has been prosecuted to whom clothing has been given?—(Mr. Macdonald.) Speaking from memory I should say six.

4879. You work also along with the School Board Officers?—(Mr. Gray.) Yes.

4880. You mentioned that you had had parents of the better-class prosecuted for neglect. Have you any parents prosecuted whose average wages is over 40s. per week?—We have a number. We have had, curiously enough, no fewer than three or four workers in first-class printing works in Edinburgh, earning over 30s. a week, prosecuted and convicted for ill-treatment.

4881. So that it is not only the degraded class who treat their children cruelly?—No. The average wage of the parents of children prosecuted will be about 33s. a week.

4882. I should like to ask Mr. Macdonald a question with regard to the custody of the children under the Act. You stated that Parochial Boards had the power to detain the children under an order of the Court till the parent was brought to trial, and that subsequently the sheriff could order that child to be kept in custody by some person recognised in the Court?—That is not quite what I meant to explain.

4883. You said that the sheriff under this Act can sanction detention of a child in safe custody, and that one of the places to which the child can be sent is a poorhouse?—The section to which I referred is that which says that a constable may take the child. It does not require an order from the sheriff.

4884. I refer to the subsequent procedure after the parent or guardian has been convicted. The Court may order that the child be taken out of the custody of the person so convicted and be committed to the custody of a relation of the child, or some other fit person named by the Court, such person being left to undertake such custody until the child attains the age of 16. That refers to the governors of poorhouses?—I don't think so unless they were willing.

4885. And it only applies to cases that have been brought before the Court under this Act. It is not a general power to Parochial Boards?—Yes.

4886. In regard to your relations with the Town Council; in respect to the contribution they give you they have a representation at your Board?—Yes.

4887. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Would you make clear, Mr. Gray, the extension of power given by the Act of 1894, over the Act of 1889?—The Act of 1889 which was the original Act proceeds—'any person over 16 years of age having the custody, control, or charge of a child—a boy under the age of 14 or a girl under 16—wilfully ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes' whereas the Act of the present year proceeds—'any person over the age of 16 years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of 16 years, wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes.' An assault is mentioned under this Act as it was not in the original Act. Some of our sheriffs thought when a child was assaulted they had to resort to the ordinary Police Act.

4888. Would you make another point clear also? Would you read the definition clause of 'a place of safety'?—The expression 'place of safety' includes any place certified by the Local Authority under this Act for the purposes of this Act, and also includes any workhouse or police station, or any hospital, surgery, or place of the like kind.

Mr. R. C. Gray, Mr. John Macdonald, Miss Hepburn.
28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. R. C.
Gray,
Mr. John
Macdonald,
Miss Hepburn.

28 Nov. 1894.

4889. Kindly look at section five, sub-section four. That deals with the case of the detention of the child during inquiry?—Yes. It runs. 'Boards of Guardians, and in Scotland, Parochial Boards, shall provide for the reception of children brought to a workhouse in pursuance of this Act, and where the place of safety to which a constable takes a child is a workhouse, the master shall receive the child into the workhouse if there is suitable accommodation therein for the same, and shall detain the child until the case is determined, and any expenses incurred in respect of the child shall be deemed to be expenses incurred in the relief of the poor.'

4890. Am I right in saying that that gives you absolute power to take children during the inquiry to the Parochial Board?—Yes.

4891. The words are 'shall provide'?—Yes.

4892. Do you know any reason why any child should be taken to the police cell or prison under the Act?—No, I do not know.

4893. Please look at section 11. You have power there of dealing with habitual drunkards?—Yes.

4894. The power there is that if a parent is an inebriate 'within the meaning of the Inebriates Act, 1879 and 1888, the court in lieu of sentencing such person to imprisonment may, if it thinks fit, make an order for his detention—for any period named in the order not exceeding 12 months—in a Retreat under the said Acts'?—Yes.

4895. Have you had any experience of that?—No. We have no Retreat in Scotland as far as I know.

4896. Does it occur to you that that provision could be practicably worked?—I don't think it could.

4897. In the first place it requires you to find a Retreat willing to receive him, and that might be a matter of very considerable expense?—Yes; very considerable.

4898. Further on in the section you will see that it requires the consent of the inebriate himself to be confined?—Yes.

4899. So that you don't anticipate much from this?—No.

4900. Have you had any children in your institution who have been brought there in consequence of offences under the Criminal Law Amendment Act having been committed against them?—We have some very sad cases among them of that description.

4901. Girls, of course?—Yes.

4902. Now, what has been done in these cases?—There have been some prosecutions. We had one on which we bestowed a very great deal of care, and got the services of counsel to assist us. A conviction was not obtained for the reason that the sheriff who tried the case, founding on a precedent in the Justiciary Court, considered it was not sufficient to proceed on the evidence of two children. Lord Young laid it down in the Greenock case.

4903. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is that a recent case?—It was about a year ago.

4904. Do you know anything of the case that came up recently in which the offender was let off, the child being terrorised into denying the identity of the man—within the last two months?—No.

4905. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) These were cases where the offender escaped on account of deficiency in the evidence?—The evidence would have been sufficient had the witnesses not been of such a tender age that the judge thought it unsafe to proceed upon it, and he quoted Lord Young's case.

4906. I want to know if you have had any girls that you have been able to take out of the custody of parents who had committed such offences?—Certainly, we have had a number of cases.

4907. And they have been taken into the custody of your Shelter?—Yes. We have very great difficulty in dealing with these cases. We don't like to associate them with the other children. It requires very great judgment to know how to deal with those cases.

4908. To some extent have the unfortunate children been corrupted?—Yes; and we fear they may contaminate others.

4909. Can you suggest anything to remedy that?—Mr. R. C. Gray, There is a Home at Dean Bank where we have sent some of those girls—that is to say, girls we would have retained ourselves but for the contaminating influence.

4910. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The cases you deal with, Mr. Gray, are, I suppose, all cases of parents resident in some particular place?—Mostly. We have some cases of tramps, of parents forsaking their children—cases where children were left in low lodging-houses in the Grassmarket.

4911. So that your organisation does not reach the children of those who are travelling about in the country?—No; except in such cases as I refer to, where the police get on their track, or in the low lodging-house.

4912. I would like to get a general idea of the outcome of your dealing with cases. You have got 862 cases, and of these apparently 59 only have been got into some permanent sort of settlement, such as your Homes or Industrial Schools. How has the great bulk of 800 been dealt with?—The great portion of the balance represents the pride and success of our whole work—cases in which admonition and remonstrance have been found sufficient.

4913. If the cruelty and neglect of the children has arisen from habits of intemperance, has your admonition been found sufficient?—In many cases it has; in the grosser cases it has not.

4914. Are not many of these 800 cases where intemperance is involved. Yes; and we have them under supervision. We have them tabulated and reported on from time to time. Many have been under supervision for three or four years.

4915. You say in this year's report that 219 parents have been cautioned and kept under supervision. Do I understand that the remaining 600 were not under supervision, and that there were 400 cases where intemperance was not involved?—The cases in which intemperance was involved must be much larger.

4916. Can you easily settle in a satisfactory way those numerous cases of cruelty or neglect arising from drunkenness?—We find the greatest difficulty in settling them. Many of them are ameliorated by admonition, and in one form or another the children are relieved; but we only have recourse to prosecution when it is impossible to avoid it. Our great object is not to have successful prosecutions, but to benefit the cruelly treated children. We rather avoid prosecutions if we can.

4917. What is the cost per annum of maintaining children in your Home?—(Mr. Macdonald.) It is about £9.

4918. That is, I suppose, without capital charge?—Yes.

4919. The time to which these children may be committed is up to 16 years of age?—Yes.

4920. You have some children three weeks old?—Yes.

4921. What is the average detention of those children with whom you deal?—The very young children a short time; the others variously from a few days to months.

4922. But not to years?—In very extreme cases. I think the longest time in the Shelter is three months; in Corstorphine until the child is 16.

4923. What is the average detention, taking the Shelter and Corstorphine together?—You can't give an average, because two to three days to a couple of months describes the way we deal with the Shelter, and with the others it depends on their age.

4924. Are they all kept till they are 16 when they go to Corstorphine?—Except in exceptional cases, when suitable employment is got for them. They go to be page boys or attendants.

4925. They get employment without going back to the family?—Yes.

4926. Those you keep for some months in the Shelter, how are they got rid of?—They are probably sent to one of the Industrial Schools, or if the father or his wife who has been convicted, coming out of prison wishes to resume cohabitation, and desires to get the child back, we give it back if we think it suitable. We strive in all cases to find a suitable pretext to give the child back to its parents.

4927. You find you can do that in a great majority of cases?—We sometimes find we have been too charitable in our view and have made a mistake.

4928. Does the religious question ever crop up at Corstorphine. What are your arrangements?—The religious beliefs of the parents are regarded, and in the event of a child being a Roman Catholic the sheriff may send it to a Roman Catholic institution such as several of the sheriffs have done.

4929. Have you any Roman Catholic children at Corstorphine?—We have had one, but we did not bring it up as a Roman Catholic. All our children at Corstorphine are treated as Protestants.

4930. There is no disability attaching to a child in your benevolent eye?—Certainly not. One of the most active members of our Board is a Roman Catholic.

4931. (By the Chairman.) You mentioned, Mr. Macdonald, the average weekly earnings of a certain class of parents whose children are under your care. Is that the average of the tradesmen, or the average of the whole?—I meant that was the average earnings of the father of a certain class who had been convicted.

4932. But only a small proportion I suppose?—A considerable proportion.

4933. What proportion?—Of the 14 cases last month I should say a quarter of the total number were men earning that average wage.

4934. If you knew a man was earning that average wage, and you had an order against him of 4s. a week, would you prosecute him?—Certainly.

4935. You have not prosecuted. In the cases you have in custody what are the average earnings?—(Mr. R. C. Gray.) Not much.

4936. Not sufficient to make them worth powder and shot?—No.

4937. Can you give us the mortality of your inmates?—The Corstorphine Home has been open for four years, and I don't think there have been four deaths. Two children died in 1892, and there have been no deaths in 1893.

4938. (By Miss Stevenson.) You are at no expense for the education of the children in the Home?—No; they go to the Board School.

4939. In regard to this question of the average wage, it is the cases of cruelty, and not neglect, that are chiefly chargeable against the better-classes?—Yes.

4940. And the cases of neglect are brought against the lowest class?—The ne'er-do-well class.

4941. (By Col. M'Hardy.) From the returns of judicial statistics, it appears that in 1893, for cruel and unnatural treatment of children, the committals to prison in respect of females were far in excess of the number of males. Is that your experience?—I should think the charges against mothers predominated very much.

4942. The figures for 1893 are 94 women and 49 men?—Yes, I think that is so, the mothers being generally in charge of the children.

4943. The cruelty and neglect generally arise from the mother, and not from the father?—I should rather put it in this way—that the person whom we can get at is the mother.

4944. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it not the case that intemperance is much more frequent among women than among men?—I think that is our experience on the whole. [Witnesses then withdrew.]

Miss Burton.

MISS MARY BURTON called in and examined.

Miss Burton.

4945. (By the Chairman.) You are a member of the Edinburgh School Board?—Yes.

4946. You have been long connected with public works in Edinburgh?—About 30 or 40 years.

4947. In connection with slum people?—The first was the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor. I belonged to it some 20 or 30 years ago.

4948. Have you been connected with any reclamation work?—Yes.

4949. In connection with this association?—Only a short time. I took up one of the worst parts and did it thoroughly, but I found I could do no good unless I had the property in my own hands. After that I bought some slum property, and my experience of these people is confined to managing houses I own myself.

4950. What is your experience?—My experience is that drinking is the great deterrent to these people ever being able to have their houses in better condition. When I first took the property I was in hopes of getting them to save a little money and give up drinking. I intended at first to confine my attention to temperance, but I was told I might as well turn my place into a pigeon house.

4951. Have you rebuilt this property?—No, but repaired it. It is very nice and airy. I would not take any place unless I thought it airy and healthy.

4952. How has it turned out commercially?—I was afraid it would not be a success, but to my surprise it has.

4953. Might I ask what return it gives?—Well, if you do not count my time, I should say seven or eight per cent. I pay all my tenants' taxes. But I have never calculated very closely.

4954. That, of course, is a most important subject, but it is hardly within our remit. Have you any habitual criminals?—No. They are not bad people at all. They are very often through the hands of the police. I let them know that if they drink and keep their houses dirty, I must put them out. This is a list of those I have been obliged to put out by the sheriff officers. I have often to do that.

4955. How many tenants have you altogether?—I have 50 families, but I have had at times supervision of 50 others belonging to a niece, and that does not show the proportion of people I come across, because these people are often shifting.

4956. As the practical outcome of that knowledge and experience have you any practical suggestions to make to us?—I think if there were fewer facilities for drinking it would be better. I know people who drink that would sign a petition to get the shops closed.

4957. That is not within our inquiry?—I mean to say that is one of the reasons. I believe you wish to know if there is any good having imprisonment for short periods. I do not think it does any good at all.

4958. If one of your tenants is imprisoned do you chalk that up against him and put him out?—I can't, because I can't get hold of him.

4959. Do many leave without paying rents?—Oh yes. I can do nothing about that. I can never recover that. There is no way of recovering that, but my tenants are greatly improving in this respect.

4960. With habitual offenders for drunkenness you have had a good deal of experience. Do you find them get drunk every pay?—Pensioners usually get very drunk when pensions are paid, and very many get drunk on Saturday nights.

4961. Do neighbours about complain in the case of drink?—They often complain. I am going now to Chief Constable Henderson to see if he can tell me something about some tenants that have been quarreling—to see if they are respectable people.

4962. I suppose you have no vagrants in your community?—No; working people and some hawkers. I can go amongst them at all hours of the day and night. I have often left my purse, and shawls, and umbrella in the place, and got everything back again.

4963. How is that now?—I don't think they are thieves; they merely take. If any one is well off, they think why should not we divide the property.

4964. Why did they not divide the contents of your purse?—Because they look upon me as a poor and hard

Miss Burton. working woman. But the chief reason was that I did not go down drunk among them.

28 Nov. 1894.

4965. That would be rather a reason for not considering you such a good fellow?—Perhaps so.

4966. You wish us to understand that they are susceptible to good treatment and influence?—Very much.

4967. Do any of the prostitute class ever find their way to your houses?—I once had one; but my tenants object to this class. I think myself that if more people of a better class would mix with them in friendliness, and take an interest in them, not as philanthropists, it would improve them.

4968. Is there any legislative suggestion you wish to make?—A legislative suggestion I would make would be the shutting up of a good many public-houses. That is one way, and I hardly know any other, except by shutting up inebriates for a length of time, and getting work out of them, for many of them can work well when sober. I know a little about a place where inebriates of the richer class are confined.

4969. Where?—In a place in Aberdeenshire. I understand that they are given a little drink in that place.

Miss Burton.

28 Nov. 1894.

4970. You think they get drink?—I have been in the house; and I have a distinct remembrance of the proprietor of the house admitting that they had to give a little drink occasionally to make them stay.

4971. We have to visit such institutions, and we will get information at first hand there, so unless you can tell us definitely of any faults in connection with their management, I don't think we can take reports at second hand?—Also through a patient I heard it. They say they give them a little to make them stay.

4972. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You think no interested party should have control of these inebriates?—I don't think it unless they are strictly looked after by Government.

4973. Unless strictly looked after?—Yes, from what I have seen. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Alexander Porter.

MR. ALEXANDER PORTER, Chief Constable of Roxburgh and Berwick, called in and examined.

Mr. Alexander Porter.

4974. (By the Chairman.) You are the Chief Constable of Roxburgh and Berwick?—Yes.

4975. Col. Borthwick informed us he had an interview with you, and gave us some information he said was the joint product of that consultation?—Yes.

4976. You have a good deal to do with tramps?—Yes; a good deal in these border counties.

4977. Have you any statistics of the tramps in your counties?—Yes. We have the bi-annual census.

4978. How many were there then on the last occasion?—I think if you refer to the third page of the memorandum you will find the result of seven days' observation on four of the principal roads of the country.

4979. Yes. That shows a grand total of tramps seeking work of 96 per week on the Jedburgh and Newcastle road, 110 on the Hawick and Carlisle road, 173 on the Berwick section, and 158 on the Berwick and Dunbar. The enumerating of these men on the different roads would entail the enumerating of each individual several times?—No, I don't think there is any possibility of that, because these roads are so far apart. The Carlisle road represents the central inroad from England into Scotland from Carlisle to Hawick, then the Newcastle road to Jedburgh divides these. Then the Coldstream road divides the road from Berwick. In the first place there is a breaking off at Newcastle, and the next break off is at Berwick, and that divides them.

4980. What do you do to protect yourself against double enumeration?—It depends on the constables' observation not to enumerate a man twice. There were four constables, one on each road, and each made a separate return to me, and that is the result.

4981. You commence in your statement by expressing disapproval of the system of short sentences for petty offences that prevails, and your belief that it does not produce good effects, that it leads to a large expenditure of public money 'while the jails are crowded with a teeming mass of dirty, miserable, helpless wretches, who on regaining their liberty, deliberately set about acquiring the means which drives them on to repeat their past offences'?—That is my opinion. I fortify that opinion by a return showing that out of 368 persons convicted for (1) breaches of the peace, and (2) drunkenness, 80 per cent. of that number received sentences of under seven days in the county of Roxburgh alone. I had not time to make up a return for this year.

4982. You make use of the expression: 'This leads to a large expenditure of public money in prosecutions and escorts to jail'?—Roughly, every prisoner we convey from Roxburgh to Edinburgh costs about £1, and we convey about 300 per annum. In Berwick the cost is the same, but the number is considerably less. About 200 per annum.

4983. Is there any difference in the expenses of escort to jail in England and Scotland?—No; I don't think so.

4984. Give us the practice in Scotland?—So far as escort is concerned I look upon myself as the servant of the Prison Commissioners. The Prison Commissioners have adopted a scale of payment—that is to say they pay three farthings per mile for the constable, and full penny rate for the prisoner, and during the time a constable is employed the Prison Commissioners pay 9d. per hour—not exceeding 7s. 6d. for the 24 hours.

4985. Why do they give more for the prisoner than the constable?—Because under an Act of Parliament the constable is entitled to travel on passes when on duty at a rate not exceeding three farthings per mile.

4986. Who gets this 9d. an hour paid for the constable. Does it go to you to relieve police rates?—The constable gets 2s. per day for aliment, and the balance goes to the County Council.

4987. You are paid up to 7s. 6d. for the constable's day?—Not exceeding that. Eight hours is the time occupied in conveying a prisoner to Edinburgh, for which 6s. is paid.

4988. The Prison Commissioners pay 6s., and you give the constable 2s. aliment?—Yes.

4989. You therefore get 4s.?—The County Council does not get the full 4s., because there are other incidental expenses connected with the escort, such as telegrams sometimes; fares we don't recover. The County Council don't reap the full benefit, they don't receive the full 4s.

4990. I suppose they get something?—I can't get the exact figure, but the County of Roxburgh benefits to the extent of £50 a year.

4991. Only £50?—That is so.

4992. How many prisoners do you send to Edinburgh altogether?—I did not know that question would be asked, but before we adopted the short sentence system—that is to say we can now under the warrant of the Secretary for Scotland retain prisoners at Jedburgh for 14 days, and that has reduced the number of escorts very considerably, and been a very convenient arrangement for all concerned. Before that, we on an average sent 365 prisoners to Edinburgh each year. We looked upon it as a prisoner a day. The number is now reduced by about a tenth part.

4993. By a tenth or to a tenth?—By a tenth.

4994. Only by 36 prisoners?—I can give you the returns, but I would rather be accurate, and I am not speaking from books.

4995. Surely more than 36 or 37?—I say they are reduced by about a tenth. We send close upon 300 prisoners to Edinburgh.

4996. Can you say accurately to what extent the County Council gets a profit out of this?—I could tell you to a farthing, but not now.

4997. I would be obliged if you would send it in?—Yes.

Alexander
Porter.
Nov. 1894.

4998. Then about the money expended in prosecution you speak of. Have you any details of that?—I cannot give you any details. I am not Procurator Fiscal. The expense of witnesses and cost of salaries is very considerable.

4999. You make a suggestion here as a remedy for the drunken habitual offenders?—I say this—To find a remedy for this class of habitual offender is, I admit, very difficult. Two courses are open (1) a united application of the summary powers of magistrates in imposing full penalties on all habitual offenders. These powers have never yet been put in force except in a prefatory fashion, and the jurisdiction of magistrates who pronounce short sentences is deliberately chosen for outbursts of debauchery. (2) Reformation of this class is worthy of a trial.

5000. Let us stick to the first in the first place. Do you find great diversity in the sentences pronounced by different magistrates in the county for the same offences?—Yes. There is considerable diversity between sentences on that class of offenders in Berwickshire and Roxburghshire, but I would rather not criticise the sentences of magistrates. Over 80 per cent. of this class of offenders I am referring to have received sentences under seven days' imprisonment.

5001. You are assuming that longer sentences would have been better for them?—I am assuming the deterring force of the law has not been exercised to the extent that might have been expected. In the second place, I look upon it in this light, that these short sentences are just like putting that class of offender into an Hospital or Convalescent Home. It gives them time to recuperate their wasted energies.

5002. That is only in the case of drunk?—I am dealing with habitual offenders. Vagrants are included.

5003. How many cells have you in Jedburgh?—Six cells.

5004. Do you make any discrimination in the use of them? Do you appropriate certain of them to prisoners sentenced to less than 14 days, or do you reserve for special cases?—No, we make no discrimination. Sometimes we have to detain a prisoner for a few days until it is convenient to escort him to Edinburgh.

5005. As Chief Constable what is your opinion as to the effect of imprisonment on a decent man. For instance you have had a decent man or woman who has been sent to prison, it may be for being drunk, or when drunk assaulting some one. Do you find when they come back that they are improved, or that they are likely to go to the bad?—It is a very large question; it depends very much upon the man's temperament and upon the man's habits of life. If he has been degenerating for some time I should say he will be benefited by a little confinement. On the other hand, if it were due to an outburst of passion without any incidental debauchery, I should say he would be very much injured by being put into prison.

5006. Therefore it is pretty much a toss-up how it influences them. My object in asking that question was to come to the point whether you thought these cells could not be differentiated a little from the prison, so as not to give these people the stigma of passing through Edinburgh prison?—I have considered that question, and I think it is a very serious matter indeed to send a respectable working man—a first offender—to be associated with all the scum of blackguardism in the country.

5007. Of course he is not practically associated?—He has his own cell, but at the same time the association is there.

5008. What I want to know is—can something not be done to utilise these cells for the punishment of such cases, so that there would be less stigma attached to them than there would be by incarceration in the Cattoon Jail?—That would require a different class of cells, and an enlargement of the cell accommodation. These cells I am speaking of are used indiscriminately for lock-up cells likewise. We have no means of differentiating.

5009. Who pays the cost of convicted prisoners detailed in the cells?—The Prison Commissioners allow one shilling per day.

5010. Does that cover it?—Oh yes. It covers the cost of actual maintenance. It does not cover the interest on buildings. To meet the special requirements of the Commissioners the County Council spent £350, and are paying interest on the money.

5011. You make a suggestion here that the habitual drunkard should be isolated, and that his release should be conditional on good behaviour. You confine your attention to the drunkard of the quasi criminal class. How would you define them?—I have not condescended on a distinction; because different minds might have different opinions, whether six, or eight, or ten convictions for drunkenness would constitute a man an habitual drunkard.

5012. Would you have the ten in one year?—To get a certain number of convictions in one year is very difficult, but I should say over a period of three years.

5013. Would you think that ten times over three years would be a fair test?—I think it would be a fair test to form an opinion on.

5014. What proceeding would you take. Would you propose that a magistrate would have power to deal with a man who had been ten times convicted in three years of drunkenness, or of offences of which drunkenness formed part?—That is so. He would come up in the usual way, and the convictions would be proved against him.

5015. Who are the magistrates with whom you have to deal—sheriffs or justices of the peace?—We deal with both.

5016. Bailies?—Yes. In these small burghs, however, it is a question whether you would submit the liberty of the subject to an untrained magistrate.

5017. I suppose you would restrict the jurisdiction to the sheriff?—Yes, that is my opinion.

5018. Would you allow the police in such cases to bring up the offender before the sheriff?—It would come up in the usual way through the public prosecutor, and the police would produce evidence.

5019. You would require some institution in the first place?—Yes; you must.

5020. You speak of institutions that are maintained voluntarily?—I think it is a matter for the rates. The Government have taken the full charge of prosecutions, and of the detention and punishment of prisoners, and this would not be an extension of their duties, only a diversion.

5021. You think Government should bear the expense, and that it would be recouped in other ways?—Clearly, and society would be benefited incalculably. I wish to point out a difficulty, if you will excuse me. If you look at the first statistical table, there you will see, No. 3 of the list, Thomas Stewart. He is only 28 years of age, and he has been four times convicted in 1889, three times in 1890, and five times, and five times, and five times, in each of the succeeding years. He has been sentenced to over two years' imprisonment. Now, that man I hold to be insane.

5022. Of course we have very much more chronic cases than that. We don't think anything of a case under a 100?—I consider that man a typical example of what an habitual offender is.

5023. Now we come to the vagrants. Are your counties exceptionally situated in regard to vagrants?—I don't think so. They are very rich counties, and can bear a burden in the shape of a number of vagrants; but I don't think they have an unusually large share. We are inundated with tramps more than the real vagrant. I think that you will find from Captain Munro's annual return that we have our share.

5024. Do you get many complaints about vagrants?—Yes.

5025. From farmers?—From all classes of people.

5026. Have vagrants ever committed theft?—No. They are not a thieving class. They are too much under the eye of the police; but they are a great nuisance going about begging.

5027. Masterful begging?—Yes.

Mr. Alexander
Porter.
28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander
Porter.

28 Nov. 1894.

5028. Do you bring them before the magistrates?—We do. We bring a considerable number before the magistrates under what is known as the Prevention of Crimes Act—an Act incorporating the vagrancy section of the English Act. I know it is not done all over Scotland, but in Ayrshire, Dumfries, and Roxburghshire we do it. Last year we had some 17 convictions.

5029. What provision do you refer to?—I may say the section of the Act is only applied to what we call masterful begging, where women and children are frightened. This Act was made applicable to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act 1871, and there was some doubt whether or not the whole of the section applied to Scotland. There was a test case from Ayrshire on the 24th December 1882, and the Court of Justiciary held the whole section was included.

5030. What was the section?—The section we go upon runs 'every person going about as a gatherer or collector of alms, or endeavouring to procure charitable contributions of any nature or kind under any false or fraudulent pretence.'

5031. What is the penalty?—I am speaking from memory. I think you can go up to 60 days.

5032. You say you have availed yourselves of that?—We have been doing so, and ever since this decision was obtained in 1882 we have taken full advantage of that Act of Parliament in putting down masterful begging.

5033. It does not require 'masterful' begging?—You are quite right, but it is difficult—

5034. That is my point. Yesterday, Colonel Borthwick told us that the County Council of one of his counties had, under certain provisions of the Local Government Act, drawn up bye-laws prohibiting vagrancy, and that these bye-laws had been pronounced ultra vires on certain grounds—it strikes me not connected with their merits—by the Court of Session. Now, according to you, you have the powers, and full powers, of dealing with vagrancy under that Act, but they don't appear to know of that in the other counties?—Some of the procurator fiscals hold that this provision does not apply to Scotland, notwithstanding the Court of Session.

5035. Have any of your cases been decided before the Court of Session?—No; but the Ayrshire case was.

5036. Who deals with your cases?—Sheriffs.

5037. Do all the sheriffs hold this to apply?—It has been held to apply in Roxburghshire, and it is in force in Dumfries and Ayrshire.

5038. How many sheriff-substitutes have you in the two counties?—There is one in each. There are two or more in Ayrshire. I think there is one at Kilmarnock and one at Ayr. There is one at Dumfries and one at Roxburgh.

5039. Do you ever bring these cases before the justices?—Not under that Act. In burghs we have the Burgh Police Act.

5040. In the counties do you ever bring them before the justices?—No.

5041. What sort of sentences do you get?—As high as 21 days. On one occasion we had 30 days.

5042. On one point we are clear—that in your counties, and one or two others, you have ample powers under the existing law of punishing vagrancy?—Yes. I am satisfied of that.

5043. In burghs you have the Burgh Police Act. Have you any occasion to use its provisions?—Yes.

5044. Are they more effective than this? Would you prefer the powers in it instead of this?—I would prefer the sheriffs' decision.

5045. You prefer what you have?—Yes. In burghs I am obliged to bring it before the magistrate.

5046. One Chief Constable said to us it would be a great benefit to have the Burgh Police Act extended to them for dealing with vagrancy and drunkenness?—I am perfectly satisfied that but for prejudice they have ample power to deal with vagrants.

5047. What powers have you in the counties to deal with drunkenness?—We must bring offenders up under the Public Houses Amendment Act 1862, and we can impose a fine of 5s. or 24 hours.

5048. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) That is the Forbes Mackenzie Act?—No. The amendment to the Forbes Mackenzie Act.

5049. (By the Chairman.) Is that the only way in which you can deal with them?—Yes. That is for the technical offence of drunk and incapable.

5050. If a man is found in a ditch, you bring him up under the Public Houses Act, and the penalty is what you said. There is no accumulation of penalty?—No.

5051. Do you think it would be desirable to have the power in subsequent cases of increasing the penalty?—Most decidedly.

5052. You would like to have the provisions of the Burgh Police Act with respect to drunkenness extended to counties?—Yes.

5053. Then we will take drunkenness and breach of the peace—disorderly conduct it is called. Have you ample powers in regard to it?—The penalty is 40s. or 14 days' imprisonment on every person who behaves in a riotous, violent, or indecent manner.

5054. How do you deal with that offence in counties?—It takes a different form in counties. It takes the form of breach of the peace.

5055. Have you ample power of dealing with it?—Yes.

5056. Do you think it would be any better to extend the burgh powers?—No. The county powers are quite as wide, because what goes to constitute a technical offence of riotous and indecent conduct, constitutes a breach of the peace in the country, parish, or any other place.

5057. In the paragraph headed 'Vagrancy,' you say that since the commencement of the present reign, 14 Acts have been passed with the object of ameliorating the condition of the poor and suppressing vagrancy. Do many apply to Scotland?—Yes. A good many. You have the Trespass Act of 1865, a most beneficial Act, which put an end to the gipsy reign in the south of Scotland, and all forms of lodging in barns and stack-yards.

5058. That is to say it enables you to deal with them?—Yes.

5059. Don't these offences still exist to a considerable extent?—Not to one hundredth part the extent they did before.

5060. What is the penalty for sleeping out in a barn or stack-yard?—20s. or 14 days.

5061. You say it put an end to the gipsy reign in the south of Scotland; would that include Roxburgh and Jedburgh?

5062. Roxburgh was the head-centre of the gipsies—at Yetholm.

5063. Have you any trouble now?—None whatever.

5064. They have their head-centres now?—Yes; but they are all broken up.

5065. How many gipsies do you know now?—I don't think there are over a dozen families. They have not elected a queen since the last one died. She was the rallying point and head-centre, and we had occasionally carnivals and out-bursts, but all that sort of thing is done away with. The gipsies are really broken up and adapting themselves to agricultural and other pursuits.

5066. You have no complaint to make about them now?—None whatever. They are a very excellent class of people.

5067. Do they camp out?—No: they are not allowed to camp out.

5068. How?—Because of the Act of 1865—the Trespass Act.

5069. We were told regarding the gipsies in Perthshire that they camped out, and that the consequence of their camping out and of their migratory habits was very pernicious. How do you deal with them under the Trespass Act if they put a tent on the roadside?—We apprehend them for a contravention of the Trespass Act. In the first place it is an offence under the Turnpike Act to camp on the road, but there are a great many roads not turnpike roads, and to them the general Act does not apply. But to these roads the Act I have been referring to—the Act of 1865 does

Mr. Alexander
Porter.

28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander apply. By section 3 every person who lodges in premises being private property without consent of the owner or legal occupier, and every person who encamps or lights a fire on or near any private road or enclosed or cultivated land, or in or near any plantation without consent of the owner, is guilty of an offence punishable under the Act, and power is given to the constable to apprehend the offender and detain him in prison or lock-up.

28 Nov. 1894.

5070. It was contended with regard to the Perth gipsies that they camped with the consent of the owner or occupier?—If they have the consent it is different.

5071. Owners and occupiers in Rosburgh don't give their consent?—No. They have to protect themselves, and this is all the more necessary seeing that insurance companies have doubled their rate on agricultural stock.

5072. Why? Have there been incendiarism?—There have been a great many fires.

5073. When?—Last year there were a great many fires at farm places. There is no proof of it, but it is popularly and generally attributed to tramps going about and smoking in stack-yards.

5074. Has there been any increase in the number of tramps?—Yes. There has been an increase in the number of tramps for several years. If you look at table No. 3 you will see that I show there has been an increase from the census of these shelter houses.

5075. We will take it there has been an increase, and a co-incidental increase in the number of fires in the country?—They are popularly attributed to carelessness on the part of tramps.

5076. Have you had any complaints from farmers in any case that the fires had been maliciously raised?—I have had requests from farmers to examine their premises to see there were no tramps lying about.

5077. Have any complaints been made by farmers as to their suspecting a malicious origin for the fires?—The request to me inferred they did so.

5078. No specific instances have been given to you where a farmer said 'I have been asked for alms and assistance by tramps, have refused, and next night my place was burned'?—No specific instance. It generally happens that the farmers write to me and say 'we are bothered by tramps, and we are frightened for fire.'

5079. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Is that not being frightened for accidental fires?—I think these fires are accidental. The tramp takes shelter in the stack-yard or out-houses, and he sets about lighting his pipe, and the fire occurs accidentally. I don't think there are many cases of wilful fire-raising or incendiarism.

5080. (By the Chairman.) You tell us that the gipsies at all events are quite a decent set of your community?—Yes. And as a race in the south of Scotland, all but extinct.

5081. You say that 'since 1862 no less than 11 county systems have been started in England and Scotland for controlling and relieving tramps and vagrants by organised systems of relief, and which have been vigorously carried on with varying measures of success, but without in any degree reducing the number of vagrants.' What county systems have been started in Scotland?—There is the Cumberland one, which is a notable one.

5082. Take Scotland?—There are only two in Scotland—in Ayrshire and Stirlingshire.

5083. Can you give us any information about them?—No, I can't, it could be had from the Chief Constables of the counties. I have taken care to inform myself as to the English system established a long time ago.

5084. You are aware there is in England a system of parochial relief, applicable to all persons, and casual wards which do not exist in Scotland. Does not that involve a totally different system from anything applicable to Scotland?—It involves a very different system, but it has no beneficial results so far as vagrancy is concerned.

5085. Then there is no reason why we should extend it to Scotland?—No.

5086. Your opinion is that 'so long as the vagrant is tolerated and acknowledged he will continue to flourish despite any temporary check he may experience'?—That is so.

Mr. Alexander apply.

28 Nov. 1894.

5087. You say a large number of the vagrant class are habitual offenders. Can you give us any idea of the cost of maintaining a tramp. We got an estimate yesterday that each tramp would require a contribution of at least 1s. a day to keep him. Is that sufficient?—I think that is an over estimate. At the rate of 6d. per day, a very low estimate indeed, it would cost close upon £14,000 to maintain them according to the last census of vagrants in Scotland. The numbers of the last census are 8,298, which at 6d. per day makes £13,438.

5088. We had an estimate yesterday from Col. Borwick that in his county it would not cost less than £10,000?—There have been various estimates, but in England they reckon on £0,000, and some people place the cost at 1s. 6d., others at 1s. per day. I say it lies between 6d. and 1s.

5089. You propose to deal with the vagrants in the first place, by laying hold of the children under 14, and educating them?—Yes.

5090. And your suggestion is in the following terms. 'In dealing with vagrants, I suggest that the State should provide and maintain an Educational and Industrial School, and that all vagrant children under 14 years of age should be committed thereto by a magistrate, unless it could be shown that the parents were able and willing to maintain and educate them without resorting to begging.' Can that not be done under the existing law?—I think not; you must have special legislation.

5091. It would require special legislation?—Yes. Because in these voluntary Industrial Schools the accommodation is limited, and you must compel them to accept them. A great many difficulties in the way of religion and contributions would creep in. I say this, that the State in dealing with these vagrants should deal with them in the same way and in the same spirit as with the habitual criminal; because you have a large number of habitual criminals in the offspring of these vagrants. You are better to lay hold of them, place them in an Industrial School, and train them. The children are bright, sprightly, and clever, and would make very apt scholars.

5092. You have typical cases of vagrants; please read them?—Here are two typical vagrant families. (1st) W— P—, 47, umbrella mender, and his wife E— B—, 44, have travelled the northern counties for 30 years. They have had 13 children, seven of whom are alive. I leave you to judge as you choose as to the death of the other six, aged 19, 16, 9, 7, 4, and 2 years respectively, while the baby is eight months old. None of these children have received any education. That is the class of children that should go to the Industrial School. (2nd) J— M—, 49, basket maker, and E— M—, his wife, have had seven children, only three of whom are alive, aged 5, 14, and 6 years respectively. The number of such families could be largely extended.

5093. Where do these fellows lodge. Umbrella making is a trade that invites to tramping. Does he lodge in houses or contravene the law?—These people naturally keep a good deal to the hill district about the Lammermuirs and Cheviots and outlying districts away from town, and people there are kindly and allow them to lie down. You don't find these people often in common lodging-houses.

5094. Have they ever been before the magistrates at all?—W— P— and his wife have been much addicted to drink, but they have never been convicted in Berwickshire. They are not known in Roxburghshire.

5095. Then these are not habitual offenders?—They are vagrants.

5096. They are not vagrants you can deal with, or if you can deal with them, you have not?—The women beg, and these children are neither clothed, fed, nor educated.

Mr. Alexander
Porter.

28 Nov. 1894.

5097. We will confine ourselves to the begging. You could have convicted the woman of begging if you had a case?—We could, but it would be difficult to find a magistrate who would send to prison a woman who had so many children clinging to her apron strings. The man sits at the dyke side and hammers away at his umbrellas, while the woman and children beg.

5098. Has the woman ever been brought before anyone on a charge of begging?—No.

5099. The other fellow G—H—?—Both he and his wife have been convicted of breaches of the peace.

5100. There is nothing in their case for vagrancy and begging?—They are vagrants.

5101. The commercial traveller is a vagrant if you come to that, but you have no case on record of convictions?—That is simply because the Act of Parliament I am referring to has not been put into force in Berwickshire, but I have arranged it shall be put into force now. I was only appointed Chief Constable in January of this year.

5102. You have a suggestion here about dealing with tramps. You think the honest tramp bent on search of work may be dealt with by a system of passes?—Yes. The vagrant disposed of according to my suggestion—that is all the children committed to an Industrial School—the honest tramp bent on search of work may easily be dealt with by a system of passes. Assuming a daily labourer loses his job, or from whatever cause finds it difficult to obtain employment, he could without much trouble, if without the means of transporting himself from one district to another, obtain a certificate or 'pass' from the chief of police of the district in which he was last employed. On presenting this certificate or 'pass' at each succeeding stage of his journey, he should, if without means of sustenance, be provided with food and shelter at the public expense. On finding employment the certificate or 'pass' should be given up to the chief of police of the district, and if necessary renewed when employment ceased and he found himself again obliged to take the road. Without this 'pass,' the tramp to be treated and dealt with as an ordinary vagrant. Were such a system firmly established the deserving workman would speedily adapt himself to the requirements of the system, and all the more readily if each police station were constituted a sort of labour bureau. To this end it would only be necessary that the constable at each station should have information of the labour requirements of each particular district, and which he already possesses through the 'Police Guide' compiled by the 'Chief Constable' (Scotland) Club. This information given in the 'Guide' could be easily supplemented by information as to new or temporary public works in course of construction.

5103. You suggest passing on these men from police station to police station—at whose expense?—Every parish or County Council would provide a Shelter.

5104. Do you give them food as well?—When a man came off his day's tramp and took refuge in the Shelter he should be provided with so much meal and salt. I would not deal very luxuriously with them.

5105. Why do you propose the Shelters being at the police office?—I would have them at certain distances along the main road. From Berwick to Cockburnspath is a very fair day's tramp, and then from Cockburnspath to Musselburgh.

5106. You don't propose any labour test?—No; that is no good.

5107. How would you discriminate your honest men?—By the police pass.

5108. But before he starts out?—When a man loses his job he applies to the police of the district in which he was last employed.

5109. Tell us about the analogous institutions you have referred to?—Some years ago the Board of Supervision came down upon Parochial Boards. Some two or three instances of starvation had occurred, people lying out being found dead in the morning, and the consequence was that every Parochial Board was called upon to provide a Shelter—a place for the reception of tramps. I know that was the case in Kelso, Jedburgh, Selkirk, Hawick, and Galashiels. The Parochial Boards, the police, and others interested, found so much difficulty in dealing with the number of tramps then on the road that Shelter Houses were established on a pretty extensive scale. That is to say a good deal of space was provided, and these Shelters were fitted with wooden benches on which the tramps could lie down and huddle together for the night. The only covering they got was a rug. They got hot water, so many ounces of meal night and morning, and were passed on. That was done in Kelso, Jedburgh, Galashiels, Selkirk, and Hawick.

5110. Are these Shelters still kept up?—They are still kept up, but in the beginning of this year in consequence of the great increase, the Parochial Board asked me to reduce the issue of the tickets.

5111. What tickets?—The tickets of admission to the Shelter House. We kept a record, and took down the man's name and description, and sometimes we even searched him to see if he had any money.

5112. You have no powers to do so?—The British police are often obliged to take powers. We don't want to be imposed upon. If we are in any doubt we search them. The system went on with the result you see in the table. This year I received instructions to confine the issue of tickets to females and infirm persons.

5113. The result you speak of is that in Jedburgh and Kelso alone the numbers increased from 2,095 in 1890, to 5,290 in 1894. Could you give us the details of the other three stations?—I am afraid I could not. The police in Selkirk, Hawick, and Galashiels are not under me. These figures are for the year ending 15th May.

5114. There is a tremendous disproportion between the males and females?—There always is. These are not vagrants, these are the real tramps.

5115. But you have returned them as tramps and vagrants?—There may be a few perhaps. I think that is a mistake in writing it out. Vagrants do not seek shelter as a rule, you may get one now and again when he breaks down. The vagrant is a far more shifty fellow, and can look out for himself.

5116. You think these were the decent tramps?—Decent and indecent.

5117. Men in search of work?—Yes.

5118. You surely could not have had such an increase of men—from 776 to 2,421 in a town like Kelso?—Yes. These numbers are correct.

5119. Have you had any complaints that these Shelter Houses attracted tramps and vagrants?—The increase shows that they do so.

5120. And the result of your experience is to convince the Parochial Boards it is a mistake?—Yes.

5121. Have the County Council anything to do with it?—No, it is purely parochial.

5122. When you turn out the inmates of these Shelter Houses in the morning do you give them anything?—So many ounces of meal, boiling water, and salt.

5123. But anything with them?—Nothing.

5124. What is your own opinion as to Shelter Houses?—I think they are a mistake.

5125. Do you know of any other counties where they exist? In Berwickshire have you any?—Yes, we have them, but not used in the same way as these. In Berwickshire, Parochial Boards, on the instruction of the Board of Supervision, provided a sort of reception house where a broken down tramp or vagrant could have a night's shelter to save his life. These Shelter Houses I refer to as existing in Berwickshire and Roxburghshire are not intended for the able-bodied. They are intended to be used for physically broken down people.

5126. In all the Parochial Boards from which we have had evidence we have been told that no person could be admitted as not able-bodied until he is pronounced as not able-bodied by the officer of the parish. Is that protection not adopted in Berwickshire. Yes, it is.

5127. What was the cost of maintenance of these 5,290

Mr. Alexander
Porter.

28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Porter. tramps and vagrants?—It would not exceed 2d. a head. Salt and meal are cheap, and water is plentiful.

28 Nov. 1894. 5128. Where the men and women can be in separate Shelters?—In separate rooms.

5129. And there would be a female inspector or superintendent?—Yes.

5130. You have come to the conclusion they were a very great mistake and only tended to multiply tramps and vagrants?—They discovered that these fellows went the round. It was a day's march from Jedburgh to Kelso, and from Kelso to Galashiels, and then back they went the opposite way. It was a common thing for them to go from Kelso to Galashiels, Galashiels to Selkirk, Selkirk to Hawick, and into Dumfries.

5131. Are there Shelters in Dumfries?—I believe there are.

5132. You were going to tell us about Shelters in Berwickshire?—They are conducted strictly under the Poor Law. They are hospitals where tramps who break down on the road are sent.

5133. (By Dr. Farquharson.) The law of trespass does not apply to common land?—To fields; to every piece of private property.

5134. But not to common land?—To open or unclosed land it would not apply.

5135. Is it put in motion only on complaint being made, or is it a matter of routine for the police to move on the tramp?—It is a matter of routine and duty.

5136. Supposing the proprietor of the ground does not mind, or that the tramp has received permission?—The police inquire, and if the man has no permission he is dealt with.

5137. You say there are a good many complaints in rural districts about the number of tramps?—Yes.

5138. Do you think the complaints are increasing?—I think the number of tramps is increasing. I am speaking of tramps as working men in search of work, not the vagrant. The number of tramps depend on the state of the labour market, and a good deal upon where labour is to be found. Newcastle people have been constructing very extensive water-works just over the border, and the roads to Jedburgh and our southern counties are covered with tramps going back and forward to these works.

5139. Are they getting more audacious in their demands than they used to be?—Yes. As an instance of that, there was a case recently in the little village of St. Boswells, where there was something like a procession of great able-bodied fellows, who by their overbearing and masterful manner frightened the people out of their wits, one of their number standing sentry on the public road, while the others took possession of every house in the place. Fortunately the policeman came on the scene, and they were ultimately all apprehended.

5140. Are there any of the beggars going about whose visits used to be appreciated by the people, as representatives of genuine rural life?—No; they have disappeared.

5141. Under your proposal of giving passes to these people, do you think the honest working man would object to being under police supervision in that way?—No. I think not.

5142. Do you think there would be any difficulty in finding who were the men in want of work, and who were only pretending?—There is not the least doubt that the system would be subject to a certain amount of imposition, but I think notwithstanding the imposition, the system is worthy of a trial on behalf of the really deserving working men.

5143. Supposing a beggar said he was looking for work, would he have to bring a character from his last place?—If the man was employed in the district he would be known to the Chief Constable or somebody. The police, if they are doing their duty, should know every man who comes into their beat, and see who he is and what he is doing.

5144. Supposing he said he was one of the unemployed, would you pass him on with food and shelter?—No. He would have to prove something.

5145. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I suppose you will allow that in the country there is a feeling of greater degradation about being confined in Her Majesty's Prison, than in the local cells?—Certainly. In fact dispensing with the escort and the railway journey takes away some of the sting.

5146. What sort of treatment do you propose for these habitual drunkards in the institutions you speak of?—That is a matter of detail. It should be entrusted to the supervision and discipline of the Prison Commissioners. It would be for the Prison Commissioners to discover what kind of labour was best suited for them, and classify them so that their labour should be made as productive as possible. In the second place, it should be as unlike a prison as possible. A certain class might be grouped and allowed communication with each other.

5147. In order to arrive at purely reformatory effects I suppose an amount of personal intercourse would be necessary?—I think so.

5148. You would have to individualise each person as far as you possibly could?—Clearly.

5149. And treat them in that individual way?—Yes, and as a rational being at the same time.

5150. In the way of treating each individual case, do you think the most easily got at administration would be local?—I have been always thinking of a central establishment somewhere in the centre of Scotland. I admit my proposal is an experiment.

5151. Would it be wise to make an experiment with a gigantic central establishment. Would it not be wiser to have smaller establishments in different localities?—I think centralisation in a case like that is better for the administration; discipline and control are better.

5152. You would have it wholly in the hands of the Government officials. You would not think it possible to utilise the wards of the poorhouses for such a purpose?—No. I don't think that local administration is adapted to the system of reformation I had in view. I think it should be tried on a pretty large scale, and that the people confined in it should have a certain amount of liberty. They should be kindly treated—not like machines as prisoners generally are. I think the prison authorities, having taken charge of the whole prison administration of Scotland, and that this is merely a divergence from that system, they are the proper persons to take charge of it.

5153. In regard to the tramps in your counties, they divide themselves into a variety of classes—I mean, having regard to the marches which they make?—Yes, they do.

5154. Some of them are local vagrants, are they not?—Yes; they are pretty well mixed—both Scotch and English. I don't think the Englishmen go beyond the Forth. If they are disappointed in finding work there they return. If they go by the east they come back by the west.

5155. I am talking now of the professional vagrant. They move about in different ways?—Yes. They generally move in circuit. There is a pretty large number of them that confine themselves to the border counties. There is another class that take Wigtonshire, Ayrshire, and Dumfriesshire, and there is another class that extends to a wider area. I have met them in the north of Scotland frequently.

5156. Coming from Roxburgh?—Yes. The same men I had seen in Roxburgh. We find some coming round to us again in three months, some in six months, and some in a year. Some cling to the coast-line, and follow the herring right up to the north of Scotland, and then gravitate back in the haddock season. Others again, keep to the mainland, and another class to the hills.

5157. Why do they do that?—There are things in the way of broken wool they pick up on the hills, and the shepherds are a class of people they understand.

5158. Some of these men are, of course, well-known to you personally; others, who move in a larger circle, would probably not be so well known?—That is so.

5159. How much of this migratory population is known and how much unknown?—I can hardly conde-

Mr. Alexander Porter.
28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Porter. search upon that; but I think we in these border counties could put our fingers on, and name perhaps, a couple of hundred easily.

28 Nov. 1894.

5160. That is 200 out of 346?—Yes.

5161. I should like to know something more about the Shelter Houses that apparently have been pretty extensively tried in the south-east of Scotland. How many Shelter Houses are there in Berwick?—There are two classes of them.

5162. Yes; but of all kinds. There are seven in Berwick. In almost every village in Roxburghshire they have a room or house under the control of the Parochial Board; but of Shelter Houses I have referred to there are only three.

5163. Who looks after these houses in the two counties—in Berwick, say?—The Inspector of Poor in the parish in which they are situated.

5164. Has he a staff?—No, nothing but himself.

5165. Is it a small empty house?—Not exactly an empty house. There will be a bed, and a chair, and a fire in it.

5166. Who lighted the fire?—The inspector would employ some charwoman.

5167. There would be a charwoman in charge of it?—Yes.

5168. In Roxburgh how are these places looked after?—Generally an old man and his wife, or a widow—some sort of person of that kind gets a free house, and occupies one end, with the other for the Shelter.

5169. When these houses were in full working, they increased the number of those who came to them very largely?—Yes. But the whole of the Shelter Houses in Roxburgh were not in full play for the reception of tramps—only these I have given you in Kelso and Jedburgh. The other Shelter Houses I have been speaking of were carried out in strict accordance with the poor law regulation that only persons physically unable or sick were received.

5170. You think there has been a sufficient check maintained by the Parochial Authorities?—Yes.

5171. With whom did the authority for admission rest in these villages?—With the Inspector of Poor.

5172. Would there be an Inspector of Poor at all these places?—In every parish.

5173. At all these villages?—Yes.

5174. Did I understand you to say you would be in favour of having some sort of Shelter House for the reception of men in search of work?—Yes.

5175. You said you would propose only two between Berwick and Edinburgh?—Yes. I think two would be enough.

5176. If they were all men you could fix the distance of a day's march?—Thirty miles.

5177. But would a woman march 30 miles?—Unless burdened with children they could take the road as well as men.

5178. Do you think a townsman in search of work would march 30 miles?—He might be pretty much done up at the end of the first day or two, but at the end of a week he would march 30 miles without the slightest difficulty.

5179. How far will a woman walk with her baby on the hard road?—I will support a good strong healthy woman to beat the man.

5180. Did the increase that occurred between 1890 and 1894 take place among those you knew or those you did not know?—Several things contributed to it—the English coal strike, and the new water-works I spoke of.

5181. They were principally strangers?—Yes. They said they belonged to England.

5182. They belonged to the class of people looking for work?—Yes.

5183. You have not had an increase in professional vagrancy by these rest-houses?—No. There is an increase, but I think it is rather due to the experience of the police, who are now taking the census more accurately.

5184. You do not know where these 3,000 of increase in the men and women came from who were sheltered in Jedburgh and Kelso?—They belonged to the labouring class. There was a good sprinkling of tradesmen among them.

5185. Do you think the bulk of them were artisans?—Labourers principally.

5186. You have told us what you would do with the children of vagrants. What would you do with the existing population of vagrants?—Allow them to die out. It is of no use trying reformation upon them.

5187. Are they not pretty costly to maintain?—There is not the least doubt about that, I put them down at £14,000.

5188. Your part of that in Roxburgh would be about £4,000 or £5,000 a year?—Yes, I think so.

5189. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Have you made an estimate of the number of vagrant children under 14 years of age it would be necessary to provide for?—1082. Take it roughly at 1,000.

5190. What was done to the masterful beggars apprehended at St Boswells?—They were sentenced to ten days' imprisonment each.

5191. For what offence?—Under the Prevention of Crimes Act.

5192. Could you not have prosecuted at common law a person who gets alive by means of threats?—They did not actually use threats. It was their masterful bearing that frightened the people.

5193. You don't consider that brought them within common law?—No. The procurator fiscal brought them under that statute and I think he was right.

5194. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is the basket maker you instanced a man who went about with a basket caravan?—No.

5195. Do you find a great many vagrants engaged in basket making?—Very few now. At one time basket making was rather a profitable business in the country, but the introduction of foreign-made baskets spoiled it. The country people can buy them now cheaper than repair the old.

5196. Are the baskets in the caravans of foreign manufacture?—Most of them.

5197. Are the people in charge of the caravans, Scotch, English, or foreigners?—Mostly English.

5198. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You define an habitual drunkard as a person convicted ten times in three years?—Yes. I would not like to call a man an habitual drunkard unless there were that number of convictions.

5199. Would it be possible with such a hard and fast definition like that to catch a respectable working man or casual backslider?—I don't think there is any danger in that at all. You see we are dealing with a particular class—the houseless and homeless class.

5200. But there are thousands of people who have houses and homes, earning good wages, who occasionally get drunk?—You could qualify it.

5201. It requires a qualification?—I think so. At the same time there are householders whom I think ought to be classed among habituels.

5202. In reforming those people you suggest they might be sent to a prison under the control of the prison commissioners?—I would not have it a prison at all. My idea is they should be put up in rooms rather than cells, with a certain amount of freedom, for if they ran away the police would easily pick them up.

5203. Do you think that public opinion would support you in associating a Reformatory with the taint of the prison?—I do not know any other body that could control them except the prison commissioners.

5204. You said you did not approve of the Local Authorities having control?—No.

5205. Have not Local Authorities now a considerable say in regard to prison matters?—Yes. I think these local representatives as inspecting visitors are doing good work.

5206. The Local Authority might have some interest in this institution?—I think I would give them the right of inspection.

5207. Is there any reason why one or two of the poorhouses—the accommodation in which in your own

28 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Porter. district is largely unoccupied—should not be set apart for dealing with these cases?—No reason except that I don't see where the administration is to come from.

28 Nov. 1894.

5208. I am only speaking as to the institution. Do you know of any good reason why they should not be used in this way?—Except that they would be better adapted for district hospitals for which they are very much required.

5209. Have any of these poorhouses arable and cultivated ground in the vicinity?—I don't know of one—except it is a market garden.

5210. That might be utilised as a means of employing the inmates?—Any ordinary inmate would do the whole work required in three months.

5211. You said the tramp was not the picturesque object in Scottish rural life he used to be?—Certainly not.

5212. Your own sub-division indicated there was a certain proportion who associated with shepherds and were on the whole appreciated?—They are tolerated; they are not welcomed.

5213. I suppose you admit that some form of relief has to be adopted in dealing with penniless, half-starved tramps, passing from England to Scotland, and vice versa?—There must be something.

5214. How would you work the 'pass' arrangement?—When a man finds himself out of work he goes to the local officer of police, shows himself to be a respectable working man out of employment, and gets a 'pass.' If the system were established every policeman throughout Scotland and England would recognise the pass.

5215. Would the 'pass' entitle to food and shelter?—Yes.

5216. Under whose control would these shelters be?—The County Councils would have to provide them.

28 Nov. 1894.

5217. Who are to be the judges as to whether a person is suitable for relief or not?—The person who is selected to control the house. The police might do.

5218. Does the number sheltered mean separate individuals, or are there repeated visits?—It refers to separate individuals.

5219. You are relieving almost as many vagrants in Jedburgh and Kelso as in the whole of Scotland?—These are not vagrants.

5220. Tramps and vagrants you style them?—The word vagrant is used in error. There is only a very small proportion that could be classed as vagrants.

5221. In regard to the gipsies, do they live in caravans?—No. They have houses. In the summer time they are sometimes out in caravans for a fortnight or a month.

5222. From a sanitary point of view are these suitable for sleeping in?—Yes.

5223. Are they as a class guilty of frequent breaches of the peace?—No. They are an orderly class.

5224. Are the children of these gipsies educated?—Yes.

5225. (By the Chairman.) Do the children attend school while the parents are on journey?—Sometimes they take a holiday.

5226. There is no complaint about them?—No.

5227. What do you mean by 'prominent non-resident offenders'?—These are tramps—vagrants.

Dr. Peel Ritchie.

DR. PHEL RITCHIE, late President of the Royal College of Physicians, called in and examined:

Dr. Peel Ritchie.

5228. (By the Chairman.) You are the President of the College of Physicians?—I was President. I am not now.

5229. You are connected with the Rescue Probationary Homes?—Yes. I have taken a great interest in reformatory work for many years. I have been connected also with the Night Asylum.

5230. It is principally in connection with that experience you are to give evidence?—Yes. The inebriate question.

5231. In this Rescue and Probationary Home for fallen women in St. John's Hill, I see from the report you have not very many inmates—an average attendance of 17?—We have accommodation for 25.

5232. I see there were 22 on December 1892, and 50 admitted during the year.

5233. Yes; a total of 72. There were 7 who left for service, 7 to wash in laundries, 1 was dismissed, 11 absconded, the destination of 9 is unknown, and 20 left within seven days of admission, leaving 22 in the Home.

5234. Is that encouraging?—No, by no means. After nearly fifteen years connection with the Home, I found the results of reformatory work among that class so unsatisfactory that I approached the directors of the Magdalene Asylum, as the most important in Edinburgh; to have a conference of the representatives of all the Rescue Homes in town to consider what improvements could be effected. Ultimately they agreed, and representatives from the following institutions met:—the Magdalene Asylum, Springwell House, the Edinburgh Industrial Home at Alnwickhill, the Grove, the Rescue and Probationary Home, the Park House, Portobello, Home, and the St Andrew's, Joppa, Home, the Discharged Prisoners' Society, and the Girls' House of Refuge. I submitted to that meeting certain points.

5235. What were these?—They were (1) United action as to the admission and treatment of these women who have recently left a Home, say within three months, and the desirability of interchange of communications regarding the inmates between the officials of various institutions; (2) whether such applicants should be referred back to the Home they had so recently left; and that their admission to a new Home be declined (if re-admitted to the former Home that it should only be as a favour to them), or whether the establishment of a special Home for persons of this class would be better? (3) That the duration of residence should be in all the Homes extended to two years; (4) whether efforts should be made to obtain power to retain compulsorily applicants voluntarily agreeing to stay, or if this power should not be given in all cases, the question would otherwise be left in its present most unsatisfactory state.

5236. How many inmates will there be in the whole of these places you mention?—That is more than I can tell you directly. The reports of the Magdalene Asylum for 1892 which I have, shows that there were 80 inmates at the close of the year, and that during the year 84 had been admitted.

5237. Your average attendance is 17?—Yes, or thereabout. Alnwickhill, I think, contains probably about double the number we have. The one at Portobello and the one at Joppa contain probably about 20 or 30 inmates in each. The Grove has been shut up.

5238. These institutions would contain about 170 women altogether?—I presume that is about it. Probably between 170 and 200.

5239. What is the period of detention?—Eighteen months in the Probationary Home.

5240. How do you get them to stay for 18 months?—The number we get to stay in for 18 months is limited. A large number go from one Home to another, and why I wanted compulsory power was because a woman often comes in under the effects of drink, or in such state that she is willing to stay, and wants to do better. If we could have power to keep that woman with us for 18 months we might do her some good.

5241. You have here 11 absconded?—That means ran away.

5242. You have no power of detention?—No.

5243. Do they ever run away with your clothes?—Yes, frequently.

5244. They evidently are aware of the fact, and they leave whenever they choose?—Yes.

5245. You have laundry work?—The work done is chiefly laundry work, because there is a great demand for it, and they can get good wages when they go out.

5246. One witness told us that laundry work

*Dr. Peel
Ritchie.*

28 Nov. 1894.

disgusted them?—I cannot say that is my experience. Those whose health unfits them for the work are otherwise occupied until their health is restored. Those who are physically unable for it get other house or kitchen work.

5247. I see you get a grant of £25 from the Town Council?—Yes.

5248. Was your intention to hand over the girls to anywhere else?—The Home was established after a religious revival in 1861 as a Shelter, and after a time one of the ladies connected with it gave us our present house for a Home.

5249. Do you find the whole of the inmates spend the 18 months with you?—I am sorry they don't.

5250. Do many stay a whole year?—I think about the number you find stated—about seven spend the 18 months.

5251. Had you any legislative precedent in your mind when you proposed taking compulsory power for detention?—It was seeing there was compulsory power in the 1879 Act in the case of the better-class, who came voluntarily, and on their own application, I thought it would be as well to get such a power for a charitable institution.

5252. You speak of habitual drunkards and inmates as identical. Do you consider them all habitual drunkards?—The total admissions since I became medical officer have been 734, and of that number, I class 484 as inebriates. That is to say that drink had entered to a greater or less extent into the reason of their coming to us. During the 33 years of the existence of the institution, the total admissions have been upwards of 2,000. The average age of the total cases was 27·9 years, and of the inebriates 31·2 years.

5253. You have a large number of young women?—Yes. The youngest I had was a girl of 12 years and 1 month.

5254. Did you consider her an inebriate?—Drink had entered into the reason for her coming to us.

5255. What do you consider constitutes habitualness?—The way in which they were taking it.

5256. Is it a matter of convictions?—I have no evidence of convictions.

5257. If we propose to deal with habitual drunkards we must have some evidence?—We find on inquiry that they are constantly taking drink.

5258. (By Dr. Sutherland.) They present the physical symptoms of excessive indulgence?—Yes.

5259. (By the Chairman.) Do you propose to get the same compulsory power over the women who are not habitual?—It would be desirable for all of them if we could retain them, but we have no power.

5260. About the results of your rescue work; do you find many come back to you?—Repeatedly.

5261. Those who go through their full course or thereby are cured?—Not so many as I think ought to be, but of those who go through the full time we have better results than with those who are coming and going.

5262. Out of these 734, how many would go through the course?—One-third.

5263. Do you trace their histories afterwards?—We have no means of tracing their history unless they come to us.

5264. That is a point we are very anxious to get—proof of the curative effect in the case of the habitual drunkard and the fallen woman?—I am afraid the proofs are very small. I cannot give you any definite reply, except that they are extremely unsatisfactory. Female supervision of them after leaving a Reformatory would be of great importance and use.

5265. Have you got any hopeful cases you could lay before us?—Yes, we have several hopeful cases, but the number is very small.

5266. Is there any you remember. Let us take that youthful drinker you spoke of?—She absconded.

5267. You mention that if any woman absconds with your clothes notice will be given to the police?—It is only of late that we have succeeded in getting the police to help us: I am sorry to say they did not always do so.

5268. Any woman is free to leave your place whenever she likes?—Yes; but she must give a week's notice.

5269. That is an illegal contract?—Yes, were it not that she agrees to the rule before she is admitted. We have no power, and they do not keep it, because they know they have only to make themselves sufficiently disagreeable, and they are turned out.

5270. Is there any overlapping of this sort of work in Edinburgh?—Very much.

5271. Is that objectionable?—Very.

5272. It allows one person to come from one place to another?—Yes. That was also considered at the conference.

5273. Supposing you had compulsory powers of detention, and a girl wishing to get out makes herself unpleasant, what would you do with her?—At present we could only turn her out. If we had compulsory power she would know she must conduct herself properly.

5274. She would say 'Hang your compulsory power; I'll make myself unpleasant'?—That, I know, is one of the difficulties we would have to contend with. I don't know what we could do, except hand her over to the police.

5274A. You think handing her over to the police would be sufficient?—It would punish her for her misbehaviour.

5275. Do you think that private munificence can be relied on for dealing with such a matter, or would you have it supported by the State or the municipality?—Those institutions where laundry work is done are very nearly self-supporting. The Magdalene makes an income of about £3,000 a year. We make nearly enough to keep us; we don't press for subscriptions.

5276. Don't you think if you had any unwilling inmates they would refuse to work, or work as little as possible, and so reduce your receipts?—Undoubtedly.

5277. We are told these women are dealt with rather leniently by the police in Edinburgh. Have you found that the position of Edinburgh with regard to decency in the streets, so far as prostitution is concerned, is on a par or inferior to most other towns?—I think Edinburgh is on a par with other well-conducted towns. A peculiarity of Edinburgh is the number of young girls not regarded as prostitutes allowed to roam about the streets uncontrolled at night. These girls are not recognised as fallen, but they are in the way of becoming so.

5278. But from the police point of view?—I have no means of judging, except that sometimes, instead of sending a girl to prison she is allowed to go to a Reformatory for importuning.

5279. Do you get many of these at your Home?—Perhaps four or five in the course of a year.

5280. Do they stay with you?—No, merely as long as it pleases them.

5281. Do you hear any complaint from these girls as to the way they have been treated by the police?—No.

5282. Do you hear any complaints or stories from them as to any particular circumstances under which they have been driven into a career of prostitution?—There was one girl sent to prison for 30 days, treated as a fallen woman, and she was not. This is, however, her own statement.

5283. In Edinburgh?—Yes.

5284. Is that a long time ago?—Within the last five years.

5285. What was her statement?—That she had been sent to prison for what she did not do. She was with bad companions.

5286. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You stated that there were 250 out of these fallen women who passed under your observation, in regard to whose fall drink did not play a part?—Yes.

5287. Do you mean to say the 250 were not more or less addicted to drink?—They were not habitual drinkers.

5288. Is there not a large class of women who fall, not so much from lust, as from a desire for money and for drink?—I think that is so.

*Dr. Peel
Ritchie.*

28 Nov. 1894.

*Dr. Peel
Ritchie.*
28 Nov. 1894.

5289. That would raise your percentage of women, who, although not coming under your definition of inebriate, are still addicted to drinking habits?—Yes. That occurs in the case of the 169 fallen through company. I have classed 133 of these as being inebriates. Probably more of them took drink.

5290. Have you ever conducted any investigations as to the formation of the palate of the women who come under your review?—Yes, I have. Dr. Clouston, a few years ago, in the Morrison Lectures, called attention to the condition of the palate, and pointed out that there was a normal or typical palate, the one found in neurotic patients, and the other, which occurred in the imbecile class.

5291. What kind of palate did he expect to find in the habitual drunkard?—The flat palate he classes as the typical one, the high palate as the neurotic one, and the deformed as the imbecile. Applying this test to females who have come to us since that statement was published, I found that the number who came to us with the healthy or typical palate, was rather higher than his proportion, because there were 108 out of 125; 14 presented themselves with the neurotic, and only three with the imbecile.

5292. Your results among fallen women do not tally with those of Dr. Clouston?—I find a larger number of the typical palate, and this leads me to believe that those who come to us are morally wrong rather than physically.

5293. Do you know that the power of detention has worked unsatisfactorily in England?—That is my understanding.

5294. Do you think, had you the power of detention, you would be more successful with the class you are dealing with?—I think we would.

5295. The memorial to the Marquis of Lothian, which you, as well as other eminent men in the profession have signed, would give you considerably larger powers than you seem to seek for these women?—The larger the better.

5296. Why not have complete compulsion and put them in volens volens?—Much better.

5297. Why do you recommend the Board of Lunacy in your memorial to the Marquis of Lothian as the Board of Control?—I suppose because it is an already constituted Board, accustomed to work of an analagous kind.

5298. Inebriety is not insanity?—No, but it was thought that the organisation would be useful.

5299. Do you not find people are more willing to be classed as drunkards than insane?—Yes; I think so.

5300. Would you not be less likely to stir up opposition if the control did not suggest lunacy?—Yes. But the cost would be greater.

5301. You are aware asylum authorities have strong objections to associate inebriates with lunacy?—Yes.

5302. Where are private patients sent?—I suspect in Scotland most of them are boarded away in Highland and county districts.

5303. Have you satisfactory results?—I am sorry to say I have not.

5304. What was the cause of failure?—Supervision was not strict enough, and the class of persons did not stay away sufficiently long.

5305. You could conceive of an arrangement by which some of these difficulties could be obviated?—Yes. Compulsory detention in a house specially set apart for the purpose.

5306. You attach great value to keeping them in employment?—Yes; that is one great difficulty of a private house. There is no employment.

5307. (By Miss Stevenson.) I see you return 27 as 'not fallen'?—No; they came to us for protection.

5308. They came voluntarily?—Sometimes voluntarily; at other times sent by friends.

5309. Are they young women?—Yes.

5310. Are they allowed to mix with the other inmates of the House?—There is no distinction made.

5311. Have you found that a satisfactory arrangement? Are you not afraid the association might have a bad effect?—I think it has. We can't help it however.

5312. Have you any experience as to the subsequent career of women who have been in the Home?—We endeavour to get them put under the care of friends, or in a situation where they will be looked after. Dr. Peel Ritchie.
28 Nov. 1894.

5313. I suppose laundry work is selected, not because of its elevating tendency, but because it is the one employment really remunerative?—That is so.

5314. I think I remember a proposal that the women in your Home should be given out-door employment. Was that ever carried out?—No. The garden would be scarcely sufficient for the purpose.

5315. Do you ever have cases of girls coming to you who have been imprisoned or in the cells?—Frequently.

5316. Do they come of their own free will or sent by the Prison Authorities?—They are brought by the Bible and Mission women from prison or the police office.

5317. Do a large number of these women get employment in the public laundries when they leave?—Yes.

5318. That was the reason, was it not, why the directors of the Grove were compelled to give up their laundry?—I don't know. They had a subsidy from Government to take in cases from the prison.

5319. You can give us no information why it was given up?—No.

5320. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) I see many of your inmates leave in the first week?—I can explain that. Many of them have been working in the laundries, have got drunk on a Saturday night, and go to the Home till the effects of the drink pass away. Others are too restless to settle.

5321. If we leave the temporary ones out of account how long do the inmates remain in the Home on an average?—I think from one-third to one-half stay the whole time.

5322. Whether would you say the proportion of male or female inebriates cured was the larger?—I should think male.

5323. What percentage of females would you say were cured?—I could not give a reliable percentage.

5324. Is it the case that most of those who become inebriates take to drinking early in life?—Of the 484 4 were under 16, there were 6 the age of 17, 9 under 18, 10 under 19, 9 under 20, 3 under 22, 1 under 26, and 1 of the age of 28. That is about one-tenth of the whole under 30. When they come to us above 30 they may have been drinking for a very considerable time. There was one of the age of 29 who had been ruined from the age of 14, and said she could not have led the life she did unless under the influence of drink.

5325. From the physical condition of the persons who come to you over 30, would you be able to judge whether they had been long in the habit of drinking?—I think so. Death of husbands led to 25 women coming to us, 24 of whom were drinkers. They were all above 30. Then there were 8 who had been left by their husbands, and they were all drunkards.

5326. Is an inebriate who is also a prostitute more difficult to cure than one who is not?—I think so.

5327. How long do you want to keep them compulsorily?—Two years.

5328. Would that give you a reasonable prospect of curing them?—I think it would give me a better prospect. The more prolonged the stimulus is going on the greater is the effect in the cells of the brain.

5329. There is an organic change in the brain?—Yes, ultimately, and the earlier and longer they are kept from the stimulus the more likelihood there is of a cure.

5330. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You get old toppers of 80 whose brains are not affected by any amount of liquor?—My idea is that stimulus acts on the cells of the brain.

5331. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Your society does not belong to any certificated Prison Aid Society?—No.

5332. Therefore it does not participate in any of the pecuniary advantages of such a society?—No.

5333. You recognise that the quality of the work in which these women are employed is a most important part of their reformatory treatment?—Yes.

5334. As I gather, you don't think that for a large number of these people washing is a suitable occupation?—Many of them are physically unfitted for it in consequence of the life they have been leading.

*Dr. Peel
Ritchie.*

28 Nov. 1894.

5336. Can anything be done to alter the work in the place, so that more satisfactory results may be obtained?—We endeavour to do so by giving them house-work. We have no great variety of work to do, but many of them are set to do sewing or kitchen work.

5337. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I understood you Dr., to say that the physical disability to perform washing was usually a temporary one?—Yes.

5338. You spoke of things that could be removed by treatment?—Yes. They are anæmic and with weak heart.

5339. Do you find the people improve in health?—Yes. But I am frightened to tell them in case they go out, to resume their old way of living.

5340. Do you think compulsory powers would assist the cure?—Yes. That is the great point I press for.

5341. Do you suggest two years as the maximum or average?—I think maximum, judging from some experiments I made upon myself some years ago. I am not an abstainer, and I am not an inebriate, and I came to the conclusion that it took about six months before the effect of alcohol passed out of the system of a moderate consumer. Then would come the time for improvement. I don't think 18 months is sufficient to allow them to return to work with the prospect of becoming and continuing abstainers. I think the longer you give them the better, and two years is the time I aim at.

5342. What proportion of habitual drunkards could be cured by this prolonged period of detention?—I can't say, but I believe it will be considerably larger than now.

5343. Do you think these organic changes in the brain can really be removed?—The brain cells recover from the effects of the stimulus, but when the change has been going on for a more prolonged period, the cells undergo more or less disorganisation, until you have a case which is not capable of being cured.

5344. The earlier you get the case the better?—Yes, without doubt.

5345. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What about these frequent cases of inebriety that occur at the monthly periods, and about 40 years of age among married women?—The sooner they are put under treatment the better.

5346. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is it not difficult in an early case to get evidence to justify detention. You want a cumulative series of offences which would make the case rather late?—There is a difficulty.

5347. Would you put the onus for committal to the Home of Detention entirely on the sheriff?—I think so.

5348. You would not have medical intervention as in the case of lunacy?—I would rather have it by the sheriff, but I think the machinery should be as simple as possible.

5349. Do you think doctors object to having this responsibility put on them?—Yes.

5350. (By the Chairman.) Do you not think the girl of twelve you spoke of should have been brought before the sheriff, and remitted to a Reformatory or Industrial School?—That was a point for her friends to consider. It occurred just as I joined the institution. I should have been inclined to adopt some such plan.

5351. If the attention of the police had been called to the fact, the girl would probably have been committed to a Reformatory?—The police had found her drunk on the street and she had also been in the Lock Hospital.

5352. They would have committed her to a Reformatory?—Yes, but she absconded.

5353. In these experiments you made upon yourself, have you published the results?—No. [Witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TWELFTH DAY.

Edinburgh, Thursday, 29th November 1894.

PRESENT:—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart. M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'Hardy, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss F. C. STEVENSON.

*Mr. Alexander

29 Nov. 1894.

MR. ALEXANDER MAIN, Superintendent of Police, Leith, called in and examined.

5354. (By the Chairman.) You are the Chief Constable of Leith?—I am.

5355. What we want to see you particularly about is to get some information regarding the working of the Borough Police Act. It applies to Leith?—Yes.

5356. And it does not apply to Edinburgh?—That is so.

5357. You will doubtless be familiar with what occurs in both towns, and we thought you might be able to give us some information as to the comparative merits of the system in Leith and Edinburgh, and any suggestions which may occur to you?—I do not know that I can quite say how they do in Edinburgh. I could hardly draw a comparison.

5358. When did the Police Act come into operation in Leith?—On 18th May 1893.

5359. Did it effect any great change in your police law?—Not a very great change, but it made a good many things clear that were doubtful before.

5360. And it re-enacted a very large number of enactments of previous statutes?—Yes, of the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862, under which Leith was previously administered.

5361. Has it made any great difference in the number of arrests?—Very little.

5362. I find that in Leith in 1893 there were 20 arrests per thousand of the population, and in Edinburgh there were 24 per thousand. I suppose there is as much of a rowdy population in Leith as in Edinburgh?—I should say that in proportion to population it is very much the same. In Leith we have scarcely any common lodging-houses—until lately we had only one of any size. In Edinburgh they have a large number of common lodging-houses, and a good many of the fellows

Mr. Alexander who would be likely to come before the Police Courts pretty frequently, and who were working at the Leith Docks, were travelling to Edinburgh at night and living in the common lodging-houses.

9 Nov. 1894.

5362. On the other hand, you have considerable sailor population in Leith?—That has changed greatly. I have been connected with the Leith Police since 1865, and for a good many years after that we had a considerable number of seamen arrested, but trade has now got very much into large steamers. The men generally are very well behaved, and stick by their steamers very much. And when the ship is paid off, the Board of Trade send them to their homes, and the seamen element in Leith contributes very little towards crime.

5363. Does it contribute to it indirectly by attracting disorderly females?—It used to do, but since the Act of 1885 came into operation we have been very much cleared of that class of houses and women.

5364. Would you say that you are as clear, or clearer of them in Leith, compared with Edinburgh?—I should say clearer; but we have not a population like Edinburgh to keep up that sort of thing.

5365. What changes did the passing of the last Act particularly make in connection with your offenders?—I cannot say that it made any practical difference. Most of the offences that are under this Act were offences before. This Act did more to clear up the matter. For instance, drunk and incapable was not an offence under the Act of 1862, but it was an offence under the Public-Houses Acts of 1862, and it is almost word for word taken from that Act and put into the Burgh Police Act.

5366. But it gives you heavier penalties?—I do not see much desire on the part of the magistrates to take advantage of these.

5367. Have you your annual report?—I have not got it with me.

5368. Can you tell us the number of drunk and incapables dealt with in Leith last year?—About 520.

5369. What is the usual mode of dealing with them in Leith?—Up to 15th May 1893 the invariable punishment was 5s. or 24 hours. Since then there have been a few cases where that has been gone beyond. There is a provision in that Act that if a person has been brought up three times within the same year for drunkenness, the penalty can be largely increased.

5370. But the ordinary clause for drunkenness gives a heavier penalty?—Yes; 40s. or one month.

5371. What is the heaviest that has been imposed in your Court?—Unless the aggravation has been charged, under the section of the Act which deals with habitual drunkards, I do not think that under section 381 there has been a larger penalty inflicted for a first offence than 5s.

5372. But do you remember any big penalty for any offence?—Yes; we have had the full 40s. imposed. That was a case which had come very frequently before the Court, and the woman had a child with her on each occasion, and she had several times got 14 days for drunkenness.

5373. But you can give, under the habitual offenders clause, 60 days?—No, I don't think so.

5374. You can give 40s. or 30 days without the assistance of the habitual offence, and you can give 14 days with the habitual offence?—Well, the 14 days extra have not been put on for the aggravation.

5375. So that in Leith you have not exhausted the powers of the Act?—By no means; the magistrates very seldom come up to it.

5376. What is your opinion as to the system of light penalties for habitual drunkenness?—I think it is quite a mistake. It has no deterrent effect, and cannot possibly have any tendency to reform.

5377. Have you many frequent offenders?—Not a large percentage, but a good few appear up to seven or eight times, and some more.

5378. But possibly those who have appeared seven or eight times in Leith may have appeared a good many times in Edinburgh?—That is so; and in other parts of the county of Midlothian as well.

5379. I suppose breaches of the peace and petty assaults are very largely connected with drunkenness? Mr. Alexander Yes. Main.

29 Nov. 1894.

5380. Has there been any alteration in the law in regard to them?—No.

5381. Are you much troubled with vagrancy?—Well, a good many beggars come down in the Trinity district. But it is wonderful how changes work round. When the steamers were running across from Granton to Fife we had a great deal more of it than we have now. They came across from Fife in that direction, and begged their way up through Trinity and Leith to Edinburgh. Since that service was reduced we have had fewer cases of begging.

5382. Do you remember how many apprehensions you would have in the year?—Not very many. Last year we had 16—14 males, and 2 females, being an increase of 7 on the previous year. The difference would probably be accounted for by a little more vigilance on the part of the police. The working of this Act makes a good difference. In a great many offences under the old Act of 1862 one witness was sufficient. It is now different, and we cannot get a conviction for begging unless the person from whom they beg comes forward to give evidence.

5383. That increase in the number of apprehensions shows that the additional security in the way of extra evidence has not proved any barrier to getting convictions?—No; but it is a little trouble to those who have to appear, and they sometimes complain of it.

5384. I am informed that one Boswell, who is a leading man among the gipsies, is in your district?—They live in a van, on ground let to them, and they travel through the country.

5385. But there is no gipsy encampment or gipsy population?—No; further than that they come there and live with their van. I do not suppose there are more than a dozen connected with it.

5386. And they are well-behaved people?—Perfectly so.

5387. In the Act of 1862 there was a special provision that one witness was sufficient, but now you cannot get a conviction for begging without bringing up the person from whom they begged, unless you can get two policeman?—Yes.

5388. Has there been any similar change in the law with regard to prostitution?—Yes, we require two witnesses there.

5389. What constitutes the offence in Leith?—The offence of loitering and importuning can only be committed by a common prostitute. I am Public Prosecutor as well as Chief Constable, and the first evidence I insist upon being led is that the person accused is a common prostitute. That being proved, two witnesses prove that the woman was loitering and importuning passengers. Of course, her character, the time of night, and the whole circumstances are taken into account by the magistrate.

5390. We were told that in Edinburgh the practice is not to arrest a woman for loitering, and as regards importuning, not to arrest her before she had been warned. Have you any arrangement of that sort?—Our arrangement is that I do not care how often a constable had warned a woman not previously convicted of prostitution, the first occasion on which she is brought to the Police Office she is not locked up. A 'refused charge' is entered, and she is liberated, but if again apprehended, she is locked up.

5391. What do you mean by a 'refused charge'?—The lieutenant does not take it. A constable not infrequently apprehends a person, or she may be given in charge by another person, and on inquiry at the Police Office it is found that there is not a relative charge against her, and a 'refused charge' is entered, and she is liberated. But if apprehended a second time she is brought before the Court.

5392. What number of cases have you had of this class?—Not a large number, but I forget how many. In 1885 we had 135, but at that time we were in a very unsatisfactory position, and last year there were 41 apprehensions for prostitution.

Mr. Alexander
Main.
29 Nov. 1894.

5393. What is the usual sentence for that offence?—The Act only provides for 40s. or one month; but the usual sentences range for the first offence from probably 6s. or three days, but it goes up and down, and depends greatly on the magistrate.

5394. What would the stiffest magistrate give?—I have seen them give the whole penalty of 40s. or one month.

5395. In many cases?—Not many, but I have seen it.

5396. Are you aware that in Edinburgh the penalty is very much lighter?—I do not know.

5397. What about the frequent offenders?—Very much depends on the whole system, and that is why I say it is no system. It depends entirely on the magistrates. Some magistrates, no matter how often the same persons are before them, just give the usual light sentences.

5398. In the case of persons charged under this Burgh Police Act with petty offences, do you in the charge, if the person pleads not guilty, bring forward previous convictions in proof?—In my complaint I set forth that the accused had been convicted according to the sentence of the Court. The charge is read over to the person, but not the previous convictions. If the charge is found proven, or the prisoner pleads guilty, the convictions are read over, and if the prisoner denies them they are proved.

5399. But you don't let the magistrate know of the previous convictions until the prisoner has pleaded guilty or has been convicted?—No; I have never done so since Lord-Advocate Macdonald's Criminal Procedure Act came into operation. I draw my complaint, and when I come to the end of the charge I put a mark with red ink, at which the clerk stops in reading. When the charge is disposed of by a plea of guilty or a conviction, the previous convictions are read to the prisoner, and if he admits them, there is an end to it, and if he denies them they are proved in the ordinary way.

5400. Do you think that is the general practice?—I do not think it is. I have had a good deal of correspondence with burgh prosecutors, who hold that it is not the right thing to do, but I maintain that it is.

5401. Do you know if that system prevails in Edinburgh?—I cannot say; but I know that it does not exist in Dundee.

5402. You say that in the case of begging you must either have the evidence of two policemen or of the person who was begged from. With regard to prostitution, do you require the presence of the person from whom solicitation is made?—I have never asked it. I would rather let the case fall, and for this reason, that I do not think it is fair, because the man does not himself contribute to the offence. They like it so badly that I do not insist upon it.

5403. But you have two policemen as witnesses?—Yes.

5404. In plain clothes?—Yes; but I find the men in uniform are as good as those in plain clothes for these offences.

5405. Do they go in twos?—Yes.

5406. And it is only in that way that you can get the two witnesses?—Yes, but it is quite an easy matter for a single constable to signal for his neighbour.

5407. Yes, but how could he be a witness to the offence?—The offence is repeated over and over again.

5408. And you do not arrest in Leith unless the offence is committed over and over again, and becomes a nuisance?—That is so.

5409. I ask that question because women have complained that once they have been convicted they have no chance. Do you think a woman who has been convicted is liable to be run in on the caprice of your men?—I do not think so. A constable has no interest in arresting a woman wrongly.

5410. Among the women of that class in prison and in Homes, we have had the one story, that they have been run in once they have been convicted?—I should not like to be responsible for men who would do such a thing, and I do not think it exists in Leith.

5411. What do you do with your prisoners—have you any cells in Leith?—Yes, and very good cells.

5412. But they are not certified cells?—Oh no. The prisoners are sent to the Calton Prison in Edinburgh.

5413. What is the cost of the escort?—I think the Prison Commissioners pay the Town Council of Leith £50 a year for the use of the van and horse. They also pay 9d. an hour for the constable employed in taking these prisoners up to prison.

5414. Do you think there will be any surplus over after defraying the cost for the escort?—There cannot be a surplus over. We have to keep up the van and horse, and the money we get would not maintain them, but we use the horse otherwise—for our fire department.

5415. Your Police Commissioners do not make anything out of this 9d. per hour?—No; it is just put into the general fund.

5416. Do you find that the treatment which prostitutes receive at the hands of the magistrates tends to reform them, or to drive them elsewhere?—I think that it does not in the slightest degree tend to reform.

5417. Then have you any suggestions to make with regard to the treatment of drunkards, prostitutes, or offenders generally?—I do not think I am qualified to make suggestions. The facts speak for themselves; but I think you will first have to discover the causes that lead these unfortunate people to this sort of life.

5418. I suppose drink has a good deal to do with it?—Well, I am very doubtful that drink is the cause.

5419. Well, what is your opinion?—Undoubtedly there is a weakness of will with them, and I generally find that these poor people who give way to drunkenness and debauchery, are, when sober, very quiet; but they are dull and morose, and I am strongly of opinion that there is in them some latent but strong desire for excitement, and there is no other way to gratify it so easily. I do not say they take the drink for the love of it, but for the effect it produces.

5420. Have you many juvenile offenders?—A good few.

5421. Have you any Reformatories?—We have two excellent Industrial Schools for boys and girls, and we take very full advantage of them. Since this last Act came into operation, I think we are getting into a very satisfactory way of dealing with juvenile offenders, and I think it will have a better effect than anything we could try. The Industrial Schools Act, as recently amended, gave School Boards authority to contribute towards the maintenance of children at Industrial Schools, and since then the Leith School Board have made an arrangement with the Industrial Schools in the town. Under the Industrial Schools Act the Government only contributed 2s. towards the support of the child, when committed under Section 16. The Industrial Schools throughout the country agreed among themselves that they would not take children under the 16th section of the Act, and when these children were getting beyond the control of the parents, it was found that if they could be dealt with under the 16th section it would be a great advantage. The School Board of Leith communicated with me, and I pressed them to get this provision into the Industrial Schools Act, so that they might be able to contribute towards the maintenance of children in the Industrial Schools. In the first place the case is reported to the School Board. Their officers make careful inquiry as to how the child got into that condition, and if the Board be satisfied that it was due to no fault of the parents, they recommend it as a case to be admitted to the Industrial School. The case is reported to me, and I have inquiry made, and bring the child before the magistrate under the 16th section. If the magistrate is satisfied, he commits the child under that section, and the School Board pay the difference between the 5s. necessary to maintain the child and the 2s. allowed by Government.

5422. Do you find that these children who pass through the Industrial Schools turn out well?—Almost invariably.

5423. You have no Reformatory in Leith?—We

Mr. Alexander
Main.
29 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander send a good many to the Reformatory, but they are a different class of children.

Nov. 1894. 5424. What is your opinion regarding them?—They have gone so far before being sent there that the result is not nearly so hopeful.

5425. It is said that 80 per cent. are reformed in the Reformatories of the country?—I am sure there are not 80 per cent. of ours reformed.

5426. I suppose the class of younger people who are sent to prison have lived in miserable homes?—Yes.

5427. A boy or girl of that class would be kicked about, and have to live a very precarious life in a one-roomed hovel, I suppose?—That is very largely the case.

5428. Do you think a boy or girl in that position would find prison a particularly severe sort of place to live in after what they had been accustomed to?—I have thought over that matter; and although they are kept clean and comfortable in prison, compared to what their condition is in their dirty squalid homes, I do not think I ever met one who would not rather be there than in prison.

5429. Don't you think it is a bad thing to send these young people to prison if you can avoid it, and hold it over their heads as a sort of punishment?—Yes.

5430. How would it do to have a few certified cells for the purpose of keeping people whom we did not want to send to prison, but whom it was necessary to punish?—I have no experience of that, and I have not considered it; but I think they would be much better dealt with in prison, as we would have to keep a male and female turnkey for the cells.

5431. (By Dr. Farquharson.) In your opinion, the public notion that drink is responsible for prostitution is exaggerated?—I do not say that the public view is exaggerated; but I think myself that drink is probably more of a consequent than an antecedent cause to crime in a good many cases.

5432. That it is effect rather than cause?—Yes.

5433. Does your remark apply to prostitution only, or to petty crime generally?—It applies generally.

5434. (By Col. McHardy.) You said there was a certain increase, though not great, in the sentences now imposed under the Police Act for drunkenness?—Yes.

5435. Have you found that those increased penalties have had any practical result in checking drunkenness?—No.

5436. So that a slightly increased sentence is no more beneficial in a reformatory sense than a short one?—That is my opinion. Merely sending to prison for a few days is of no effect.

5437. What evidence is required in the case of a breach of the peace?—Two witnesses, according to the law of Scotland generally, unless there is a special statute.

5438. The number of constables which you have to your population is not very high as compared with other towns?—It is not fairly stated. The number is given as 74, but it is really 110. The 36 of difference are paid for by the Dock Commission, but they are really constables doing the duties of constables, and if they were not there we would have to put others in their places.

5439. You have about one constable per 1,000 of the population?—That is the authorised force, but if you take the others into consideration we have a good many more.

5440. Are these harbour police practically useful for the maintenance of order?—Undoubtedly; and not only for the maintenance of order, but for other police work.

5441. In dealing with the offences that come before you, do you work the First Offenders Act fully?—Both before and since the passing of that Act they have been admonished for the first offence. Unless there is something out of the way in the case, they are always dismissed with an admonition for the first offence.

5442. But if there is something out of the way, how do you proceed?—They are fined or sent to prison.

5443. Is that in sympathy with the First Offenders Act?—Not quite; but not infrequently with us they are put under caution for good behaviour, in lieu of imprisonment.

5444. Do you never give time to pay a fine?—That has never been done.

5445. If a small fine is imposed on a person for these offences connected with disorder, how long is it after the conviction before he is imprisoned?—The Court sits at ten, and the van leaves for the prison at two o'clock.

5446. That is four hours between the conviction and the removal to the prison?—Yes.

5447. What steps do you take to give facility for the payment of fines?—Any step that the prisoner suggests.

5448. Do you send out for bail if there is a reasonable chance of getting it?—Whether there is a reasonable chance or not, if the prisoner suggests it.

5449. You let him know that you will do so?—Certainly.

5450. You speak very favourably of the Industrial Schools, but not so favourably of the Reformatories?—Yes; but I said the children sent to Reformatories were of a different class and had not the same opportunities.

5451. But although the reformation would be more difficult, do you consider it impossible?—I would not like to say that.

5452. The numbers that are given of reformation in Reformatories are very high?—Yes.

5453. Does your police experience lead you to believe that a good many Reformatory boys turn up again in the hands of the police?—That is so.

5454. Is the Reformatory treatment in any way satisfactory in your opinion, or could anything better be done?—I am not in a position to suggest anything.

5455. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you say how many children have been sent to Industrial Schools by the Leith School Board under the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act?—We had one sent yesterday, and I should say a good dozen since the arrangement was made by the School Board.

5456. Is the complaint as to the inability of the parent to control the child made by the School Board officer or by you?—The School Board send the complaint to me through their clerk.

5457. And you are the prosecutor for the School Board?—I do it as part of my duty as public prosecutor.

5458. In cases where a prosecution is taken against a parent for neglect, do you prosecute?—No.

5459. Do you find that greater facilities for getting rid of their responsibility for their children induces them to be more negligent?—I think not, and for this reason, that the School Board are practical people, and they are ratepayers as well, and in my experience they have been very careful in making their selections. Of course no action can be taken on my part until they are first satisfied. If they find in their inquiry that there has been neglect on the part of the parent for which they deserve to be prosecuted, that is done. I think the actual working of this system has not been to relieve the parent unless there was good cause for it.

5460. Does the School Board take any steps to recover from the parents any part of their contribution for the maintenance of children sent by them to the Industrial Schools?—In the cases which they send in Leith they will not be able to recover anything. I have no doubt, however, but the Government will be able to recover part of the two shillings which they pay; but the parents are in such a condition that I am sure the School Board will not be able to recover any of their contribution.

5461. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you ever any 'showy' women of the prostitute class before you?—Very few.

5462. Do they exist in Leith?—Scarcely. We

Mr. Alexander
Main.

29 Nov. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Main. have no field for that sort of thing in Leith.

23 Nov. 1894.

5463. But was there not a large number driven out of Edinburgh in 1880 under some special provision?—The Edinburgh Act of 1879 came into operation in 1880, and we were simply invaded in Leith. In fact they took up a whole square until 1885, when the Criminal Law Amendment Act came into force. Under the powers conferred by that Act I cleared the place without any difficulty.

5464. But there are some 'showy' women in Leith?—There are scarcely any, and the few there are carry on their calling in Edinburgh.

5465. Do they do so with less immunity than the poorer classes?—I don't think there is much difference, but I could not say.

5466. I notice by your returns that there has been a steady decrease in the number of apprehensions made by the Leith police during the last 14 years?—That is so.

5467. Can you explain that?—I expect it is because the people seem to be better behaved.

5468. Do the police help drunk men or women home?—No. Of course it is not a police offence to be drunk and incapable alone.

5469. In Leith?—In any place, so far as I am aware. The offence consists in being drunk and incapable, without being under the care or protection of any one. But the police never go to help any one home.

5470. What is the total amount you receive in the shape of fines?—They are very much down. Last year I think they amounted to £500, but when those houses in Falslaw Street existed they were as high as £1,000.

5471. Then there is a connection between the decrease in the number of apprehensions and the decrease in your exchequer?—That is so.

5472. (By the Chairman.) What do you do in regard to pledges left for the appearance of a prisoner?—A large percentage of these are forfeited.

5473. Does the lieutenant on duty fix the amount?—If I am not there.

5474. And he does so in view of the amount likely to be imposed if the person were found guilty?—That is very much the case.

5475. If a man leaves 5s. and gives the name of John Smith, would you let him go?—It would depend entirely on the offence.

5476. Take a petty offence?—In that case we would let him go, and never look for him.

5477. In Edinburgh they say a man does not purge himself of his offence by simply forfeiting his bail. Do you know that?—Yes; but I do not think it is the case in many other towns.

5478. Do you think it proper?—I think if a man forgets himself, and gets into a brawl, and pays 5s. or 10s. on being brought to the Police Office, it would serve no good purpose to go and hunt him up and bring him before the Court again.

5479. It confuses the previous convictions. Would the forfeiture of a pledge rank as a previous conviction?—No; but in the practical working of the system we would not allow a person out who was very frequently brought up, unless on very heavy bail.

5480. Do you send to their friends if they want them to give bail?—Yes.

5481. What is your experience of Sundays as compared with other days?—We are not very well situated in Leith as regards Sundays owing to our peculiar position. The hotels are open on Sundays, and there are a great many alleged bona fides whom the police do not know.

5482. Have you many cases brought in on Sundays?—Not an extraordinary number.

5483. Are you under the Early Closing Act?—No; we are above 50,000 of population and are exempted from the operation of the Act.

5484. But Leith has petitioned for the extension of the Early Closing Act to the Burgh?—Yes; I was one of a deputation which waited on Sir George Trevelyan in Glasgow to get the Act extended to the Burgh. [Witness then withdrew.]

*Miss Paterson.
Mr. Andrew
Scott.*

Miss PATERSON, Matron of the Edinburgh Magdalene Asylum, and Mr ANDREW SCOTT, Chartered Accountant, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

*Miss Paterson
Mr. Andrew
Scott.*

5485. (By the Chairman, to Mr. Scott.) You are secretary of the Edinburgh Magdalene Asylum?—I am assistant secretary.

5486. State briefly the objects of that institution?—To reclaim women from the paths of immorality and drunkenness, if they come to the Home for 18 months.

5487. Do you profess to deal with mere drunkards?—No.

5488. You have a daily average population of about 90?—Yes.

5489. And your admissions for last year were 108?—Yes.

5490. The employment which you give your inmates consists of washing and needlework?—Yes.

5491. And you make a profit out of the work of some 3 per cent. over the cost of maintenance?—Yes.

5492. How many have you engaged in needlework?—There is no needlework done for outside, but only making and mending their own clothes in the house. There will not be above five so employed.

5493. So that practically your whole business is washing?—Yes.

5494. And you keep the inmates in for 18 months?—Yes.

5495. I see from the report that 18 per cent. have been dismissed, or have absconded, or lapsed?—Yes. In 1894, out of 98 at the beginning of the year, and 98 since admitted—making in all 196—32 went to situations, 4 were retained in the service of the institution, 26 were restored to friends, 6 were sent to hospitals, 2 were sent to other Homes, 1 died, 21 left of their own accord, and 2 were dismissed, leaving 103 in the Home.

5496. Do those women who go to their own homes leave early?—Yes.

5497. What are the absconding class?—They jump over the wall.

5498. Why do they do so? Why do they not go out by the door?—(Miss Paterson.) Some of them have not the courage to ask for their clothes.

5499. Do you allow them to go out if they ask?—(Miss Paterson.) Oh yes; we cannot keep them.

5500. And they go out with the Asylum clothes on?—(Miss Paterson.) Yes.

5501. (Mr. Scott.) In the past year we had two who jumped over the wall, but they came back, and went out regularly.

5502. Do you put the police on the track of those who abscond?—No.

5503-4. What do they get out of their work?—The worth of it.

5505. How much?—About £5 at the end of the 18 months.

5506. And an outfit for those who are restored to their friends?—Yes.

5507. Are they satisfied with that £5 for 18 months' work?—Perfectly.

5508. Have most of the inmates been in the habit of earning wages?—Yes; but it is when they are at the lowest ebb that they come to the Home. They are in a melancholy condition when they come, and they remain the 18 months to keep away from their old life, with the knowledge that they may get a situation at the end of the period.

5509. Of those reclaimed, do many come back to you again?—I am afraid there are a good number.

5510. We were told by a previous witness that there was a great difficulty in the overlapping of these charities? Do you think there is a necessity for more uniformity in these Homes?—I was at the conference referred to by the gentlemen in question, and it was

Miss Paterson. agreed that when a woman leaves, and appears at another Home, the matrons generally correspond and find out about her. Of course one girl might be better in a small than in a large Home, and a matron might do better with one girl than another. Although there is overlapping, I am not quite prepared to say that it is a bad thing.

Mr. Andrew Scott.

29 Nov. 1894.

5511. (To Miss Paterson.) Have you any record of those who have passed through the institution as to what their future position has been?—We have just the roll-book.

5512. Do you keep a note of them after they have left?—Yes.

5513. And keep your eye on them for a long time?—Yes.

5514. How do they get on?—Some of them very well for a time, and they correspond with us and come and visit us.

5515. Do any of them ask you to bank for them, as in Glasgow?—Some of them do.

5516. How many bank-books have you?—They keep their own bank-books.

5517. Can you give us any examples of cases of girls who have been very bad before they came to you, and have had a good career afterwards?—I do know a good many cases, but I cannot exactly mention them just now. I have just the girls' own letters, and photographs, and small things like that.

5518. (To Mr. Scott.) Your finances are very good—better, apparently, than any similar institution in Scotland?—Yes.

5519. How do you account for that?—(Mr. Scott.) We have a very steady washing business, and the work is well done. We spare no expense to have the best, both for the sake of the girls and the work.

5520. Do you send out the girls to collect the money and the clothes?—(Mr. Scott.) No, we send the porter at the gate.

5521. (To Miss Paterson.) Are the girls ever allowed out?—Not except with an assistant matron.

5522. Not on Sundays?—No.

5523. Not to go to church?—We have church in the House.

5524. What hours do they work?—It depends on the work we have on hand.

5525. Take the wash-house, when do you start?—At eight, and work on till seven as a rule.

5526. On Saturdays?—They do not begin till twelve o'clock on Saturdays.

5527. What dinner-hour do they get?—From twelve to one.

5528. And they take breakfast before they start?—Breakfast is at a quarter-past seven, lunch at ten, dinner at twelve, tea at half-past three, and supper at eight.

5529. Do you let them out right suddenly at the end of the 18 months, without any training to see whether they can stand the liberty?—Yes.

5530. I suppose most of them have been addicted to drink?—Some of them, but not very badly.

5531. Most of them have come through the prison, I suppose?—Oh no; hardly any with us.

5532. Then how do you pick them up?—Some of the missionaries bring them to the receiving Home.

5533. Where is that?—In Henderson Terrace, just beside our place.

5534. How long do they stay there?—A few days, until they pass the committee, which meets every Wednesday, and then they are sent on to the Asylum.

5535. How many prison Magdalenes would you have, or do you ask that question?—We always ask it, but as a rule the answer is that they have not been in jail, or if they have it was only for importuning. Most of them, however, have not been in jail at all.

5536. Then they could hardly be said to have come as low as they might have come?—No.

5537. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you give us any idea how many of the girls who go out in the course of the year return to you within that year?—(Miss Paterson.) I am afraid I cannot.

5538. Have you any?—(Mr. Scott.) Yes, there are some cases, but very few who come back in so short a time.

5539. What is the usual length of time that they stay out, after having been with you, before they come back?—(Mr. Scott.) It varies a good deal.

5540. What is the shortest time?—(Mr. Scott.) Some are only away for a month, and others are absent for years.

5541. Do you make any rule about those coming back?—(Mr. Scott.) We do not care about them, but there is no rule, and we take them in unless they have been exceptionally bad.

5542. Have you any means of tracing the girls who go out, and looking after them after they leave the home?—(Miss Paterson.) Just if they keep up a correspondence with us.

5543. Then it is entirely the will of the woman whether she keeps up the connection or not?—(Miss Paterson.) Yes.

5544. If a girl loses her situation, do you take her in again till she gets another?—Yes.

5545. Do you do that in many cases?—In very many.

5546. Have you ever refused to take in a girl who left her situation because she did not like it?—Not if there was nothing against her—if she had not misbehaved.

5547. If she had only left because she was displeased with her mistress, you would take her in?—Yes.

5548. Why have you no other work than laundry work?—Because they do not care to sew.

5549. Is it because that kind of work is considered of a reforming character and most suited for improving their morals, or simply because it is most remunerative?—(Mr. Scott.) I expect that is it.

5550. Have you a garden?—(Miss Paterson.) Yes.

5551. Do the women take any interest in it, or are they employed there?—No, they do nothing but wash.

5552. Are they obliged to attend religious services?—Yes.

5553. How many in the day?—There is worship in the morning and at night, and three services on Sundays.

5554. Who conducts them?—The chaplain takes two, and an outside gentleman one.

5555. Is the Home visited during the day by any ladies?—There are two ladies who take a bible class on Fridays.

5556. Do you take any means to test the truth of the girls' statement that they have not been in prison?—No, we just take their word.

5557. You don't refer to the chaplain of the prison?—No.

5558. Don't you think it would be desirable to do that?—I do not know.

5559. Does Miss Kent bring you many inmates?—A good many.

5560. Is her work chiefly in connection with the prison?—Yes.

5561. (Mr. Scott.) The way the Magdalene Asylum is worked is this. The girls go to Springwell first, and the committee at Springwell allocate them to the different Homes, and in that way we do not know whether they come from prison or not, but the managers at Springwell could tell that.

5562. You have no classification as to the length of time they have been on the streets?—(Mr. Scott.) No.

5563. Do you find that a good arrangement?—The cases are just watched by the 12 assistant matrons.

5564. For how many?—For the 100 inmates.

5565. (By Col. M'Hardy, to Miss Paterson.) Your description of the daily routine of the inmates sounds a little bit dull for young women of a sprightly or excitable nature. What do you provide in the way of recreation?—They just have games among themselves.

5566. When do they amuse themselves?—At the dinner-hour.

5567. What do they do in the evenings?—They go to bed pretty early.

5568. Although work is no doubt the first preliminary in reformation, I suppose your society has considered it necessary to stay it up with some sort of relaxation?—We have social meetings occasionally.

5569. Of what nature?—Music and recitations.

5570. How often have you these?—About once a month.

5571. Do the inmates take part in them, or is it a performance by outsiders?—Sometimes the women take part in them.

5572. You try to maintain a sort of liveliness among them?—Yes, and the girls are exceedingly happy, singing at their work.

5573. I suppose reformation would depend a good deal on the way in which it would develop intercourse with good people. Is that done to any extent?—Yes.

5574. Do you allow them free intercourse with each other all day?—Yes.

5575. Are there any other persons who mix with them and talk with them in an ordinary every day way?—The ladies and gentlemen of the committee.

5576. But they would probably put only a few formal questions?—We have also the chaplain.

5577. To what extent do the 12 assistant matrons talk in daily ordinary conversation with the women? Is it all in the way of administration, in giving orders and that sort of thing, or do they, as far as they can, become part and parcel of their society, so as to keep the thing working in a happy spirit?—Yes, they are more the girls' friends, and are in continual conversation with them during the day.

5578. Their games are during the dinner hour?—Yes, and on Saturday afternoons; and the young ones go out and play on the green.

5579. So that you direct your attention to try and create and maintain a spirit of liveliness?—Yes, and to make their lives bright and happy.

5580. How many sleep in the same dormitory?—There are 14 in 3 of the rooms.

5581. Are the rooms brightened by pictures and such things?—There are a few texts.

5582. (By Dr. Farguharson, to Miss Paterson.) Do the girls like their work and take an interest in it?—Yes.

5583. Do they make any complaints of the hours being too long or the work too heavy?—No, because none of the girls are overworked.

5584. How do the hours compare with those of laundry establishments outside?—Ours are not quite so long.

5585. What is the regulation rate of pay for laundry work outside?—I do not know.

5586. But your women are quite satisfied with what they get when they go out?—Yes.

5587. Is the reason of that because they get more than they could get outside?—They could not save as much as they get from us if they were out working.

5588. Does the health of the girls improve after a certain time?—Yes.

5589. Do you give them a regular period of exercise every day?—It is their own option. They are free to go out if they choose.

5590. Are they allowed to go out and see their friends occasionally?—There is no restriction on the friends coming in.

5591. Are they allowed to communicate with their friends by letter?—Yes, regularly.

5592. Do you regulate the friends?—Yes, fathers, mothers, brothers and sisters, or any relatives who would not do them harm.

5593. Do you consider this work an essential part of the reformation of the girls?—Oh yes; we could not keep them there otherwise.

5594. (By Dr. Sutherland, to Miss Paterson.) You were in Glasgow before coming to Edinburgh?—I was Matron of the Prison Mission at the Whitvale Shelter.

5595. A great many of those who came there had been in prison?—They had almost all been prisoners.

5596. Is it not possible that a great many of your women may also have been in prison, and you not know of it?—They may have been.

5597. Do you ever hear them speak about that?—No.

5598. Do you charge the same rate for laundry work as is done in private enterprises in the city; or do you undersell them?—I do not know what the charges are in private laundries.

5599. Is there any private enterprise of the laundry type as big as yours?—Yes.

5600. Then do these women get situations in the private laundries in the city after they leave your Home?—We do not approve of it, if we can get them into other situations.

5601. Is there anything undesirable in putting them to that work to which they have been trained?—We do not care about them being in lodgings.

5602. (To Mr. Scott.) You prefer large institutions to small ones?—Yes.

5603. Is that because you have a better chance of classification?—I think we get a better grip of character.

5604. Would it not be desirable to classify those women. There must be different degrees of temperament, disposition, and degradation?—Yes; but I don't think it could be done.

5605. Do you think your institution would be benefited if you had compulsory powers to detain these restless women who leave you shortly after they come in?—No, we don't think so in our institution.

5606. Do you not think at all events it would be in the interest of the restless class to have an institution where they could be compulsorily detained?—I think the girls would make it so uncomfortable that you would be glad to get rid of them in the interests of the others.

5607. But for the worst class of girls don't you think such an institution desirable?—Yes.

5608. Are those fallen women not much addicted to drink?—Yes.

5609. Is it not a very considerable factor in their lives?—Yes.

5610. Is it your idea that people of the kind who come to the Home are fallen women addicted to intemperance?—Yes. The girls say that they could not live that life unless they took drink.

5611. What is the cost of the food?—About 4s. a week each.

5612. (By the Chairman, to Miss Paterson.) If your inmates, after having been 18 months in the Home, do not go into private laundries, what sort of situations do they get?—They take laundry-women's places in private houses.

5613. I thought you aimed at getting them into houses where a single servant is kept?—Some of them take places as general servants.

5614. Have they any training for that?—They take their turn at house work in the Home.

5615. Have you any young girls?—A good number.

5616. What is the age of the youngest?—We have them as young as 14.

5617. Have you many between that age and 16?—(Mr. Scott.) None just now, but we have one at 14, and two or three about 17.

5618. Take that girl of 14. Was she a prostitute?—(Mr. Scott.) I think she was just in danger of falling.

5619. Have you any cases of girls being brought to you for protection to prevent them falling?—Yes.

5620. And this young girl is one of them?—(Mr. Scott.) I think so. Some older ones either come of their own accord or are brought by their friends.

5621. Are they mixed up with the rest?—(Miss Paterson.) Yes.

5622. (By Miss Stevenson, to Miss Paterson.) Do you ever retain any of those women as servants in the Home?—Yes, a good many.

5623. What is the most important position you give them in the Home?—We have three who are superintendents; but they have been there a long time.

5624. Of those 12 assistant matrons who are with you now, how many were inmates?—Three, and we have ten paid servants besides, selected from the girls.

Miss Paterson.
Mr. Andrew
Scott.

29 Nov. 1894.

Miss Paterson. 5625. Then altogether you have an establishment of 22 paid servants and superintendents, besides the matron, to superintend the inmates?—
Mr. Andrew Scott. Yes, but one of the servants has only one arm, and other two have weak eyes, and they are kept for charity.
 29 Nov. 1894.

5626. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) What do you think those girls who leave before the 18 months are up would do if they knew there was another institution to which they could be sent and detained compulsorily?—(Mr. Scott.) I think they would remain with us voluntarily. [Witnesses then withdrew.]
 29 Nov. 1894.

Rev. Dr. John Smith.

The Rev. JOHN SMITH, D.D., Broughton Place United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Rev. Dr. John Smith.

5627. (By the Chairman.) You do not represent the United Presbyterian Presbytery?—No; I was asked to come up as I have had special experience of mission work in the Canongate. We have a very large mission there, and I was requested to give what evidence I could, based on our special experience.

5628. You have seen a great deal of drunkenness in the city?—Yes. What justified me in coming here was that in our mission work, we have a very successful temperance meeting weekly, at which we took about 2,500 pledges last year. We follow these meetings up by visitation, so that the men are surrounded by good influences after taking the pledge. We are thankful that a considerable number are finally rescued.

5629. But that is a matter which we cannot legislate for or make effective by any recommendations?—But the important fact that bears on your inquiry is, that while we naturally give prominence to the moral and spiritual aspect of this grave evil, yet ever and anon we find that certain people seem to come under a craving that they cannot control, and we feel that for the time they have passed from under our influence, and have ceased to be able to control themselves in the slightest degree. The cases we know at the present time as in abject subjection to this crave are pitiable.

5630. And you think they should be confined?—We have been forced by these facts to think that they do need to be sequestered for some time.

5631. There are three sorts of habitual drunkards?—The quasi criminals, the non-criminals who go voluntarily into retreats, and those whom it is proposed to put in at the instance of their friends, and who again may be divided into those who can pay and those who cannot. Have you any suggestions to make regarding any of these classes?—We have some of the criminal classes coming to us, but my workers believe that 60 per cent. of the habitual drunkards they have to deal with, have never been inside a police cell, and the larger number of those who would require to be put into a place of confinement, are people who could not pay for themselves.

5632. How are they to be supported?—We think it is a work for municipalities. These people have passed beyond the power of self-control, and require to be looked after, and our feeling is that municipalities should provide retreats, such as industrial farms.

5633. Something of the nature of the German labour colony?—Yes, that is our idea.

5634. Would you apply the same system to the quasi criminal class?—Yes, the necessity is even greater there. We have all felt the difficulty of limiting the liberty of the subject, but a great many of these people are such abject slaves to this drink crave, that that consideration need not have any force.

5635. Do you think that public opinion in Scotland on this question is riper than in other parts of the kingdom?—Yes; and I believe that among the class concerned it is also ripe. I had rather a remarkable instance of that. My missionary who had large experience in Glasgow before coming here, had a meeting of a hundred of these men one night in our reading-room, the greater proportion of them being drunkards in process of reformation. He informed them that your Committee was about to visit Edinburgh, and he put the matter before the men themselves. They had a very interesting discussion upon it, and although a few of them were at first inclined to resent the idea of confinement—just from the feeling that it was an interference with the liberty of the subject—yet the feeling in favour of it was very striking, and they came to a unanimous finding that it was absolutely necessary, in view of all the circumstances, that there should be compulsory confinement. One man at that meeting left Calcutta 15 years ago with several thousand pounds as his share of a business in which he was engaged there.

5636. Your conclusion is that four months' abstinence generally restores the mental balance?—Yes; and when a year has passed, we have strong confidence in their standing. One important point is the revival or formation of habits of industry and the awakening of self-respect, and this may take longer than the killing of the drink crave.

5637. What process would you adopt to secure committals?—As the power sought would amount to an apparent abridgement of liberty, and might possibly be abused, proof should be led before a competent authority that for at least six months the person in regard to whom action is taken had been in this drunken condition—security being taken that the evidence is unbiased and conclusive.

5638. You argue, from your experience in the Canongate, that about a year's enforced abstinence would go a great way to bring about recovery?—That is our conviction.

5639. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Your experience is entirely derived from persons who took the pledge?—Yes, through our mission work.

5640. You seem to have got very good results?—Yes, and we are thankful for them. But every now and again we are brought into contact with cases where we feel we are really helpless, and where confinement for a year or so would have the best results.

5641. Do the people to whom you refer recognise the fact that their will is gone?—Yes.

5642. And they would be grateful for the opportunity of being shut up?—Well, they would be grateful afterwards, although they might resent it at the time if under the influence of the drink. To show the greatness of the need I may mention that there is a man we have just now who has been about a year with us. He has been a good workman and had saved a little money. His wife got a saw, cut open his trunk, and went off to Glasgow with all his money. She is entirely hopeless, and is at present living in an Edinburgh brothel.

5643. Do you think those habitual drunkards would voluntarily submit to detention?—I am afraid we would require power to compel detention on an adequate representation by their friends. I quite see the difficulty of over-riding the personal liberty of the subject, and of course compulsory detention might be used for a wrong purpose. There are those who have periodical fits of drinking, and I think it would be wrong to put them in these institutions. There are people who go on the spree for a week or a fortnight, but who have reserves of character which pull them up, and for weeks or months they keep all right, and I think it would be wrong to confine them.

5644. (By the Chairman.) Is it not the fact that these people in their spree might do as much mischief as others who had been drinking for five years?—Yes; but our view is that with them we ought to exhaust the moral and spiritual means before resorting to any invasion of the liberty of the subject.

5645. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Are you hopeful that your labour colony might be made self-supporting?—I think so. I have been much interested by the labour colony in Germany, and I think it is self-supporting.

5646. (By the Chairman.) There are two sorts of

Rev. Dr. John

labour colonies in Germany—those maintained by charity, to which people go voluntarily, and regarding which we have had a certain amount of evidence—but we have had no evidence regarding another class which I understand exist, and to which people are compulsorily sent for a definite period. Have you any information regarding these?—No.

5647. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Which sex is the more prone to drunkenness?—I think women.

5648. About what age do you find habitual drunkenness appear?—Sometimes very young, but I could not give an opinion on that point.

Rev. Professor Blaikie.
Rev. G. D.
Low.

The Rev. Professor W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., and the Rev. G. D. LOW, M.A., Fountainbridge Free Church, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

5652. (By the Chairman, to Professor Blaikie.) You are delegates from the Edinburgh Free Presbytery?—Yes.

5653. And you wish to convey their views on the subject of our inquiry?—Yes, both as to the disease and the remedy.

5654. What are the views you are instructed to lay before us?—I would like to represent to the Committee our strong sense of the appalling evil with which you have to deal. The Free Presbytery of Edinburgh have been led to take a very special interest in the class of people among whom this disease most commonly prevails—the working-classes of the town. From the days of Dr. Chalmers a very special interest has been shown in that class of the community, and Dr. Chalmers set up the West Port Church and left it as a legacy to his brethren to pay particular attention to that class of people, and we have eight or nine of these churches built in different parts of the town. Every congregation has a mission to that class of people, and in this way we have been more fully brought into contact with them. We believe, however, that in all classes of society—the upper as well as the lower—this evil prevails. In regard to the particular remedy which the Committee is considering, I may say that we have a very strong conviction that something of the nature of compulsory power for the detention of offenders of that kind is necessary. It is our unanimous and strong opinion that the means at present available for dealing with such cases are quite inadequate. They are the most distressing cases we could have, creating as they do so much misery and sin on every side. When persons come to us, as they sometimes do, the wife as well as the husband, and ask us whether anything can be done to remove the party from temptation, we are obliged to say that there is no power in the law to confine them—that we are quite helpless in the matter.

5655. Have you worked out the form that compulsion should take, or do you represent the Presbytery only in advocating compulsion generally?—In some respects we have a strong opinion in regard to matters of detail. For example, we have the opinion that the 5649. You think the municipalities should support these Homes?—Yes.

5650. Suppose that at present one or both of the parents is habitually addicted to drink, who looks after the family? Are they thrown on the Parochial Board?—If the wife were put into one of these Homes, the husband—the bread-winner—would be able to provide for the family all the better because he was free from the incubus of his drunken wife.

5651. Do you think the municipalities would care to undertake this additional burden?—I have always been inclined to think so. [Witness then withdrew.]

Rev. Dr. John
Smith.

29 Nov. 1894.

period of detention should not be limited to 12 months, but should be left optional, and that the length of time should be regulated by the medical gentlemen. From experience, and from knowledge of the inveterate nature of the disease in so many cases, we think that 12 months is too short a limit. In regard to details, I think that generally our views might be expressed in the Bill drafted by the late Mr. Charles Morton. In the main I think the provisions of that Bill are such as we would probably assent to, only that Mr. Morton limited the period of confinement to 12 months, and of that we disapprove, but generally speaking, I think the scheme which he drafted is suitable and right. I may say that we are strongly of opinion, that at the beginning of any movement of this sort, it is only the most scandalous cases that should be dealt with. If you were to propose to take up every case to which the term habitual drunkard might apply, great difficulties would arise. Take the most scandalous cases first, and then extend the scheme.

5656. The Rev. Mr. Low, in reply to the Chairman, said:—I corroborate generally what has been said by Professor Blaikie. I am in touch with the working-classes and know the district in which I work, and I am satisfied that the case presented by Professor Blaikie commends itself to me and my brethren.

5657. (Professor Blaikie.) I wish to add with reference to a suggestion that has been made, that the churches might be expected to bear some part of the expense, that it is the mind of the Free Church Presbytery that they do not recognise that as a burden which should be laid on the churches, and for obvious reasons.

5658. (The Chairman.) As a committee we could make no recommendation to lay any burden of that sort on any church. If the churches chose to contribute to any such scheme, that is another matter.—(Professor Blaikie.) I have no doubt the churches would be very desirous to help any such movement; and if the bread-winner had to be confined, the churches would have more scope in looking after his family. [Witnesses then withdrew.]

Sir Douglas
MacLagan.

Sir DOUGLAS MACLAGAN, M.D., Professor of Medical Jurisprudence, and President of the Royal Society, Edinburgh.

Sir Douglas
MacLagan.

5659. (By the Chairman.) You are Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in the University of Edinburgh?—Yes.

5660. And are a late President of the Royal College of Physicians?—Yes.

5661. And you are at present President of the Royal Society?—Yes.

5662. I understand you have some decided views as to the non-deterrent effect of short sentences on habitual offenders?—I have long had very decided views on that point. I think that short sentences are not only useless but injurious. For example, in the case of fellows who get tipsy, and are brought up and sentenced to five days' imprisonment. The first day they are not of much use, not having got rid of their debauch; the next day they are able to take their porridge; and the next day they are fresh, and then when sent out of jail they are just ready to go back to the public-house again.

5663. Would you propose long sentences?—No; my disposition would be to abolish the fines; but that is a fiscal question.

5664. Yes, but we would like to have your views on it?—I think that when these offenders are merely punished by fines, it does not do much good, for very often these fines are paid by their friends and chums. What I would be disposed to do, would be to substitute for the fines the recording of convictions, and after the same individual had a certain number of convictions against him, I would have him sent to something analogous to penal servitude.

5665. But the fines are regarded as convictions?—Yes, I understand that.

5666. Would you apply that in the case of all the petty offenders we are inquiring into?—Yes. I would place small thefts and so forth in the same category.

5667. You don't mean that they should get penal

Sir Douglas
Maclagan.
29 Nov. 1894.

servitude?—I mean that they should be put in prison and made to work, so as to create in them a desire after better things if possible. Let the detention be for two or three years, according to the number of convictions. I would fix a limit, and when they have reached that limit in the way of convictions I would say the punishment was no longer to be 5s. or 30 days by the magistrate, but they should be placed in confinement of some kind and made to work.

5668. Take the case of the habitual drunkard. We have been told that a great number of respectable working-men get drunk every pay-day, and return to their work on the Monday?—I have no doubt there will be some, but I cannot speak as to them.

5669. Magistrates and Chief Constables have both protested against any such severe measures for that class?—But I think if what I propose were held over them in terrorem it would have a good effect in keeping them right. If they came to recognise that two more convictions or so would result in their being confined, and kept from their ordinary work altogether, they would begin to see that it was a serious matter.

5670. There is another difficulty. In Glasgow, where there are a number of different Courts they have no reliable record of the number of convictions?—I do not see that there should be much difficulty there.

5671. We have asked the opinion of a great number of persons as to the definition of an habitual offender. One man says three convictions in one year, another six in a lifetime, another ten in three years, and so on. Where would you draw the line?—It is not easy to do so, but I think seven times convicted of being drunk and incapable within a year or two years would be sufficient.

5672. But a drunkard sometimes mixes up his crimes?—I think drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly, might be all classified together.

5673. Assuming a man had a certain number of convictions for that class of crime, how would this plan suggested to us work—that the police should bring him up before the sheriff on a petition that he be pronounced an habitual offender, and that then he should be relegated to some reformatory institution?—According to my view, I do not think you would require to have any petition of that sort. I think his seven convictions, or whatever number should be decided upon, should in themselves be sufficient to justify his detention.

5674. As to that confinement, would you have it in prison?—I would rather not have it in prison. I would prefer to have them away on some of our moorland counties—such as Drumshoreland Moor or Carnwath Moor—to reclaim that land. At first some of the prisons might be utilised for their detention.

5675. In the matter of habitual drunkenness, you have, as a Medical Jurist, some well-defined and weighty opinions on the connection between drunkenness and disease?—Clearly.

5676. How far is drunkenness to be treated as a vice and how far as a disease?—I think habitual drunkenness comes to be a disease. They have lost the power of self-control.

5677. And they require a long period to allow the tissues to resume their normal state?—Yes. I do not think a short sentence, as at present, is of any use. It is like opium-eating; you cannot restrain it by a period of only six months' abstinence.

5678. Is there much opium-eating in Edinburgh?—I could not give you any statistical or reliable information on that point, as it is very much done sub rosa.

5679. You are aware that there has been a tentative Act in force for a considerable number of years, the object of which was to provide means of detention for people who were willing to submit voluntarily?—Yes.

5680. And you think the time has come for giving wider powers?—Yes. A great deal of good has been done by the Dalrymple Home, but you cannot place any reliance on a person shut up for only a twelve-month.

5681. Would you prolong the period of detention to any definite time?—It is very difficult to say how soon a man could get better.

5682. Would you have the power of detention to extend till a cure was effected without having any limit of time?—Yes, I think so.

5683. I presume medical opinion in such a case would not be worth more than that of anybody else?—No; it is the observation of those who go about the person which is of most use.

5684. Have you ever looked into the Edinburgh Home, called Queensberry House?—Yes, and I have known several cases in it.

5685. Have you known any satisfactory results?—I cannot say. It has generally been through getting people shut up that I have come to know of the cases.

5686. Do you know of any cases in which a cure has been effected?—I don't like to state any particulars in regard to points on which I am not sure.

5687. Is there any other point with reference to the Inebriates Act which you would like to bring before us?—No, I have nothing else.

5688. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think it is absolutely necessary to have convictions in order to have a man detained as an habitual drunkard?—I think a judgment by the magistrates is a necessity.

5689. But are there not a great number of cases of people who never come before the magistrates at all?—Of course there are.

5690. How do you propose to get at them to bring them under this detention scheme?—I do not know that we can do so. They are unfortunately poisoning and killing themselves, but they are doing so in private, and it is not offensive to the public.

5691. But they are dangerous to others?—No doubt of that. But if they are showing a tendency to that, in a great proportion of the cases the attention of the police would be called to them.

5692. You do not think a medical certificate is essential or even advisable?—No, I do not think it is. It is throwing upon the medical profession an undesirable burden. I would let it rest on the convictions and the legal evidence brought before the magistrates.

5693. You attach great importance to work?—Most certainly. It is of great importance to try and get them brought to work habitually, so as to make them feel that there is some satisfaction and pleasure in the work done, and thus wean them away from their drunken tendencies.

5694. Do you prefer any particular kind of work?—Not at all; it must be adapted to the individual.

5695. Do you think agricultural work better than indoor work?—I would have open-air work as far as possible.

5696. You say habitual drunkenness is a disease?—It is generally a vice at the beginning, but it ultimately merges into a disease.

5697. Do you consider any particular form of medical treatment of any use?—Not the slightest.

5698. Not by drugs?—How can drugs, which act on the physical system of a man, strengthen his enfeebled will? I think these attempts to cure people by drugs are most mischievous.

5699. But I think the theory of drugs is to give a person such a disgust at drink that he will not touch it?—Well, we must go back a bit and see the effects of that. Tartar emetic used to be put in the drink of people until they got sick of it, but that ended in a woman poisoning her husband, and she was tried for it at Bolton.

5700. Your treatment would be moral and not physical?—Yes. The chief medical treatment is to keep the man in good health so that he can work.

5701. You would leave the period of detention to the medical attendant?—It is difficult to say. I would not care to give the medical attendant a voice in fixing the period of seclusion. I think it should be the magistrate who should fix that.

5702. Would the medical man not be the proper person to say whether a person was cured or not?—I do not know that he could do so better than any ordinary intelligent man. He could tell whether he was ill, but not whether he was cured of drink.

Maclagan.

Sir Douglas MacLagan.

5703. Would you have much faith in the probabilities of cure in cases in which structural alterations have taken place in the brain through drink?—It is very difficult to say what changes have taken place in the brain through drink. Of course, if there is organic mischief being done, you will probably never get that man strong again.

5704. Do you think the entire abolition of will-power in those cases is a moral or physical condition?—It is difficult to say what changes are taking place in the cells of the brain. I would not like to commit myself on that point. Certainly we must hold that there are physical changes going on in the brain in cases of insanity, for example, and why not in other minor forms of want of power and so forth?

5705. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you think the medical and scientific mind of the country is prepared for legislation to restrain these people?—From conversations I have had, I think they are quite disposed to adopt the view that some such step as I have suggested is advisable.

5706. From your position as medical officer to the Prison Commissioners, you are familiar with the various classes generally confined in the prison?—Yes.

5707. And you see these specimens of other habitual offenders besides the pure drunkard and person who commit breaches of the peace?—Yes.

5708. What, for instance, would you do with habitual prostitutes?—I think it would be a very proper thing to treat them as the other offenders—lock them up. Of course that infers that you must have another establishment for them.

5709. In regard to the period of their detention, would you make any difference between them and the others?—No; I would not have a short period of confinement for them any more than for the others.

5710. What would be your minimum period?—What is the use of the minimum? They would just go back to their old life. I think it is more difficult to overcome that evil than drink.

5711. What would you do with the confirmed vagrant?—If he is not doing any harm, but is a quiet, peaceable fellow, going about mending pots and pans, I don't know what you would do with him, except to get his children put to school.

5712. Would you provide shelter along the road for him?—That is a question of public economy which is rather serious.

5713. (By Miss Stevenson.) You say you would have a man shut up on evidence of having been frequently convicted of drunkenness?—Yes.

5714. But in Edinburgh, under the Edinburgh Police Act, a man can be drunk and incapable a hundred times in the year, and not come under the notice of the police, so long as he has a friend to take care of him?—I think that Police Act would require to be modified. I would take away his friend, and then you would see whether he was capable or not.

5715. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think that inebriety should be in any way identified with lunacy? That is a very nice question.

5716. Would not a drunkard prefer to be thought a drunkard, rather than a lunatic, owing to the social and civil disabilities which attach to lunacy?—I have no doubt of it.

5717. So that it would be a mistake to identify inebriety with lunacy?—There unfortunately still remains in the public mind, some idea of vice in connection with lunacy, and that it is something to be ashamed of. There is nothing more to be ashamed of in it than of a relative suffering from typhoid fever.

5718. Regarding those cases of habitual drunkenness that do not come under the cognisance of the police, but which sometimes culminate in murderous assault, who should take the initiative?—The Act should be amended, so as to allow the police to haul such persons up before the magistrate, seven times or so, and then they could be dealt with like the other cases.

5719. But in fixing seven, ten, or twelve times as the number of convictions, you would have some regard to the period of intermission between the different offences?—Yes; the judge would decide that on the rules of common sense. You would hardly call a man an habitual drunkard who had been found by the police incapable twice in a twelvemonth or two years.

5720. Is prostitution not closely identified with habits of inebriety?—There is a great question there. I have a strong opinion that inebriety in connection with prostitution, is not a cause, but an effect. That these girls get into drunken habits to drown their own wretched lives. A young girl does not begin to tittle and then become a prostitute, but having begun as a prostitute, she is then easily induced to drown her cares in liquor.

5721. But the end is the same, whether from prostitution or liquor?—Yes.

5722. Do you think inebriety is more common among women than men?—I cannot answer that. I have seen it in women among all classes of society, but very little in the upper classes.

5723. Regarding vagrants, you think many of the nomadic tribe are picturesque objects in rural life, and as such you have no desire to put them into confinement?—If he is a thief he comes out of the category of honest people, but if he is an honest fellow he is doing no harm.

5724. In regard to the severity of punishment, you simply look upon it as seclusion, and not otherwise?—Yes, simply to keep them under the thumb of the law. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mrs. Lockhart.

Mrs. LOCKHART, called and examined.

Mrs. Lockhart.

5725. (By the Chairman.) What position do you occupy?—I am honorary-secretary of the Brownland Home, Peeblesshire.

5725A. How many inmates have you?—We can receive 12 women.

5726. And the object of your Home is the treatment of inebriate women?—Yes.

5727. How long has the Home been in existence?—Since March 1876.

5728. And how many people have you passed through it in that time?—We have had altogether 190 people.

5729. And with what result. I mean do you trace your patients after they leave the Home?—Yes, we try to keep up correspondence with them as far as possible. So far as our information goes, there are 78 women who have been quite reformed.

5730. The women come in voluntarily I suppose?—Yes, we have no legal power whatever to detain them.

5731. And may we take it that the majority are sent in by friends who are the purse bearers?—Yes; the friends have to meet the expenses. But we cannot receive a woman unless she is willing to come, because, as I have said, we have no legal power.

5732. But is it not so, that sometimes friends are able to put very great compulsion on the subjects?—That is quite true, but all the same we find it very difficult to get the patients to come into the Home. As bearing upon this, I may say that in 1891 the number of applications was 34, and the admissions 8; in 1892 the number of applications was 30, and the admissions 12; in 1893 the number of applications was 29, and the admissions were 7; and during this present year—since 1st January I mean—I have had 29 applications, and only four women have agreed to come, and one of them, that is the fourth, goes to-day.

5733. Applications may mean simply that inquiries have been made?—Yes; they get copies of the rules, and they inquire whether we have a vacancy, and whether we can take the women, giving at the same time

Mrs. Lockhart, some details of the case. But our great difficulty is that the women won't come; in other words, they won't agree to give up their liberty for the period necessary.

5734. And what is the period that you require?—We require the women to remain with us 12 months.

5735. And do the women stay with you for that time?—Well, sometimes we fail to get them to stay.

5736. How many of your 190 cases have stayed?—We have had 12 women who have remained over a month, and less than three months; 11 for three months and less than six months; 31 for six months, and less than nine; 17 for nine and less than twelve; 56 for twelve and less than eighteen. Our largest number have come and stayed for over a year. For eighteen months and for less than two years we have had 16; and for over two years we have had seven. But these are exceptional cases, for we do not profess to keep the women for over two years, although we sometimes do so to oblige friends.

5737. When the patients are in the Home do you take them out at all—do they get out in charge of yourself or of any one?—At the Home we have a matron and her husband, and over and above, the ladies of the Committee visit the Home. The Home, as you may be aware, is in Peeblesshire, six miles from the town of Peebles, and the ladies visit it monthly, and sometimes more frequently.

5738. But I was asking about the liberty of the patient?—Yes; they are allowed to go about within sight of the Home. I should say that we have a little croft with a good bit of ground about it, and during the summer months the women sit out a great deal, for we like to have them in the open air as much as possible.

5739. How then do you employ them?—All of them must do the house work, they take their share of that, and besides they do needlework and knitting.

5740. Do they pay for their keep?—We make a charge, but it is only 7s. a week, 1s. a day.

5741. And as to your rules, have you got a copy of them?—I have, but I should point out that in the copy of the rules given in, it says that we are willing to receive a patient for six months. We have now departed from that. We find that having them for six months is of very little use indeed; in fact, they generally do very poorly, until the first six months is past. There seem to be periodical attacks of craving for stimulants. On the other hand women who have remained for a year and upwards have done very much better than the others.

5742. You have no very highly paying patients?—Well, we have lately been charging a little more for those who are not able to do their full share of the work. We have in three cases asked for a higher rate and we have received it.

5743. What class of women then do you receive?—The Home professedly is for the wives of working men, but during the history of the institution we have had in it a colonel's wife, a minister's wife, a sheriff's daughter, and frequently governesses and well-educated women.

5744. Do they all go into the Home for 1s. a day? Yes, they have done so until recently, when we have charged a little higher rate for those who are not able to take their full share of the work. Formerly we did not charge for medical attendance or expenses, or for medicines, but lately we have made a rule giving us power to make such charges.

5745. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you mean an extra charge?—Yes. I should say we did so because we found that the women were very unreasonable in their wish to see the doctor, and besides we have to bring him a distance of six miles, each visit costing us 15s.

5746. (By the Chairman.) I see that you require all monies to be given into the matron's charge, and letters and parcels to be examined by her?—Yes, everything by our rules is open to the matron, but she does not enforce the rules in this respect. She knows the women, and she does not enforce these provisions in cases where she finds she can trust the patients. At the same time we find the rule necessary.

5747. I see from the rules that the women are not allowed to receive or to pay visits, or to take walks outside the grounds of the Home without permission. —That is according to the rules, but if permission is asked by visitors, it is granted as a rule.

5748. Then, again, I see that each woman—I am looking at the rules—is also expected to take her part in the work of the Home, washing included?—Yes, that is our rule.

5749. And there is this further rule, I notice, that smoking and snuffing are prohibited. Is there any special reason for that. The reason is that we found some of the patients addicted to these habits, and we thought there ought to be a provision of the kind.

5750. Quite so. May I call your attention to another rule—it is that 'friends are requested not to send in sweets to the patients'? For what object is that rule laid down?—It was formulated because we found that sweets were sent which contained alcohol and stimulants of various kinds.

5751. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Morphine?—Yes, morphine, and also alcohol. We found such things enclosed in letters, and that is the reason why the matron has power, should she see fit, to open patients' letters.

5752. (By the Chairman.) How many weeks do you require should be paid in advance?—We require that the first quarter should be paid in advance, and after that the money may be paid quarterly or monthly, as it suits the people themselves. Of course it saves a little trouble if it be paid quarterly. Our reason for liking it paid quarterly is that it gives us a hold over the women; we can tell them that if they leave within three months their friends will lose the amount they have paid.

5753. Yours is a purely philanthropic Home?—Yes.

5754. How does the matter work out financially?—Well, of course when the Home is full, it proportionately costs less than when there are not the maximum number of patients in it. Last year, for example, when the Home was full most of the year, it cost about £35 per woman.

5755. And the amount which you get—£26 is it. No; we get £18, 4s. from the friends; that is 7s. a week.

5756. So that the maintenance of the patient costs twice as much as you receive?—Yes.

5757. And how do you make up the difference?—By subscriptions.

5758. Have you any reserve property or anything of that kind?—No.

5759. Do you find any difficulty in keeping up the subscriptions?—No, we gather them from among our own friends. The ladies who form the Committee have no difficulty in raising the money.

5760. You speak of having effected 78 cures out of 190 patients? How long do you follow the women after they leave you?—Some of them we have followed right down to their death; and some of them we are at the present time corresponding with. Many of them have been entirely reformed; some of them have made a few slips.

5761. Well, take a specific case—that of the Colonel's wife we shall say?—Yes; here was an exceptional case, because her husband was given to drinking too. They had been in India for many years, and there she had formed the habit. She came into the Home by the wish of her friends. I was very averse to take her, simply because she was a lady, and the Home was not intended for such. Her husband, however, had commuted a portion of his income, and she came for a period of 22 months into the Home. She left this institution six years ago, and she is now living in B ———, and has done splendidly.

5762. She did not go back to her husband then?—Yes, she did.

5763. And does her husband still take drink?—Yes.

5764. She has held out notwithstanding?—Yes.

5765. Was she a very bad case before she came to your Home?—I believe so.

Mrs. Lockhart. 5766. You told us, too, that you had among your cases that of a sheriff's daughter?—I think she is dead now. At least we have lost sight of her.

29 Nov. 1894.

5767. Was hers a satisfactory case?—No, not very.

5768. Then you said that a number of governesses had passed through your hands?—Yes. A number of these have done well. One particular case I recall where the patient was with us for 20 months. She afterwards got a place in a family of Friends, and we know that her case was very satisfactory.

5769. How do you treat the women. Do you give them any stimulants when they first come to you?—No, we stop all stimulants when they come to the Home.

5770. You never give them any at all?—No.

5771. Do you try to induce the women to take the pledge before they leave you?—We try to show them the desirableness of their taking it. We tell them that no real friend will ask them to take stimulants if they say that they are abstainers.

5772. Do most of them take the pledge then?—A great many of them do. As to their keeping it, that depends very much on their surroundings when they get back to their own homes. I have in my mind the case of a woman from Glasgow. After doing well in the Home she returned to Glasgow. Her husband was awaiting to meet her at the station there, and the first thing he did on her arrival was to propose that they should go to the refreshment room and drink to her return. She declined, and was very indignant, and there was rather a row at the station. She would not take the drink, however, and, as a matter of fact, she remained an abstainer until her death. She did very well indeed.

5773. You mention a great disproportion between the number you receive and the number of applications made to you, and I think you say that that results from the rules which do not appear to suit many people?—Yes; we find that many women object to come for a year. They will come for a month, or for six months or so, but when we speak of a year they won't listen to us.

5774. Do you find many cases in which the husband says to his wife 'you must either go to the Home or 'you must leave my house.' We have not found many husbands who take up that position.

5775. We found in connection with another institution of the same kind, the case of an inmate who complained bitterly that her husband had got her to go in for a month, and had afterwards insisted on her remaining for a much longer time?—In our case we get them to agree before they come. We have a form of agreement, and we require them to write in the period before they come to us. We have not tried to get them to come in for a shorter period and then extend it. We did not think that was quite honest.

5776. You are aware, of course, that the agreement has no legal force?—Quite; it only acts as a moral power. We find that when we can say to an inmate who does not seem inclined to remain, that she has promised to stay for such-and-such a period, that has undoubtedly a power.

5777. Do you find that this provision requiring a sum to be paid on account of the board of an inmate, has any effect in the way of preventing them leaving without permission?—With a number it has an influence.

5778. Do you find any women coming to you and paying for their board out of their own earnings. Take the case of the governess for example?—No; I can't recall an instance.

5779. Are they all paid for by their friends, or do not women come so thoroughly of their own accord that they commit themselves to your care and themselves pay for their keep with you?—I do not at this moment remember of any woman having come to us and paid for her own board.

5780. Who paid the governesses' board?—Friends in one or two cases; in some cases the ladies in whose houses they had been. We have had several cases of servants out of noblemen's and other families where the board was paid by the families.

5781. But these women, if they had been servants before coming to the Home, could hardly have been habitual drunkards?—One case I specially recall. It was the case of a woman who had been lady's maid to a lady in London, and married the butler in the family. She took to drink years afterwards, the family kept up interest in her, and one of them came to me about her.

5782. Did this woman pull round?—She did very well indeed.

5783. Do you make the inmates of the Home work?—Well they must all take their turn at the house-work and in washing. And we supply them with needle-work, and different kinds of knitting, and indeed with what we find they can work at.

5784. In fact you try to give them as much employment as you can?—Very many of them are the wives of working men, the matron tries to make them, if possible, better wives and mothers, helping them to learn cooking, and to cut out children's clothing and such things.

5785. For a working man is 7s. a week not a big contribution?—No doubt it is. But from another point of view it is little enough for us to keep the inmates on.

5786. Please don't misunderstand me, I was not finding fault in the slightest?—Quite so, I know what you mean. 7s. a week is a good deal out of a man's wage.

5787. I suppose the husband of a drunken wife often finds her such an intolerable burden that he would do anything almost to get her into a Home?—Of course when a man sends his wife to a Home it is the last resource, after he has done everything that it was possible for him to do, and possibly the house may be empty. In the case of one woman who came to us there was not even a chair in the house.

5788. You have given us a most clear analysis of the cases so far as the time each remained in the Home was concerned. Can you give any analysis of the time the 78 cases which were cured remained in the place. I take it that they would all be in for a long term?—Not all of them.

5789. Have you any analysis?—I am afraid I cannot give you these numbers; I have no note of them here. But as to the rule and the change that was made upon it, the term was altered from six months to one year, because we found that the shorter period was very unsatisfactory.

5790. I notice that of the cases, you had 56 in the Home for over 12 and for less than 18 months?—Yes, for between 12 and 18 months.

5791. That is the biggest lot you have. How do you manage to get them to stay on so long?—A great many of them sign for a year, and many of them are quite willing to remain for the year. We make them sign for a year before they come. If we think it advisable we try to persuade them to stay in for longer than the 12 months.

5792. Speaking generally, do you find better results after a stay of 18 months than after one of 12 months?—Yes, there is a great difference. Women who have been drinking for a long time require a longer period of abstinence than do others.

5793. I see that you have had 23 cases for 18 months and over, and that you have had 7 for 2 years. Did these latter turn out all right?—Two of them did well for a time and then fell.

5794. Why did you keep these cases so long?—In the case of one woman her son had in the interval gone to Australia, and we kept the woman until it was convenient for her to be sent out. She went out to Sydney, and she has done very well ever since. The other case which I remember, that of a woman from S ———, who remained for about two years-and-a-half, and still she fell almost immediately on returning home. In five cases out of the seven I think the women have all stood fast.

5795. That is a very large result indeed. There is another point I should like to have your opinion on. I suppose a lot of women come in because they are themselves eager to get rid of the habit?—Yes, some do.

Mrs. Lockhart.
29 Nov. 1894.

Mrs. Lockhart. 5796. And there is another section forced very much to come in by friends, and without any violent personal anxiety on their own part?—Yes.

20 Nov. 1894. 5797. And do you find any decided difference between those who come in voluntarily with the wish to be cured, and those who are virtually forced to come in?—Yes, I think that there is a very decided difference.

5798. You think then that the wish is a great help?—There can be no doubt about that.

5799. What is your experience of those who come in without any wish of their own, and who are forced to come?—They just put in the time, and remain because they cannot help it.

5800. And are probably very anxious to take the first opportunity to return to their old habits?—Yes, no doubt about that.

5801. As to compulsory powers, would you say that you feel the want of further powers?—Yes, very decidedly. We feel that want continually. For instance we had two women lately, one of whom remained a year, and Sir John Cowan begged very hard that she should remain longer. But she left the home in spite of us, and she fell within a week afterwards.

5802. And what do you think became of her?—She is in Queensberry House, boarded there we believe. That woman had made up her mind that she would not stay in the Home. She came down dressed one day, and nothing would keep her.

5802a. Though you had compulsory powers in a place like yours, and a woman wanted to get out, she has only to be refractory, and then you would not care to keep her?—Yes, but I think a great many of them are refractory because they know that our powers are limited. If they knew that they had to stay, they would stay with a better grace. We have to say to a number of them who are troublesome, 'If this kind of 'thing goes on we won't keep you.' But still they know that we have little power over them.

5803. But you do not find that the women generally are refractory?—Well, we find among them some very violent women, but generally speaking, that is the result of early training.

5804. And I suppose that those very violent people you have to turn out?—We can't do anything else; we must turn them out.

5805. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You spoke, I think, about ladies of different grades of society being in the Home. Do they all associate together?—They all eat at the same table.

5806. The sheriff's daughter and the others you have told us of?—Yes; it was quite explained to them that we could make no difference—that if we received them at all, it must be on a footing of equality with the other inmates. We found that the class of women that we have to deal with are exceedingly jealous.

5807. But if you had the accommodation would you not be inclined to classify them?—Yes, I think classification would be better if it could be managed, but I have always thought that there was great difficulty in dealing with ladies.

5808. Have you formed any opinion as to the age at which women go wrong in regard to drink?—No; I could not say as to that without thinking of it. We have had women in the Home between the ages of 19 and 73. We do not think it right to refuse a case simply because the person is old. If there is a vacancy we are disposed to fill it, provided the case be a suitable one.

5809. (By Miss Stevenson.) May we assume that all the women that you receive are of respectable character so far as you know?—Yes. By our rules we do not receive a person of anything but respectable character, but at the same time we have admitted women into the Home who would not have been received had we known what afterwards transpired.

5810. In those cases, did you ever find that the women turned out satisfactory?—Yes, we have.

5811. I suppose it was not generally known among the other inmates of the Home?—No; I rather think that the matron found the circumstances out in conversation, or something led to a question being asked.

Mrs. Lockhart. 5812. And had you known you would not have received any woman whose character was not good?—We do not profess to receive any one whose character is not good.

5813. In regard to the exceptional cases you told us that you received, may I ask if you obliged them to do house work and washing? Well, the matron has that matter in her own power. The matron can give a woman the class of work that she thinks is best suited for her case. For instance, a nervous and an excitable woman would get active work as a rule.

5814. The matron then has discretion in the matter of the work to be allocated to the inmates?—Yes. In connection with the case of the Colonel's wife, I may say that she was never asked to do the washing. There was a nice feeling in the Home towards her, and the women were not jealous of her in the least.

5815. It has been suggested that any out-door kind of employment would be good for people of this sort. Have you tried that at your Home?—We have a garden attached to the House, and some of the women are fond of poultry. Then again, some of the women have taken charge of the pigs, and that too is a very good thing for them, provided they have any taste for the work.

5816. Do you try to make your poultry and your pigs remunerative?—Yes, we sell the poultry and the eggs, and we sell the surplus ham if we can.

5817. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I only ask you as to one point. Can you tell us what is actually done in the Home. What, in other words, is the order of the day?—The work is so arranged that all the women have to take their share in it. So many of them have the household work to do. Four of the whole number for instance, are engaged in doing out the rooms in the house, and then two of them are always in the kitchen. Then there are the cows to milk, and one of the women goes out and attends to them, and besides, the poultry and the pigs have to be attended to. But the work is all arranged by way of routine, and each takes her week about in the various departments of the work. The washing is fortnightly, and two of them go to it at a time. We find that we cannot send the same women to do the washing all through. Sometimes two will wash for a whole day, and at other times they may not wash for more than the half day.

5818. Do these women do all the service that is required in the establishment?—We have one servant in the kitchen. One paid servant I mean.

5819. And as to the out-door work?—Are there any men about the place?—The matron is married; and there are her husband, and a boy of 16 who helps him to look after the pony. We keep a pony.

5820. The staff then is four?—Yes; the matron, her husband, his boy, and the servant.

5821. Are things so arranged that every inmate is provided with work for the whole day?—Yes. Those that are doing needlework are expected to be down in the workroom by ten o'clock.

5822. Not before that?—No. They are at liberty to write their letters or do anything for themselves until that hour, and then they have after eight o'clock at night. We had an earlier hour once, but we altered it because we found that they did not make good use of their time.

5823. Their time is quite filled up between ten in the morning and eight at night?—They go out for a walk, and some of them will sit in the open air a great portion of the day.

5824. Do they go for a walk some distance from the house?—That depends on the weather and on their physical condition.

5825. But if the weather is good, and their physical condition is also good, how far might they go from the Home? I do not quite know. I think it is more for a stroll on the hills than for a walk on the road that they go.

5826. The house then is contiguous to the hills?—Yes, it is a pastoral country, and they can walk almost anywhere on the hills.

Mrs. Lockhart. 5827. The matron is always with them?—Either she or her husband.

29 Nov. 1894. 5828. The work that the inmates do during the time they are in the Home is for the benefit of the institution?—Yes.

5829. And the sewing-work?—Yes it also is.

5830. Do you give them any credit in money for what they do?—No, we do not, but at the same time we do not make much out of it. It is more for the sake of improving themselves and of keeping them engaged. The Home does not profit very much by it.

5831. Do you provide them with any recreation other than you have described, such as walks?—Well, they have a piano in the workroom.

5832. You have no shows, or lectures, or that kind of thing?—No; nothing of the kind. But there are some friends in the neighbourhood interested in the matter who go to visit them.

5833. Do their own friends not visit them?—Only by permission.

5834. Only when you think it desirable?—Yes; but permission is rarely refused except in exceptional instances.

5835. What do the women do on Sundays?—A certain number go to church. We have a waggonette, and four or five of them go to church every Sunday.

5836. How far off is the church?—It is four miles distant.

5837. I suppose they take their turn in going to church. And what else do they do?—There is service in the House on Sundays by the matron's husband.

5838. Is he a clergyman?—No; but he was a sort of city missionary before he came to us.

5839. (By the Chairman.) I see that all the ladies on the Board are Edinburgh ladies?—Yes, the committee is almost wholly composed of Edinburgh ladies.

5840. Do you have any local committee?—We have had some local ladies as members of the committee—the honorary treasurer lately lived in the neighbourhood. A number of local ladies however, visit at the Home, among them Lady Naismyth.

5841. Do the ladies belonging to Edinburgh visit the Home at all?—Yes; once a month, or about intervals such as that. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Malcolm M'Neill.

MR. MALCOLM M'NEILL, Secretary to the Local Government Board, called and examined.

Mr. Malcolm M'Neill.

5842. (By the Chairman.) The point upon which we wanted an opinion from the Board of Supervision—or should I say the Local Government Board—was this. We were told yesterday by a witness whom we had before us that in Berwickshire, and in Roxburghshire and Selkirkshire, there were a number of Shelter Houses maintained at the cost of the Parochial Boards, at which tramps and vagrants of all descriptions received shelter and food at the expense of the Parochial Boards. The administration of these Shelters was in certain instances, we were told, carried on by the police, who gave tickets to those who were to make use of the houses. But while we were told all this we could not get any information as to the powers that there were under the Poor Law to erect such Shelters, or how far the practice was general in Scotland, and in these circumstances we thought the best plan to get the desired information was to see you.—I may say that the Board is aware of the existence of Shelters of the class referred to in three towns. They are Jedburgh, Selkirk, and Stirling.

5843. Kelso, I think, was mentioned to us as another?—Well, there may be one in Kelso, but we do not know anything about it. It has never been brought officially under our notice. I ought perhaps to say that we have tried in every parish in Scotland, so far as lay in our power, to have Shelters established. The earliest circular issued by the Board on the subject was in 1848, three years after it was established. The object in issuing that circular was that parishes should have the means of accommodating tramps, or even residents in the parish who happened at the moment to have no residence of their own, and for the time became paupers.

5844. We understand, for instance, that in Edinburgh and in Glasgow, if a person applied for parochial relief he or she had first to be examined by the Medical Officer in order whether he or she was not able-bodied, and that the certificate of non-able-bodiedness was considered as a preliminary to relief, whereas in these Shelters relief is given indiscriminately?—That is an abuse complained often about. In some cases the Shelters—that in Jedburgh among others—are administered only through the police; and the Inspector of Poor, though he has to maintain the Shelter, has no knowledge of the cases.

5845. Does that apply to Jedburgh and to Kelso?—I think so. I have brought with me all the circulars issued by the Board on the subject, and the last which is instructive and is dated 1887. It is addressed to Inspectors of Poor in Scotland. The circular says:—

'Instances having recently occurred in which vagrants, suffering from disease or injury, have been relieved by Inspectors with money which has enabled them to leave the parish and to proceed to another parish where applica-

'tion for relief is again made, the Board deem it necessary to point out the impropriety and irregularity of such a mode of procedure.'

They were helped along from parish to parish by money doles.

5846. (The Chairman.) The object being, I suppose, on the part of each parish to get rid of them?

5847. (Witness.) Yes, we assumed so. The circular proceeds:—

'In some cases the vagrants have proceeded on their journey, till, wholly disabled, they have at length become finally chargeable to the parish where their final breakdown took place, and have even died within a few days. The Board desire to call the attention of all inspectors to the inhumanity of this practice as regards the applicants, and to the injustice as regards the parish in which the ultimate chargeability takes place. Cases are not uncommon in which, if timely shelter, food, rest, and medical attendance were supplied, a few days' detention would restore the wayfarer's health, and enable him to proceed to his destination.'

I may say that I have one particular case in my mind—that in which a vagrant proceeded from Clackmannanshire to Stirling, and died within two days of getting there. I ought to read the rules which in that circular the Board prescribed.

'(1) The applications must be fully recorded in the Record of Applications, and in column 12 of Form A (or the corresponding line of the Alternative Form B) the alleged or apparent disablement must be specified.

'(2) If the medical officer resides within easy reach of the Inspector's office he must be consulted without delay; and in any event a certificate in the annexed form should, if possible, be obtained from him within 24 hours, and must be preserved.'

'(3) Meantime the applicant must be suitably accommodated in a lodging-house or in a casual sick house or poorhouse.'

'(4) No relief in money shall in any case be given.'

[Such were the rules that the Board laid down for dealing with such vagrants as alleged sickness or disablement and appeared to be in need of medical advice. Appended to the circular is a form of medical certificate such as is referred to in it.]

5848. 'You spoke of a casual sick house.' What exactly does that mean?—That is the building that the Board has been trying to have provided in every parish in Scotland.

5849. That is the Shelter spoken of before?—Yes, only it is constructed under a different system, and is only for the accommodation of the casual sick. Of course, if a pauper alleges neither sickness nor disablement, he is not a proper object of relief. The Inspector in such a case has no right to give relief; but, on the other hand, there are cases in which he is obliged to give relief.

5850. Can you give us any particulars as to the Shelter Houses in Kelso and in Jedburgh?—Perhaps the Committee had better let me send them a copy of the report of our inspecting officer on this Shelter in Jedburgh, which report is most condemnatory. I was aware of the state of matters many years ago, for Jedburgh was in my own district, and I then frequently remonstrated against it, but the Municipal Authorities would not give way, because, as was said, they objected to these able-bodied beggars going about the town at night.

5851. But surely the Municipal Authorities had nothing to do with the relief?—Oh no, but they had to do with the police who took charge of the shelters and of the vagrants sent there.

5852. And is there no provision which can prevent the Parochial Boards spending money on these tramps in the way you have described?—There is not, unfortunately, in Scotland. All that the Local Government Board can do is to remonstrate. They can in Scotland spend the parochial funds in entertaining themselves to dinner if they like.

5853. Can you give us some information about the casual sick houses, and the extent to which they are over the country?—I should perhaps say that at one time I had as my district the whole south of Scotland including one-half of Forfarshire, and probably about two-thirds of the parishes in the district had that provision, while some of the rest had as accommodation common lodging-houses or Poorhouses near them. It was difficult to get Parochial Boards to build shelters if they had a common lodging-house within their own parish. In some cases the casual sick house is a mere hut; in other cases they are really very comfortable. I saw a house not long since in Ecclefechan which was as clean as could possibly be, and quite a suitable place for an hospital for a single case.

5854. How then is the need place confined to the sick vagrant, and prevented from being made use of by the ordinary tramp?—That of course rests with the Inspector of Poor.

5855. Let us take the case of that village to which you have referred? Where did the Inspector live?—He lived in the village, and quite close. But supposing that he had lived miles away, and the application was made to him. No sickness or disablement is alleged, and the man looks perfectly well. In that case the Inspector would say that he could do nothing for him.

5856. But take the case where the Inspector lives ten miles away from the village, and a tramp comes to the village pretty well used up, and wants shelter?—In that case probably the medical officer may live in the village, or some other person may be authorised to deal with individual cases. If that was the centre of the parish they would act probably just as the Inspector himself would have acted.

5857. But the practice of dealing with these people and providing them with shelter varied very greatly. For example, we were told in Glasgow that 5,300 people obtained shelter in the police offices of the city during the year?—I was not aware of that, but of course I was aware that there were such things as municipal lodging-houses.

5858. But are they not very largely filled by people who live in them permanently?—Yes; quite so.

5858A. Was Glasgow ever in your 'beat'?—Yes, for five-and-twenty years. But I never had anything to do with vagrancy in Glasgow.

5859. You were not then aware of this large number of vagrants who secured shelter at the Police Offices?—No; not in the least. The Inspectors of Poor in Glasgow never complained of vagrancy at all.

5860. But as I have mentioned we found 5,000 (odds) people were ready to sleep in the Police Office?—Of course, they would not come under my notice unless they had applied for relief as paupers. I expect that these people were never through the hands of the Poor Law Authorities at all.

5861. But as to the object of these shelters. You do not suggest them as any substitute for the English system of casual wards?—Not at all.

5862. But simply as a provision for the sick and infirm poor?—Yes. And where we find the Inspector in the habit of using them for other ends, we always remonstrate with him, and point out that the system tends to promote vagrancy. I remember a case which occurred about two years ago. In the village of Kirkpatrick-Fleming in Dumfriesshire, the Inspector said he did not know how to deal with cases of infectious disease. The village had no hospital, and the Parochial Board had no sick house. In this case the Board sent a letter which acted as a guide in similar cases. The letter runs:—

'R. B. Bureley, Esquire, 15 Inverleith Gardens. Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 28th ult. (enclosing a private communication from the Inspector of Kirkpatrick-Fleming), which has been carefully considered by the Board, I am directed to inform you that the Board are unable to accept the suggestion that the occurrence of infectious disease in the case of an applicant for relief, whether vagrant or resident, removes any part of the responsibility which rests on the Inspector of Poor. It is not enough that he should draw the attention of the Sanitary Officers to the case, but it is his duty to provide, or cause to be provided, food, lodgings, and medical attendance. When the Sanitary Officers possess the means of isolating the case, they will, no doubt, use them in the interest of the public health, and will thus enable the Inspector to deal in the best possible manner with the case under his charge; but the Inspector is primarily responsible, and cannot be permitted to evade the performance of his duty. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, MALCOLM M'NEILL.'

5863. And the Inspector would besides be criminally responsible if anything happened, and therefore we pointed out to Parochial Boards that they ought to have some kind of Shelter at command.

5864. Have you any definite information about the numbers of shelters that do exist?—I have no possible means of giving it to you. But it occurs to me that we might get it on the 1st January in this way. Each inspecting officer gets a return from his own district for his own purposes, and I can get them to add in the return a question to this effect, 'Have you a casual sick house?' But perhaps the Committee's report will be made long before we can get our replies.

5865. Not at all. The evidence won't be finished then. When will you get in such a return?—The returns are due on the 1st January—practically, they come in about the middle of January, and they are all tabulated about the middle of February.

5866. I think it would be desirable that we should have such information, and probably you desire it for your own information?—Yes, I should like to know it myself. In the case of Selkirk I think the Board has already got a report on the Shelter House there.

5867. (By Miss Stevenson.) We have had very conflicting evidence as to the powers of the Parochial Boards to detain children whom they had under their care, whether boarded-out or in the poorhouse. One thing we were told was that, under the Act of 1891, Boards had ample powers to detain children whose parents were not, in the opinion of the Board, suitable persons to act as guardians for them. But, on the other hand, we have been told that Boards have no such power, unless in a case where, the parent having claimed the custody of his children, the Board resisted that claim successfully, and brought evidence that the parent was an unsuitable person to have charge of the children.—I should not think that was right. My opinion is that the parent can claim the custody of his child from the Board at any time he chooses.

5868. Under the 1891 Act the Board can appeal to the sheriff?—No doubt, under the Industrial Schools Act a child may be committed; but I think a parent

Mr. Malcolm
M'Neill.

20 Nov. 1894.

M'Neill.

can claim the child from the custody of the Parochial Board.

5869. Under the Custody of Children Act 1889 I understand that a parent can appeal to the Court of Session—I think it is—for the custody of his children, and that, in order to resist that appeal, the Parochial Board must also appear before the Court?—We have had no experience of that Act yet.

5870. Then as to the Act of 1891. In Glasgow we had evidence from one of the Inspectors of Poor, that about three months ago the Inspectors received a circular from the Board of Supervision telling them what their powers under that Act were?—I do not recollect such a circular; but then there have been so many circulars lately.

5871. (By the Chairman.) Would it be too much to ask you to have a brief memorandum drawn up showing what are the rights of Parochial Boards in the matter of the custody of children as against the rights of parents, including the powers under the clauses of the Custody of Children Act of 1891?—Yes, I shall have that done.

5872. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it the fact that the poorhouses are emptying in Scotland?—Undoubtedly and naturally so. Parochial Boards have learned and are learning the use of the poorhouse. They do not use it for all and sundry cases as they used to do. Now-a-days Boards use the poorhouses for selected cases as suggested by the Local Government Board.

5873. Is there a tendency on the part of Parochial Boards to board-out the respectable poor?—Most unquestionably there is. Of course the Poor Law in Scotland is one of out-door, not of in-door relief, and the paupers in Scotland have always shown the greatest indisposition to use the poorhouse.

5874. Do you think the system of classification of the inmates of poorhouses—I mean speaking from your experience as an inspecting officer of the two Glasgow poorhouses, the largest in Scotland—might be extended and improved upon?—Immensely; but both the Glasgow houses are old buildings, and the construction of them does not permit of it.

5875. Do you favour a suggestion thrown on that by one of the Poor Law Inspectors that they should have power to detain for beyond three days dissolute and restless people?—That is, I think, very much required. We have cases where 50 times a year the whole thing—clothing and so on—has to be gone over again.

5876. (By the Chairman.) In Queensberry House here we came across some cases where the inmates were boarded there by parishes which had no poorhouse. Is that a common practice, or is it one that the Board approves of?—I don't think there is any objection to it. The practice is probably adopted in the case of old people who cannot find more comfortable residences. But it is purely voluntary on the part of the pauper.

5877. But would it not be a more homogeneous arrangement to require Boards that had no poorhouses to make use of the poorhouses of the Boards that had sufficient accommodation, and even spare accommodation?—We have no power to do that. No doubt there is a class of cases, the respectable friendless poor, who would be better in the poorhouse if they only knew it, but who still are content to live in the parochial lodging-house where they can come and go as they like.

5878. I do not know the extent to which this boarding system extends in Queensberry House?—Of course if any restriction is put upon these inmates it is perfectly illegal.

5879. It is said, that in the case of many inmates they are told that they must either submit to what they look upon as so long a term of imprisonment, or take 'the door' as they call it. In other words they must either stay in the house for so many months or clear out?—Yes; but let us go one step further. A man says that he won't submit any longer. He takes his discharge, and he goes to the Inspector of Poor of the City Parish here. That Inspector is bound to relieve him if he is disabled, and has to claim repayment from his own parish. The Inspector, in fact, has to go through the whole form just as if the man did not come from Queensberry House at all.

5880. That is no doubt a safe-guard. But are the paupers boarded in such an establishment as Queensberry House subject to any inspection?—No; unless there is any special complaint. The Inspectors of the Board have not the necessary time. I do not suppose that at this moment the Inspectors are aware that there are any paupers in Queensberry House. I was not aware of the fact myself until you mentioned it.

5881. We went through Queensberry House, and we discovered nine or ten of them, and I wanted to get some information as to the number of paupers boarded-out in this way, and as to the parishes that so board them out?—I am afraid I cannot be of assistance. I presume the paupers are voluntarily there.

5882. No doubt they find themselves in the position that they cannot better themselves by rebelling. We met one old lady who was very frank in her complaints.—She has only to go to the Inspector of Poor of the parish in which she is living, and he is bound to relieve her. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. J. Campbell
Irons.

MR. J. CAMPBELL IRONS, S.S.C., called in and examined.

Mr. J. Campbell
Irons.

5883. (By the Chairman.) You are a Solicitor before the Supreme Courts of Scotland?—Yes, I am.

5883A. You have, I think, made a special study of Municipal and Police Law, and have written two treatises on the subject?—That is so.

5884. You, have, been for many years a member of the committee of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor in Leith, and have for the last eight years been a member of the Edinburgh City Parochial Board?—Yes.

5885. And for the last six years Chairman of the Law Committee of the Board?—Yes.

5886. And you have during that time taken an interest in social reform questions, including the treatment of habitual drunkards and offenders?—Yes.

5887. Your attention has been called to the fact that there is a considerable and an increasing class who spend their time between the prison and the poorhouse, with an occasional holiday on tramp?—Yes. In my last work on Police Law, in the introduction, I say: 'In dealing with the suppression of vagrants and habitual offenders, much greater and more effectual remedies are urgently and immediately required. There is a considerable, and, it is feared, increasing class who spend their time between the prison and

'the poorhouse, with an occasional summer holiday 'on the highway or village common. How to deal 'with such efficiently is one of, if not the most pressing 'problems of modern times. At present, the Police 'and the Poor Law are perfectly powerless to deal 'with such a class in any remedial manner, and the 'protection which the Poor Law affords only acts 'as a sanatorium to fit such persons for becoming the 'recipients of such punishment as the Police Law 'provides.'

5888. You know that we have heard evidence about the frequency with which those vagrants go to the poorhouse and the prison?—Yes.

5889. And, with regard to habitual offenders, you hold the opinion that short sentences of imprisonment do no good?—None whatever; they are absolutely useless.

5890. In regard to vagrants, you say in your précis that 'vagrants may wander about and sleep in a barn 'or behind a hay stack, and all the police could do was 'to warn them off.' We had evidence yesterday from a police official that, under the Prevention of Crimes Act, it was quite possible to deal with vagrants for such offences as that?—Yes, when once the police have established the fact that they are vagrants; but that

Mr. J.
Campbell
Frons.

29 Nov. 1894.

is the difficulty. And what after all is the definition of a vagrant? Unless you have the Police Law remedied in some manner, whereby you have a record kept by the police of the vagrants passing through a district, you never can tell whether a man be a vagrant or an industrious working man travelling from place to place in search of work. You must discriminate between these two classes.

5891. Well, it was a Chief Constable who yesterday told us that there was no difficulty in the matter?—He must be stretching his powers under the Act then.

5892. Have you specially studied the Act in question?—No, but I am quite familiar with its terms.

5893. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is the word vagrant in it at all? I don't think so.—No; I don't think the word vagrant does occur in it.

5894. The question is rather one of trespass and lighting fires and such like things?—Yes, but that is a totally different thing from simple vagrancy.

5895. (By the Chairman.) It was trespassing you think that was referred to?—Well, that is a totally different point.

5896. But you have not paid any attention to that special point?—No, not specially.

5897. You think that with regard to beggars short imprisonment is no good?—None whatever.

5898. We found in Edinburgh prison two beggars doing 60 days?—I think that is no benefit at all, for they just do their 60 days, come out, and begin their former practices again.

5899. You say, that with regard to the offenders classed under A and B, 'the police should have greater powers, and the magistrate should be entitled, on being satisfied that they fall within the class, to sentence them for a lengthened period—say two or three years—in a house where they would be compelled to work.' Do you then propose any new institutions?—I would propose ultimately to have new institutions; but I would utilise, for example, wards in existing poorhouses, where the cases can be kept until such institutions are actually provided.

5900. And do you think it would be cheaper to support them in this manner than it is at present?—I have no doubt about it—very much cheaper and more advantageous.

5901. Then as regards habitual drunkards, do you think Retreats should be provided for them at the public expense?—Unquestionably.

5902. And who would put up the building—the rates locally or the Imperial Exchequer?—I think the rates.

5903. In the locality?—Yes, the local rates.

5904. And you would give power to the sheriff or the police magistrate on the application of friends, or on satisfactory evidence as to the habitual drinking on the part of the person, to send such person to a Retreat?—Yes, I would.

5905. For two years?—Yes.

5906. Do you not think that a shorter term would do?—Two years is the maximum that I propose.

5907. You think, too, that the property of the persons sent to a Retreat should be made responsible for his maintenance?—Yes, where the person had any estate, I think it ought to be made liable.

5908. And that a factor should be appointed in that case to manage the estate?—Yes, I think so, in a case of that kind.

5909. You say that you have made inquiries as to the mode of treating these classes of offenders in foreign countries? Have you been provided with information as to results yet.—No, I have not got satisfactory returns yet. I made a number of inquiries in some of the American States, and the American Consul has promised to send on the replies when he gets them. He has written asking for the information. Of course the treatment in Holland is well known from Mr. Wilkin's report.

5910. I think you said that you were familiar with it?—Mr. Wilkins went to Holland and made an investigation into the treatment of habitual drunkards and vagrants. There, they have a free colony, where they send these classes to for periods from six months to three years.

5911. Is it compulsory? Yes; I shall be glad to send you the pamphlet issued by Mr. Wilkins, who went to Holland to report in connection with the charity organisation in London.

5912. Do you know of any places similar to these in Holland in other countries?—No; but I think there are similar places elsewhere. I have been making inquiries, but have not been able to get the information in time.

5913. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You propose that the taxation for the maintenance and detention of inebriates and vagrants should be local?—Yes.

5914. But would there not be a danger of the vagrant class making forced marches into the district where the Homes happened to be established?—But, if you have Homes established, they must be established by a General Act applicable to the whole country, and then that difficulty would not arise. I do not propose to establish such a Home in any one place without it being done under a general statute.

5915. Would that not raise once more a fresh crop of litigations in regard to the settlement of paupers?—With regard to that you may say that now there are very few—hardly any indeed—questions to settle.

5916. But the present state of matters has only been reached after a very long and a very costly system of litigation?—But now the law is fixed once and for all.

5917. Would the difficulty of settlement not be greatly felt in regard to vagrants?—I do not think so.

5918. Would there not be much difficulty in establishing a settlement?—But we must remember that a vagrant has a settlement already. Take for example a vagrant who comes in to Edinburgh. He gets his relief here, and if he stays, or if he happens to turn sick, then the Edinburgh Parish has to find out his settlement; so that you are not increasing any difficulty in the least.

5919. You think that the difficulty would not be increased?—No; in point of fact I think you would be doing away with it. [The witness then withdrew.]

Lord
Kincairney.

LORD KINCAIRNEY, Senator of the College of Justice, called in and examined.

Lord
Kincairney.

5920. (By the Chairman.) You are one of the Lords of Session, and a Senator of the College of Justice?—I am.

5921. You have taken a great interest in the subject of vagrancy?—Yes.

5922. And especially you have studied the question in connection with a sub-committee of the Police Committee of the County of Perth in 1888, appointed to consider and report on the subject of vagrancy generally, and the proposal to have a Mendicity Society in particular?—Yes.

5923. Is Perth a county that is much frequented by vagrants?—It is very much frequented.

5924. You do not know if there are any reliable statistics as to vagrancy?—There were none at the time of which I speak.

5925. There is of course a census taken by the police now?—There was not one taken at that time; but I made inquiries during the time this sub-committee was sitting of Chief Constables in various counties.

5926. In Perthshire there are, it seems, two classes of vagrants to be dealt with—the vagrant pure and simple, and the 'tinker' class, each quite distinct from the other?—Yes; that is so, I think.

5927. In this report of the sub-committee of Perth County Police Committee, I see that vagrants are designed as tramps or wayfarers who travel from town to town, chiefly along the main roads connecting Edinburgh and Glasgow with Dundee. Some of them the report says, 'may be workmen out of employment, and 'legitimately in search of work; but these are rare 'exceptions,' and much the greater number of these vagrants are mere impostors and sturdy beggars? Does that agree with your own opinion?—That is from information received from the Chief Constables. Personally I have no knowledge of that.

5928. We were told that a very considerable percentage of these tramps were bona fide workmen?—What is stated in that report is derived from replies by Chief Constables to questions put to them. But it may be that a considerable percentage of the tramps are working men.

5929. Well then, according to this report—or rather according to the Chief Constable's report—5,973 vagrants of the first class, that is the vagrant 'pure and simple' class, of whom 502 were children, and 2,997 vagrants of the second class, tinkers, of whom no fewer than 1,148 were returned as children, were challenged within the year preceding the sitting of the sub-committee. Did you inquire what exactly 'challenged' meant?—For anything the police could tell the persons might have been challenged several times. I think that is remarked upon in the report.

5930. In the report, you mention the hardship suffered by the women and the children of vagrants, and I suppose that is especially the case among the gipsies of Perthshire. Have you made a special study of these gipsies?—Scarcely; but I know about some of them. I know about the Townies and the M'Donalds who are not mentioned in the report. I only know about them; I hardly know them. They are not very pleasant people to approach.

5931. That was not exactly what I meant. What I meant was whether, as a resident in Perthshire, you had heard many complaints as to depredations committed by these gipsies?—No; certainly not. We would be glad to have your testimony as to that, because we have been told by one witness that the gipsies were a perfect nuisance in the place, and this witness to whom I have referred conceived that it would be necessary to adopt the most stringent measures to get rid of them. I am speaking now about the gipsies?—Yes, I myself mean the gipsies. I think that the great objection to them is mainly connected with the way they bring up their children to habits of idleness. They are also objectionable because they are very much given to drink, and also because they prey upon the smaller cottars.

5932. That is a very important point. Any other ground of objection?—They are also objectionable in so far as they may be the means of carrying and spreading infectious disease. I may in that connection mention one particular case that came under my notice, where one of them went to a poorhouse suffering from typhus fever. His disease turned out to be that and the matron's daughter took it—and that is a disease almost stamped out. But further, I may say that I do not think that these gipsies are altogether idle. The Townies, for example, make baskets, and they seem to work a good deal, and most of the other ones do a considerable amount of farm work at various times; and I think it requires to be considered that they afford cheap labour to farmers when labour is not to be had otherwise, and in these depressed times of agriculture that requires to be taken into consideration.

5933. You have not heard complaints to the effect that the farmers had to afford the gipsies cheap hens?—No; not of the people that I heard about. I just heard of a case the other day in which a farmer allowed them to camp upon his place, and his daughter went down and saw them, and lent them books.

5934. You mentioned, however, that they preyed on the smaller cottagers?—I meant by begging, not by stealing.

5935. Not masterful begging?—No; by their importunity.

5936. There is a power, is there not, which provides for getting rid of them if they encamp on any place without the consent of the tenant?—Yes, under the Vagrancy Act.

5937. Would you say that the Act is sufficient to deal with these cases?—I do not think that it is very much applied to these people. It is applied a great deal to tramps who go about and sleep out at farm steadings and the like. I doubt if it is applied much, Lord Kincaidney. if at all, to the case of those gipsies who encamp in various places in considerable numbers. At least I have not observed that it is. 29 Nov. 1894.

5938. You say in your report that those connected with the police are generally agreed that it would be very beneficial—and in fact, the most effectual measure against vagrancy—if the clauses 331 and 332 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act 1862, were extended to counties, thus giving the police powers to apprehend all persons conducting themselves as vagrants, and having no means of gaining a livelihood, and also beggars, and in the case of young people, those who sent them out to beg?—Of course the Act of 1862 has been superseded by a General Police Act, passed since 1888?—Yes, and the report would require to be corrected in view of that.

5939. You say in this report that the possession of such powers in burghs and not in counties, must aggravate vagrancy in the counties by driving the vagrants into them from the burghs. Did the police complain much in Perth of the want of powers?—I found it almost the unanimous opinion of the Chief Constables that additional powers were required by counties.

5940. That is exactly the point where the value of your opinion would come in. One Chief Constable wanted the extension of these Burgh Police Act powers in the case of drunkards and of vagrancy in counties; and the next county Chief Constable we examined told us that they had at present ample powers to deal with these vagrants under the trespass clauses of the Prevention of Crimes Act. Did you take simply the dictum of the Chief Constables that you consulted, or did you form your own opinion on the matter?—I took the opinion of the Chief Constables as they had practical experience, and I rather agreed in that, although I think it might be harsh to apply these regulations to the gipsy class, for the reasons I have given.

5941. Yes, quite, but in regard to persons conducting themselves as vagrants, and having no place of residence or means of livelihood. Gipsies have a lawful means of livelihood if you take the making of baskets and so on?—I think that rather goes too far. Of course it is not regular, but only occasional employment.

5942. I will refer you to the corresponding provision in the new Act to section 408 of the Burgh Police Bill of 1892, which provides that a person found begging, &c., shall be liable on a first offence to a fine of 40s. with the option of imprisonment. Is that not pretty stiff?—Yes, I think it is.

5943. Do you think you would like to entrust country magistrates with powers such as that, or would the law be administered by the sheriffs?—I think it would be mostly administered by the sheriffs according to our practice. Of course it could competently be administered by the Justices of the Peace, but usually Justices of the Peace do not interfere very much in such matters.

5944. But would it not be rather a dangerous power to give to Justices of the Peace, the power to inflict sentence of imprisonment for a period of 60 days. Would it not tell against a man who might have given personal offence to the Justice by lounging about his own grounds?—I said that I should not like to extend that provision to the gipsy tribe who encamp, but to the tramps who go along the highway.

5945. You mention here that the County Police are not without powers, and that the Trespass Act 28 and 29 Vict., c. 56, is strictly enforced in Perthshire, but that the Act has no operation when the occupier does not object to the vagrant camping out. To-day, or yesterday, we heard of a lot of gipsies who encamped on the ground of a man who let out ground specially for gipsies, and other classes of that kind camping out.

5945A. You cannot, I suppose, prevent that?—No, I should think not.

5946. Unless you prove that there is something unsanitary. Do you suggest that this class should be dealt with and treated as criminals?—No, I do not think so.

Lord

5947. In this report the sub-committee goes on to say that the 15th section of the Crimes Prevention Act 34 and 35 Vict., C. 112, extends to Scotland, the 4th Section of the English Vagrancy Act 4 Geo. IX., C. 83. It authorises the punishment of persons 'wandering abroad and lodging in any barn or out-house, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of themselves,' the paragraph concludes. The Chief Constable, however, says that this section is of no value, because it does not authorise the apprehension of beggars, and experience in other counties seems to confirm this opinion?—Yes, the Chief Constable there means the Chief Constable of Perthshire.

5948. (Col. M'Hardy.) The Chief Constable of Berwick and Roxburgh said he worked upon these powers and found them quite sufficient.

5949. (By the Chairman.) Would you propose that these should be supplemented by some powers authorising the police to apprehend beggars, or is that necessary?—Yes, that seems to me to be desirable, in the interests more of the children than of any one else. There is a clause in the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act that is worth noticing I think. Section 2, I think it is, of that Act provides something like this, that if any person causes a boy under 14, or a girl under 16, or allows them to be in any premises, or in any street for the purpose of begging or receiving alms, they may be summarily convicted and imprisoned.

5950 And that applies to counties too?—I think it does.

5951. That power would enable you to deal with people for letting their children beg, but that would not enable you to deal with a tramp begging himself?—No.

5952. Does the Common Law of Scotland not enable you to deal with begging?—I do not know that it does; I do not know that the old Vagrant Act does. I don't think so.

5953. Will you please explain the system of the Mendicity Societies, to which during that inquiry in Perthshire you devoted your attention?—These societies were formed on the principle of furnishing tramps—people wandering about from place to place—with tickets for which they obtained bread and lodgings. The system was thought to serve two purposes, both to prevent indiscriminate charity, and to bring this class of people more under the notice of the police.

5954. But how did the police come to deal with them at all?—The tickets were worked through the constabulary, and the tickets were presented at houses and at baker's shops, and the police know of their being so presented.

5955. Societies of that kind have been established in Ayr, Stirling, and Clackmannan?—They were, I believe, first established in Ayr.

5956. Are they still going on?—I do not know. I do not think that they are at all applicable to the case of the gipsies.

5957. No; the gipsies although they are a very prominent form of vagrancy in Perthshire, have not to be dealt with over the greater part of Scotland. We wish, if possible, to know if these Mendicity Societies are still in existence?—I cannot say; I don't know.

5958. These societies do not appear to be very expensive. £100 was subscribed when the Ayrshire Society was formed, and no more?—They are not very expensive I think.

5959. Did you start a Mendicity Society in Perth then?—I think not. In fact, nothing was done on that report.

5960. Did you get much information about the working of these other societies—in Ayrshire, Stirlingshire, and so on?—Yes, at the time we did. But all my information was got from the Chief Constables through whom the societies were worked. The opinion of the Chief Constables was that they could not be worked except through the constabulary, and with the assistance of the inhabitants, through their abstaining from giving charity in other forms. And the chief difficulty, it seemed, was that they did not abstain from giving help in other forms.

5961. Did the societies not encourage vagrants to the counties where they were worked?—No; I think, on the contrary, it had the effect of driving them away. It was a rigid system, and they did not like it at all.

5962. The only advantage was that provision was made for them getting bread, and some arrangement was made for their shelter, whereas in other counties there was no such provision?—Yes; but they got more than bread from charitable people.

5963. Do you think the societies prevented people giving other forms of charity, and tended to decrease the numbers of tramps?—I was told that the system reduced the number by driving the tramps to the neighbouring county where there were no such rigid rules.

5964. We were told that the institution of Shelter Houses administered by the police at which a small supply of plain food could be had, had largely increased the number of vagrants in certain counties?—I do not know that.

5965. You say that these societies are rather police schemes than charitable societies?—Yes.

5966. Do the County Authorities make any contribution to them in Ayrshire?—I am not quite sure of that.

5967. On the subject of dealing with vagrant children; can you offer any suggestions?—It is a very difficult matter. I have really no suggestions to make, unless something can be done in the way of preventing them begging. These vagrants, as much as the tinker class, live a great deal by their children, whom they send to beg. If these children could be sent to Industrial Schools it would undoubtedly be better for them, though it would certainly not be so good for the parents.

5968. In this report the Chief Constable's statement is given to the effect, that within the year referred to as many as 1,148 children belonging to tinkers or gipsies, and 502 children belonging to the ordinary vagrant class had been challenged? That is a big lot; over 1600 in all?—Yes, but of course these numbers represent the children challenged, and the same ones may have been challenged a dozen times. The numbers are not obtained from a census. I observe from the census that these numbers vastly exceed the number of vagrants and children brought out by it, so that must be taken simply as the numbers challenged, and as affording some rough means of comparison between one county and another.

5969. Are the Industrial Schools Acts utilised in Perth for the purpose of dealing with those children?—No, I think not.

5970. But the children are not so numerous as is here stated?—No; not nearly.

5971. According to the census it would appear that in the county of Perth there were 106 children connected with vagrants, and 114 connected with the gipsies?—Yes.

5972. Do you think that the Education Acts, and the Industrial Schools Acts, or other existing legislation, requires strengthening in order to enable these children to be dealt with?—Yes, I think so.

5973. In what direction?—Well, I think that the children cannot well be got at under the Education Act, because they move about so much, or under the Industrial Schools Act, because it is nobody's duty to send them to an Industrial School; and further I do not think there are any funds provided under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act. But I remember that I was informed in reply to the inquiries that I made, that sending these children to Industrial Schools was not very successful, and, moreover, there is always a great objection to taking children from their parents.

5974. There is a proposal before Parliament for dealing with the children of the dwellers in vans going about the country? Was the attention of your committee called to that class of children at all?—I cannot Kinross.

Lord
Kincaidney.

exactly say at this time. I know my own attention was, and I had some correspondence with Mr. Smith of Colville about it. But the great objection lies in the separation of the children from their parents, and Mr. Smith, I know, thought it highly objectionable to do that.

5975. He proposes to deal with the children in each school district that they entered. Do you think that is feasible?—I would not like to venture an opinion upon that.

5976. You say in the report. 'That it is desirable that the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act, in regard to vagrant children, should be put into force to a greater extent than they are at present, and that for that purpose the power and duty of bringing vagrant children before a magistrate under that Act should be vested in some particular person or authority?—Yes, that is the finding of our committee on the subject.

5977. You say that you reported that it would be very beneficial if the powers contained in the 331, 332, and 333 sections of the General Police Act were conferred on the constables in counties?—Well, I had a worse opinion then about the gipsies than I have now. I think it is matter for somewhat serious consideration that they do afford to agriculturists and to farmers cheap labour when it is very much wanted.

5978. And in regard to the children, you recommend that powers to put the Industrial Schools Act into operation in the case of vagrant children should be vested in some person or authority. But is that power not vested at present in the School Board Authorities?—I do not know that it is. I do not think so.

5979. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Did I understand you to say that the vagrants and tramps are increasing in Perthshire?—No, I do not say so; I do not know.

5980. But at all events Perthshire is more infested with them than other counties?—I should think that Ayrshire would be worse. At least I thought so at that time.

5981. (Dr. Sutherland.) Yes.

5982. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think the gipsies lead necessarily unhealthy lives?—I do not think that they lead unhealthy lives. On the contrary, I think they lead rather healthy lives, except a newly born child for instance.

5983. Healthy because exposed to the fresh air?—Yes.

5984. Then the unhealthiness would come in occasionally with respect to the epidemics you spoke of?—I did not say that they were unhealthy, but only that if they took an epidemic there was the danger of them spreading it.

5985. If the burgh powers in regard to beggars were extended to the counties, do you think that the present police force would be fit to cope with the new duties, or would a large addition to the force be required?—I think that the present police force would be sufficient.

5986. Therefore there would be no increased expense for apprehension thrown on the rate-payers?—No, not for apprehensions; but for dealing with the children there might be a considerably increased expense.

5987. (By Col. M'Hardy.) These tramps, I suppose, are more numerous in summer than in winter?—I think so. Do you believe that a considerable portion of them reside in towns in the winter, and then march through the country in the summer season?—I think it likely.

5988. They have been seen along the main roads going northwards from Perthshire marching in the summer?—So I understand, but the main roads north from Perthshire do not lead to any large place except Aberdeen.

5989. These wandering migratory persons divide themselves into various classes. We have been told that while some of them are chronic vagrants, others—and sometimes a very considerable proportion—are men tramping in search of work from one centre where work has ceased, to another centre where it may have commenced?—I have no doubt about it, but it does not come within my knowledge.

5990. Allowing that a very considerable proportion of these wandering people are actually men searching for work, it would, I suppose, be a right thing to help them on their way?—In the case of the people you mean, I suppose so.

5991. You think it would be right that some proper arrangement should be made for assisting them with shelter at night, and by providing food which in other circumstances they would be forced to beg?—Yes; I think so, if they are in large numbers.

5992. Would you be in favour of providing a resting house for men whom the police believed to be men honestly in search of work?—Yes; if it were thought worth while to incur the expense necessary for doing that.

5993. I suppose that these migratory people really live upon the county in which they are for the time?—Yes; but not necessarily in a bad sense.

5994. But somehow or other they provide their support from the county?—Yes; partly by work and partly by begging.

5995. The average from the last census of Perthshire seems to be about 488, and the maintenance of them—for they have all to be maintained—at the cheapest rate would apparently come to between five and six thousands a year, so that there appears to be already a large sum spent in a more or less irregular way for their support?—As you say it seems to be so. As I have said, however, a number of them bestow work for their pay at certain times.

5996. Yes, at certain times, but you do not seem to question that the majority of them are more or less beggars, and live by that alone?—Oh no; as regards the tramps that may be so, but as regards the vagrants or the other class, I think that they all do some little work at times.

5997. The chronic vagrant?—The ordinary vagrant I mean; but they beg also.

5998. I am not talking about gipsies; I am talking about the ordinary tramps or vagrants?—I am not aware that the ordinary tramp or vagrant does work.

5999. So that for their support the community have to subscribe a large sum of money when it is all added up?—I presume so.

6000-1. (By Miss Stevenson.) There would be a difficulty in regard to School Boards enforcing the provisions of the Education Act in respect of these wandering families, as these Boards can only proceed by giving the parent statutory notice warning him of his neglect, and stating that subsequently he would have to be summoned before a meeting of the Board. On that notice being given, the party would probably proceed to another place?—Undoubtedly that is one of the difficulties.

6002. In regard to the Industrial Schools Acts, so far as these children are concerned, one difficulty is that the clauses of these Acts do not exactly define the position of the children who are wandering about with their parents. Under the 16th section of the Industrial Schools Act a child might be sent to an Industrial School if he were found wandering about without proper guardianship?—Yes, that is so.

6003. Under the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act the child must be first convicted of begging before being sent?—Yes.

6004. And the difficulty would be to get a case brought before the magistrate, if it was a country place, and there would also be the difficulty of getting the child sent, if convicted, to an Industrial School, which are generally situated in large towns?—Yes. There would be a difficulty in getting any person to perform all the duty necessary in bringing the case forward.

6005. Of course the School Board Officer of a district could do it, but it would probably involve him leaving his own particular district for a day or a couple of days at a time?—Of course he can only do it as an individual I presume, I do not know that he has powers as a School Board Officer.

6006. I think under the new Act of last year he is?—It may be.

Lord
Kincaidney.
29 Nov. 1894.

- Lord Kincairney.*

6007. But the great difficulty of enforcing the compulsory provisions of the Education Act, in the rural districts, is that in some cases the authority before whom the parent must be brought is at such a distance that these compulsory powers of School Boards have been a 'dead letter'?—Yes, so far as the Education Act is concerned.
6008. And the same would apply to the Industrial Schools Act?—Yes, but there is the further difficulty, that when the children are admitted to these schools without conviction it is rarely successful. They just return to their original habits again.
6009. But the managers of Industrial Schools have now power under the amended Act to supervise children until they are 18?—Yes.
6010. Do you know any distinction between Lord Kincairney.
vagrants and gipsies in that report?—No.
6011. (By Dr. Sutherland.) While you were Sheriff of Perthshire did you know of any boys sent to the 'Mars Training Ship' belonging to the gipsy class?—I do not know of any, but there may be some of whom I have no knowledge.
6012. And is there any way of ending the gipsy race as such except by taking forcible possession of the children and sending them to Industrial Schools and Training Ships?—I think not, but whether that is a very humane or moral ending of the race I do not know.
6013. They are not being dealt with in that way at present?—No, not at the present time. I do not know whether the children are being vaccinated or not.

[ADJOURNED.]

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Edinburgh, Friday, 30th November 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M. P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss Flora C. STEVENSON.

MR. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, Agent of the Prisoners' Aid Society, Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Mr. Alexander Robertson.
30 Nov. 1894.

6014. (By the Chairman.) You are, I understand, Agent for the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, Edinburgh?—Yes, I am.

6015. Please explain to the Committee the object of your work, and the assistance that you get from the Government in connection with it?—In the first place the object of our work is to give a little assistance to prisoners when they are discharged—destitute prisoners I mean. Very often that class of discharged prisoner has no home to go to, and those who have a home often have no means of support. Moreover, we assist those who require to be sent home to a distance. We give them clothing, and food, and lodgings, and what they may require in that sort of way while they are looking for employment. We do not profess to find employment for discharged prisoners, but we stand behind them while they are looking for employment.

6016. You are the gentleman who meets them on their leaving the prison?—Yes.

6017. Do you see them before they come out?—Yes; I visit the prison and I see them before they come out. I converse with them before they leave the prison, and I get to know their antecedents and their future prospects, and then I deal with them, each case on its own merits.

6018. What do your funds consist of?—Generally of private subscriptions.

6019. What revenue has the Edinburgh Society from private subscriptions?—I think about £200.

6020. How many prisoners pass through your hands?—From 250 to 300 per annum.

6021. You get some indirect assistance from Government?—Yes; but that does not come through my hands, but through those of the Treasurer.

6022. But you can explain how it is made use of—how, in fact, it works?—I am sorry that I cannot explain that very well.

6023. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The assistance which is given by Government is, I think, that of subscribing as much as is given by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society to any one prisoner?—Yes, I understand that is so.

6024. Only there is a provision that the total amount given to such prisoner shall not exceed £2?—Yes, that is so. The provision is that if the Aid Society expend £1 upon a prisoner, the Government will refund 10s. of it, or something like that.

6025. (By the Chairman.) You may go to the extent of expending £4 on a prisoner—that is the limit to which you can go—and for that payment they will receive £2 from the Government? Is that so?—Yes. But of course the society itself may go any length it pleases. For example, the society may give the prisoner as much as £10, but then it only gets back £2 from the Government.

6026. Yes, quite so. And is there some arrangement also with regard to the prisoners' earnings?—Do you mean gratuities.

6027. Yes. And do not the Prison Authorities give you some control over them?—The society has, up to this time, not been doing that.

6028. You do not take any charge of gratuities then?—In the case of convicts who are selected to receive the aid of our society, the governor of the convict prison sends the gratuity on to us, and it is paid through me to the prisoner. That is in the case of convicts.

6029. And in the case of the ordinary prisoners?—The gratuities are all paid at the prison here.

6030. Is that the practice with Prisoners' Aid Societies in other districts?—I understand not. believe in other districts the Aid Societies have charge of the gratuities.

6031. Do the Prison Authorities desire that a similar arrangement should be made here?—I believe so.

6032. What then is the objection of your society to falling in with that proposal?—I do not know.

6033. What sort of aid do you generally give to the prisoner? You have told us that you do not assist him to get a situation.—We provide food and lodging for them and for those who require them, we provide tools or materials for work.

6034. You have a building of your own then?—No sir. We send them to a model lodging-house, or even in some cases pay private lodgings for them. In

Mr.
Alexander
Robertson.

30 Nov. 1894.

mostly every case we provide clothing of some sort. Nearly all of them want clothing.

6035. You say that you send them to a model lodging-house. What are these institutions? Are they corporation property or private property?—I think they are public places.

6036. Private lodging-houses do you mean?—Yes; that is what I mean.

6037. And do you not think that to send them there is to put them in a position where they are very apt to be tempted into a relapse of crime?—Yes. I believe they often in these places meet with their old associates and relapse into crime.

6038. Do you send them out with a fresh suit of clothes and with their old clothes too?—They get their old clothes with them, but in many cases the garments are not fit to be seen. If they went out to seek work in their own clothes no one would employ them. Our object is to make them presentable.

6039. Do you never find cases where the people sell your suit of clothes, it may be in the lodging-houses, and get drunk on the amount they raise?—In a great many cases they have pawned the clothes.

6040. Have you no lien over the clothes then?—No, we have not.

6041. Then do you assist in sending them back to their homes?—Yes.

6042. What is the duty of the Prison Authorities in the matter. They send them, don't they, back to the place where they were convicted?—Those who come through Courts in distant places are sent back to the place where they were tried.

6043. You sometimes give them some money to keep them above water?—To those who have to go to a distance we sometimes give a few shillings.

6044. Do you try to get them to go back to their homes, or in some cases do you try to keep them away from their old surroundings?—If they are married men I try to get them to go home.

6045. But if they are without any tie, so far as you are aware, what do you consider the best course of dealing with them?—Well, I have sent them to other places on various occasions, where they would have a better chance of work, and less likelihood of falling in with their old acquaintances. I have in many cases sent them to distant places for that purpose.

6046. Are you at the prison gate every morning?—No.

6047. Has your society an agent there then?—No; we have nobody at the prison gate.

6048. Do you then see every prisoner about to be discharged?—No; only those who apply to see me.

6049. I understand that in many places an agent of the Prisoners' Aid Society attends at the prison gate when the prisoners are discharged for the day. That is done in Glasgow, is it not?—Yes, I believe there is a Prison Gate Mission in Glasgow, but there is nothing of that sort in Edinburgh. I have to do the whole thing myself.

6050. You help you say about 250 prisoners in the course of the year. Are they long or short sentence people?—Well, I should think the bulk of them are prisoners of from 21 to 60 days. In some cases they are three month prisoners; in a few six months; and so on. Sometimes the sentence may have exceeded that. In the main, however, they are not very long sentence prisoners.

6051. What fellows apply to you most. Have you a larger number of the long sentence prisoners or of the short sentence prisoners?—Short sentence prisoners.

6052. How do the prisoners learn of the operations of your society?—There is, I believe, a notice placed in every cell. They see it and inquire for me.

6053. Say that a man in for seven days wishes to see you?—That is a sentence that we scarcely ever have applying for help in Edinburgh.

6054. Say five days then. Say you have a man in for five days.—No; they do not apply very often to me. There are very few cases indeed of individuals doing a five days' sentence applying to me.

6055. Well, then, let us take a 14 days' sentence?—Yes; there are a great many of them.

6056. Would you give a man coming off a 14 days' sentence a suit of clothes?—I have done it.

6057. He would make rather a good thing out of his 14 days then?—Yes; if he pawned them immediately on getting them.

6058. But I do not mean putting the matter in that way?—No, quite so. He is benefited by being in prison because he gets a fresh suit of clothes.

6059. And he may get more out of that suit of clothes which you give him than he might get during the 14 days when he was out of prison?—Yes.

6060. And probably you also give him some assistance besides that, without having a lien over the clothes, and without any machinery for seeing that the greatest advantage was taken of the assistance by its being properly utilised?—That is so.

6061. Do you select the cases in which your society gives grants? Just tell us what you do?—I go to the prison and converse with the prisoners who have desired to see me. I find out as much as I can about them, and then I make a report to the secretary of the society, who decides whether they are to be assisted or not; but, of course, that question entirely depends on the nature of my report.

6062. What do your clothes cost?—We usually give second-hand clothing, and I can get it very cheap.

6063. How much money assistance will you give then—take an average good case?—I take the average all over at less than 10s.

6064. And what is the average price of your clothing?—About an average of 10s. a suit. That is for the old second-hand clothing.

6065. So that you give them on an average 10s. in money and 10s. in clothing?—Oh no; 10s. altogether.

6066. That then does not allow much for the lodgings?—4d. a night.

6067. Do you pay the man the money, or pay it to the lodging-houses?—We pay the lodging-houses by tickets. For food 8d., and for lodgings 4d., in all 1s.

6068. How do you give this assistance then?—There is a store at each of these lodging-houses, and our ticket covers food and lodging for so many days, and at so much a day.

6069. And the ticket is not transferable?—No.

6070-71. And do they try to transfer it?—Yes; and they try and sell the food also.

6072-73. What do you do with the women?—I have nothing to do with the female department. There is a lady appointed for the purpose.

6074-75. But you can describe the operations in connection with that department?—Up to within a year ago I should say there was a laundry to which the women were sent, but that laundry has now been disposed of.

6076-77. Was that the Grove Laundry?—Yes. Now I believe that the cases are dealt with in the same way that I deal with the men.

6078-79. They are not sent to the Magdalene Asylum or to any of these places?—I do not know how this lady does with them.

6080. Have you a report of the society for last year. I have not one with me, but I can get it in a few minutes.

6081. What is your idea of the good, so far as reclamation is concerned, that is done by your society?—There is not a great deal to be said for that.

6082. Is it your opinion then, from your experience, that anything can be done to improve the present state of matters?—There is great room for improvement; but what is the best thing to be done I do not know. Still I am of opinion that there is certainly great room for improvement.

6083. I suppose that the gratuities of prisoners coming from the Calton Prison are not large?—Well, in some cases they may be about £1, that refers to instances of 12 or 18 months imprisonment.

6084. And with the 'habituals' you do not trouble yourself, do you?—Oh yes; we have a great many of them through our hands.

6085. But with people who have been a dozen or a score of times convicted. Do you select such cases for assistance?—We try to give them a help and to encourage them to do well.

6086. What help do you give them?—We give them the same help as the rest; we just deal with them the same way.

6087. Do they form a large percentage of your 250 or 300 cases?—Yes; they do indeed.

6088. (By Col. M'Hardy.) We are anxious to get at some idea of the results of your work. Can you tell us of any good that you have done? Do you know some cases in which your benevolence has been successful in setting men on their feet again?—Yes; I can lay my hands on a good few very encouraging cases. There is one man in particular from whose case I have great encouragement. A man from Peterhead; a convict.

6089. What percentage of the number that you deal with do you think have been attended with really permanent good. The number of cases I mean?—I do not think more than a third.

6090. And in the case of that third, you have known that the men have started work, or set themselves out for a start in a better way?—Yes. But I should say that you will understand that the most of the prisoners who come here are all right while I am giving them this little help, but so soon as they find that there is to be restraint, and that the thing is to be drawn in, and that they are to rely on their own resources, they become invisible to me. I lose trace of them; and I may say that these fellows do not care to be followed up. But others, again, do wish to be followed up, and are pleased when I pay them a visit at their homes, which I frequently do. The generality of them, however, do not want to have any connection with me, and those are the fellows who get back to prison again.

6091. (By the Chairman.) In other words, as soon as they see that there is no more money to be got out of you, they cease to be visible to you, and to be amenable to your remonstrances. But if you had the doleing out of their gratuities would that not give you a hold over them?—For the length of time that their gratuity lasts.

6092. (The Chairman.) Yes, certainly.

6093. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you think that with the great majority—or rather, put it this way, with a good many—of the men who pass through your hands that a very slight supervision or restraint would suffice to keep them straight?—Yes, I do think that they can be kept sober for a time.

6094. But you think that in some cases it would be very difficult to keep them sober?—I think that they could not resist the drink.

6095. And that in other cases a very little amount of looking after would probably suffice?—Yes.

6096. (By the Chairman.) You mentioned several cases which had encouraging results. You gave us the case of a man from Peterhead. How long did you trace his career after he was out of prison?—For two months, or for a little over that.

6097. He was one of those cases in which you had a gratuity to look after. Is that so?—Yes, I think so; but I do not remember very well about that man's gratuity in particular. But at all events, he was through my hands, and I gave him assistance several times, and kept him afloat while he was going about seeking for work. He was knocked out of one place because it was known that he was a returned convict, and he went through great hardships. At length, however, he managed to get a place in Fife, and he was doing well there. On account of the late miners' strike, however, he got thrown out of a job, and being only a labouring man, he was very hard up indeed. He then wrote to me, telling me his circumstances, and I sent him a loan of 10s. He wrote back then thanking me for the loan of the money, and I heard no more about him till about a fortnight ago, when I had a letter from him with a postal order for the 10s. He is now working at Broxburn, and doing well.

6098. Did you ever get loans returned from any other one?—No; that is the only case of the kind that I can remember at present.

6099. But you say that you know a number of cases where the results have been encouraging. How do you proceed with them?—We find employment for the men, or rather they find employment for themselves, while we are keeping them afloat. We have had many very encouraging cases in which employment has been obtained.

6100. We have been told over and over again that prisoners, when they come out of prison, can get any amount of drink from friends, at no expense to themselves, within a few yards of the prison gates?—Yes, that is so. I have known them to get drunk between the prison and my office of a morning.

6101. And when they have no money of their own?—Yes; when they have no money.

6102. Does that not show the necessity of looking after them when they come out of the prison—of trying to prevent them falling into the hands of their old friends?—Yes; certainly it does. [Witness then withdrew.]

Rev. Robert
Henderson.

The REV. ROBERT HENDERSON, called in and examined.

Rev. Robert
Henderson.

6103. (By the Chairman.) You are, I understand, Honorary Secretary of the Association for the Reclamation of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates?—I am. May I be allowed to make a request. I would much rather that you allowed me to make a statement. If you allow me to get through that then you will have before you all I wish to say.

6104. Well; but do not make it long, please. Please remember, also, that we understand all about the general nature and the detrimental effects of drink.—I shall not touch upon that. I shall proceed. I understand that the present inquiry is into the extent, the causes, and the cure of the evils that we are all suffering from. Now, in regard to the extent of these, we know from statistics how that stands—

6105. We know all about that. Please proceed.—Well, I need not go into that, but it is important to what I am leading up to. In regard to the causes, you are also, I daresay, very familiar with these, and I shall not enter into that, important, undoubtedly, though it be, except to make this remark, without going into the subject, that the causes, I believe, cannot be speedily removed. We have not then to deal at present with the removal of the causes, but with the treatment of the persons suffering from these causes. Now, there is a very large body suffering from them, referred to in this statement connected with the number of apprehensions. We have a residuum, and it is the problem of society at this time—how is this residuum to be dealt with? My contention is this, that we must have new aims and methods in dealing with them, and further that the methods in use have entirely failed. I have looked into the Scottish Acts—

6106. Perhaps we had better go on in the usual way. You say in your précis that severity has been tried and has failed, that leniency has been tried and has failed, that improved administration has been tried, and has failed, and that short sentences have been tried, and have failed. That the radical cause of failure has been a defective aim and defective legislation. You further say that a higher aim is essential—'that the aim henceforth must be the reformation of the offender'?—That is the higher aim, I think, that we ought to set before ourselves.

6107. And you say, too, that you think new and compulsory powers are needed for its success?—Scotland is unanimous in the opinion that compulsory powers are essential to reformation. I say so because I have corresponded with the whole of Scotland—at least with all those entitled to speak on this question; and they are unanimous on this point, that these compulsory

Henderson.

30 Nov. 1894.

powers must be obtained, otherwise no scheme will be of any avail.

6108. But what powers do you mean?—Powers to seize habitual offenders and habitual inebriates.

6109. Well, supposing that you do seize them. But in the first place have you thought of how you would define habitual offenders?—I have definitions in my possession—definitions given by Dr. Norman Kerr, London, and others, but not with me.

6110. Yes, but we want your own opinion?—That they must be convicted so many times. How many I am not prepared to say. The same thing applies to inebriates and to the other classes.

6111. Well, supposing you had these habitual offenders in custody, and had your powers, what do you propose to do?—I would send them to Reformatories. There is a unanimous opinion as to that in Scotland.

6112. You speak of a unanimous opinion. How do you know?—From official correspondence with Chief Constables, the Convention of Royal Burghs, Parochial Boards, and chief of the Town Councils such as Edinburgh, and from the unanimous resolution of a representative Conference held in the City Chambers, Edinburgh.

6113. Yes, but we know all about the Convention of Royal Burghs, and these other bodies. How would you have the Reformatories of which you speak supported?—In regard to support, I think that they should be supported on the same principle as assessments are made for lunacy purposes, and the distribution of the burden should certainly be on the same districts that the Lunacy Acts have control over.

6114. And do you propose that the contributions should come from the State?—I think that if the scheme were to be successful, and Scotland were to reap the benefits, that Scotland should certainly bear the burden. I am perfectly clear on that point. I do not think it should be from the Imperial revenue that the contribution should come. The Imperial Revenue would refuse to contribute, and justly so, I think.

6115. And how long would you have these offenders to be resident in your Reformatories?—I would do away with time sentences.

6116. You would keep them until they were reformed. And how would you employ them?—Industrially. Just as they are employed in the institutions in America. There they are employed in making shoes, and brushes, and clothing, &c., and also in farming.

6117. You propose that these Reformatories should have ground attached to them?—I do; they should be rural Reformatories. But it would be necessary to make a distinction between inebriates and the other classes of habitual offenders, because inebriates must be dealt with on medical principles.

6118. You say in your précis that General Booth's system is good, but is defective?—Yes; there are, in my opinion, two great defects. The first is that it can only deal with those who are willing to be dealt with, now that is a fatal objection, because only a very few come voluntarily considering the multitudes who require to be dealt with. The second fatal objection to General Booth's scheme is that those who come can only be kept so long as they are willing to stay.

6119. But General Booth's scheme does not profess to deal primarily with habitual offenders? The object was to deal with those who could not obtain work?—Yes, that is so; but many of them are habitual offenders.

6120. In your précis you mention the Elmira Institution, United States. Where is it situate exactly?—In the State of New York.

6121. And how is it supported?—By the State principally, though not wholly.

6122. And its object is?—The reformation of offenders. All the parties with which this Committee is concerned come within its influence.

6123. What are they?—Short sentence criminals, and those who are willing to be placed in it from the State prison.

6124. (Dr. Sutherland.) Juvenile criminals under 30.

6125. (By the Chairman.) If they go out they go voluntarily, if they enter voluntarily—and who are the class who go there, and how are they detained?—They are detained there at the will of the parties and of the Board. The time sentence is not in existence.

6126. Can you tell us anything about the results?—The results are 75 per cent.; and not merely is the quantity satisfactory, but the quality also, as testified by the Board itself, and by letters which I have seen, written by discharged prisoners.

6127. Can you tell us anything about the expense. Have you any reports?—Yes. I have the report at home, and I am afraid that without it I cannot go into exact figures.

6128. You go on in your précis to say that 'Industrial Reformatories, backed up by compulsory powers, essential,' and that this has been proved. Have you any other instance to give us except that of Elmira Institution?—In this case we have no compulsory powers at all.

6129–30. But I mean other cases from abroad?—There are institutions, though I have not copies of the reports with me, in France, Belgium, Berlin, Holstein, and other places.

6131. They work satisfactorily in the majority of cases.

6132. You have not been in any of the labour colonies there?—No.

6133. And you do not know about them?—I only know from the reports, which are perfectly reliable. I am relying on them.

6134. But we do not rely on them; for none of the reports are concerning compulsory labour colonies. We have the reports, but none of them have regard to compulsory labour colonies, and I thought that you might be able to tell us about compulsory labour colonies?—No, I can't do so.

6135. You have not made any difference in your statement between cases of inebriates and cases of habitual offenders?—I shall do so if you wish it.

6136. No, I do not suggest it. What, may I ask, is your view? Would you deal with them all through one sort of Reformatory?—No; certainly not.

6137. You would have inebriate institutions?—Yes, most unquestionably.

6138. And how do you think they ought to be supported—by rates levied upon the lunacy districts?—Yes; if the people are poor. If the inmates are poor the State must support them, and ought to support these institutions.

6139. And you would have the incidence of taxation for the support of the inebriate and the purely criminal Reformatory institutions the same?—Yes, the same.

6140. And are we to understand that you wish the State to employ female labour in the female reformatory institutions?—Yes, just as women are employed in institutions of a similar kind. I have seen the work that they can do. I went very carefully over the whole of the female as well as the male departments of General Booth's Institution in London, and saw women in rooms larger and smaller than this one, sewing and knitting, under the guidance and influence of the system acted upon. I saw them sewing useful needlework, and the things they sew and knit are disposed of, and become part of the income of the institution.

6141. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What difference do you propose to make between the habitual offender, and the habitual inebriate in treatment?—My opinion is, certainly, that the treatment of the inebriate should be treatment under medical guidance.

6142. Is it not the case, that most of the habitual offenders are practically habitual inebriates?—A very large percentage are.

6143. So large a percentage that there is scarcely anything left—there is something no doubt, but very little?—That is so.

6144. So that the necessity of having a different system, which would entail considerably increased expense, seems to be consequently justifiable. Is that your view?—Inebriates, I should say, are certainly divisible into classes. I do not see the necessity of dealing with the whole of the inebriates under the same rule.

Rev. Robert
Henderson.

30 Nov. 1894.

Rev. Robert
Henderson.

30 Nov. 1894.

6145. The whole of the offenders you mean?—No; I am speaking just now of the inebriates. You have a class of inebriates who are thoroughly bad, whom nothing can restore except this new system, and the time and the influences you, under it, bring to bear upon them. But there is a second class not so bad, and there is another class still, a third class, not nearly so bad in the earlier stages, who can very properly be drafted into Reformatories. Judgment, again, may be used in dealing with the second class, who may be drafted into Reformatories too, but the purely bad inebriate ought to be treated separately and medically.

6146. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What do you mean by lunacy districts for rateable purposes?—I mean this, that I understand there are districts assessed for the lunacy expenditure.

6147. But why lunacy?—It is simply the fact that under the Lunacy Acts there are districts. I think that the same districts might be assessed for these new institutions' support—they being local institutions.

6148. But do you associate lunacy with inebriety?—No, by no means. It was only to save expense in the collection of the assessment that I suggested these districts.

6149. You do not associate lunacy with criminality?—No.

6150. But why ask the Imperial revenue to contribute for the maintenance of these people?—I do not ask them. I guard myself carefully from doing that.

6151. You are aware that the Imperial revenue now contributes a fair proportion for the maintenance of these people in the shape of the prison and of the police grants?—You refer to Scotland. Yes; that may be.

6152. Why should the proportion borne now by the police and the prison vote, not be borne still under the altered circumstances?—That is matter for consideration. I think that in order to get this new movement a footing within the legislature we should be very careful how we raise up English opposition.

6153. Do you see any objection to the money, now contributed by the Imperial Exchequer, being spent in another form for the cure of these people?—In regard to prisons, do you mean?

6154. I mean taking these people out of prisons and other places of that kind, and putting them into Reformatories; do you see any reason why the money still required for their maintenance should not continue to come from the Imperial Exchequer?—No; I do not see any reason, and I told you why I thought the institutions should be separated. [The witness then withdrew.]

Rev. Robert
Henderson.

Mr. William
Todd.

MR. WILLIAM TODD called in and examined.

Mr. William
Todd.

6155. (By the Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society?—I am.

6156. In the first place I must tell you that our remit does not involve any questions of licensing reform; that it refers solely to what means can be adopted for dealing with habitual offenders and people of that class. I suppose, in connection with the work of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society, in your reformation efforts, you come across a good many habitual drunkards especially?—With a good number.

6157. Have you any idea how they can be dealt with apart from putting down the manufacture of spirits, and closing the public-houses?—Well, my first idea was of course in that direction.

6158. But apart from that aspect of the matter—we can take up, however, the other aspect—the administration of the law against supplying drunken people with drink?—I think these clauses of the Act are entirely inoperative.

6159. Do you endeavour to enforce that provision?—We never do so far as I know.

6160. But why not?—Simply because we thought it was a matter for the police, and not for us. I have drawn up a summary from a historical point of view of the question, and in the Report I now give in, at pages 29, 30, and 31, there is given an account of the evolution of the temperance movement in Edinburgh.

6161. About the 'drunks' that have come through your hands. Tell us something about them?—I may say that I drew up a statement showing what we have done in the matter of pledging.

6162. What have you done then?—Since 1836 we have pledged nearly 200,000 individuals.

6163. And how many have relapsed?—I estimate, that so far as I can judge from the tables, I have made up, over 75 per cent. of that number have kept the pledge for three months; 50 per cent. have kept it for six months; and 25 per cent. have kept it permanently. The reason why I divide them up in that way is simply this, that during a year you have three or four distinct periods of temptation. For example you have the New Year holidays. Then you have the Spring Fast, something in the same line about midsummer, and then the Autumn Fast. These periods are periods of great temptation, so much so that you find men who have taken the pledge, and got safely over the New Year holidays, looking forward to the time of the trades' holidays, as the period of the next strong temptation.

6164. Some, I suppose, having broken the pledge, come back to you to be repledged?—Yes.

6165. Do they come back to the society?—Well, of course, they are scattered all over the city.

6166. You work with the Good Templars don't you?—We are a separate society altogether. The Good Templars, the Rechabites and the Sons of Temperance, are what may be termed benefit societies, the two latter eminently so.

6167. In the matter of pledging. A man who was pledged with you, and broken it, would probably go to the Good Templars, or the Rechabites, or Sons of Temperance to be repledged?—Well, they might. But sometimes they have pledged as many as six times with us. And from past records we find that some who have pledged oftenest have turned out the strongest workers in connection with our body.

6168. Take the case of a man who had pledged, say six times, or rather take the case of a man who had held off for a good long time, do you find that he is much better than the man who has broken down sooner, and has repledged? Do you find that total abstinence for 12 months, for example, is frequently followed by a break-down?—Not so frequently in cases over the 12 months. I think the great temptation lies in the first year. When they come to me to pledge I tell them in two lines what I would like them to do. To trust God and to keep their mouth shut, to avoid the temptations of old companions, and also to avoid highly seasoned meats. I believe that has something to do with the matter.

6169. You have no statistics, I suppose, showing the number of relapses at different periods of abstinence?—I have not such statistics with me, and besides, that would depend entirely upon the party's word who gave the information. Sometimes I have even heard people say that they were keeping the pledge when they actually smelt of drink. I drew up, however, what may be called a summary in regard to pledges, and for that purpose I went into a number of figures and other things, and I condensed the whole as much as possible. I can submit these statistics to you if you like.

6170. Yes; we shall be glad to see them.

6171. (Witness.) Then I took and condensed these pledges into as small bulk as possible. I now hand in a number of these pledges which represent the principal pledges in actual local use, including those of various churches.

6172. Yes; I see that this pledge runs 'I voluntarily promise that I will abstain from all intoxicating liquors, except as medicines or wine in a religious ordinance.' Have you not changed the original pledge

Mr. William
Todd.

30 Nov. 1894.

a good deal?—No; that is the original pledge of 1836, kept the same until to-day.

6173. And you have the same thing to-day?—Yes; you will notice that the same promise is required in the pledge of to-day that is required in the original pledge of 1836.

6174. You take still a pledge against spirits only?—No; the original Temperance Society, between 1830 and 1836, went against ardent spirits. In 1836 it was our present pledge, and it was for total abstinence. Some of those which I have handed in are the old Temperance Society pledges.

6175. There is a more recent pledge. It says 'I promise, God helping me, to abstain from all intoxicating drink as a beverage.' Do you use that pledge to-day?—That is the pledge of another Society. The pledges of a number of societies are there. I think the last pledge among those which I have handed in is the soldier's pledge from Piershill Barracks, or the Soldiers' Home.

6176. Yes, I notice that it runs very much in the same way as the others. They are all for the same purpose, and, I suppose, equally well adhered to?—Yes; among the number of pledges which I have given in are those of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society; the Church of Scotland; the Free Church of Scotland; the United Presbyterian Church; Carrubber's Close Mission; and the Soldiers' Home. That I think represents a few of the pledges which are in the parcel that I have handed in.

6177. Does that mean that there are something like 14 different societies?—No; nine or ten different societies, with three or four pledges each. For example, the Carrubber's Close Mission have only one pledge.

6178. What then is the difference in the pledges. I see that your Society has three or four?—The difference in the pledges is this: Our large engraved card costs 6d. That is sold, and we also give a little pocket pledge for the persons to produce to an employer, &c. There is another thin paper pledge, those which we give for nothing; and for the little pocket pledge alone we charge 1d.—the large engraved card, as I said, being charged 6d. In the Church of Scotland the Temperance Society was a dual society, that is, it was established on the dual basis. The peculiarity of the leading Churches is that they have family pledges. The Carrubber's Close pledge is just a little ticket about the same size as one of the Music Hall tickets. On the other hand, the soldier's pledge is of a peculiar kind; a sort of religious society to which they pay in so much a week. I shall leave them all with you if you think they are of any value.

6179. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Have you tried any of the empirical cures for drunkenness?—I can only speak of the Tyson cure. But we did not try it at all because they did not come up to the scratch.

6180. Tell us how that was?—Well, the Tyson people applied to us, and we got together 20 individuals whom we thought to be thorough-going habitual drunkards, and they were willing to go in for the Tyson cure. The Tyson people said that they would give the cure for nothing, while we offered them the use of our rooms in Nicolson Street for the purpose. They agreed, but after a delay of six months they backed out of the business altogether, and left us with these people on hand whom we had brought together for the 'cure.' The last thing we heard from the Tyson people was that they were prepared to go in for the cure at £5 a head; but long before that we had told the parties who wished to be cured that the cure would be effected for nothing. We had a bottle of mixture, and we tasted it as a committee without committing ourselves at all. On our part we were quite willing to go in for the experiment.

6180A. (By the Chairman.) Did any other Temperance Society in Scotland receive a similar offer?—I could not say.

6181. You got together 20 habitual drunkards for the purposes of the Tyson cure?—Yes. Mr. Waterston has the whole correspondence in the matter.

6182. Has he any letter from the Tyson people offering the cure?—He has the whole correspondence. I put the correspondence in his hands, and being a private correspondence it remains in his hands. We did not want as a committee of the society, to have to say that the cure was a perfect cure, or anything like it, till we had ourselves seen the result of the experiment. [The witness then withdrew.]

The Rev. J. D. ROBERTSON, M.A., U.P. Clergyman, North Berwick, called in and examined.

6183. (By the Chairman.) You are an M.A. and a D.Sc.?—Yes.

6184. And you appear as a delegate from the Edinburgh Presbytery of the United Presbyterian Church?—Yes, I appear as a delegate from that Presbytery, and I should say that I have specially to deal with the inebriate part of the remit. I sent out to all the ministers of the church within the bounds circulars containing a number of queries as to the number, circumstances, &c., of habitual inebriates not coming under the cognisance of the police.

6185. Yes. Please let us know the results of your inquiries?—The first query in the circular is to this effect—'What is the number of habitual inebriates known to you who have not passed through the police court?' That is the question; and in answer to it the returns state 1 per cent. The second query is—'What proportion of these are of the well-to-do classes—able to pay for their own maintenance in Retreats chosen by themselves?' The returns state in reply about a tenth of the 1 per cent. Query three is—'Is the number of habitual inebriates increasing or diminishing within the period over which your observations have extended?' It seems, from the returns, that most of the ministers think that there has been an increase, especially among women in the wage earning classes, and among habitual drinkers. The next query is—'Of these persons, how many are there whose indulgence may be regarded as periodic, recurring, that is, at more or less fixed intervals?' About two-thirds it would seem; they would be more or less continuous were it not for the fact that there was want of means, or some other hindering cause of an ordinary kind. Of the 'periodicals' a number may be described as constitutionally so, some from a hereditary trait or otherwise. The fifth query ran thus—'Do you consider that the existing methods and institutions for dealing with habitual inebriates have been successful in improving their character and condition, and affording relief to others concerned, or do you think that these require to be supplemented by new enactments and agencies?' There was a certain amount of agreement that the existing institutions were so far effective, but on several grounds there was a desire that they should be increased and supplemented.

6186. How many then were in favour of a new class of inebriate institutions?—They were all except one. And they also stated that the existing institutions were far too few, and were badly distributed, and inadequately supervised. There seem to have been instances, according to the returns, in which in institutions for reform it was possible for an inmate to die of delirium tremens, showing evidently that there was a want of supervision. Such a statement was made to me by a minister in the Lasswade district. The opinion of the ministers, I should add, was that in these institutions there should be provision for compelling the inmates to work, and that regular work should be part of the method of reform adopted. A general complaint was that the institutions are far too dear for the majority of those who need them, and that there should be in all of them a medical man—or at least a medical man connected with each—who knows something of the injury to the brain, and the nervous system, and of the method of strengthening the will power. There ought to be also religious influences, and moral training, together with instruction in the scientific aspects of indulgence. Query No. 6 was—'Are you of opinion that such habitual inebriates should be under some form of compulsory control?'—There was unanimity on that point—absolute unanimity with the exception of one. There were many qualifications and safeguards suggested as necessary. One of them was that there should be the medical officer of the county (who might be conjoined with the man's own medical adviser), and that some magistrate should be consulted before anyone could be confined, to guard against any use of the power for illegal purposes. Some of the returns said that after a second conviction in the Police Court the party might be dealt with.

6187. Do the members of your Presbytery really think that a man should be looked upon as an habitual drunkard if he be twice convicted?—No.

6188. But what is this you say about a second conviction then?—The majority do not say that, but one or two do say so; say that if there be a second conviction there should be an inquiry, and that if considered advisable by the proper authorities it should be possible to deal with the parties. Personally, I think two convictions far too few. The seventh query in the circular is—'Have you any further suggestions as to the better treatment and reduction of the numbers of those who may be classed as habitual inebriates?' They think that the present laws should be more strictly enforced against those who sell drink to minors.

6189. Was it generally thought by the members of the Presbytery that there was much adulteration of spirits, and that the amount of drunkenness had a good deal to do with the adulteration?—The opinion was that, in certain districts and upon special occasions, a great deal of the drunkenness was due to the spirits being adulterated, and that the laws which bear upon adulteration should be enforced much more stringently than they are at present; and especially that the sale of liquor to children should be prevented.

6190. Have they no specific recommendations to make as to the sale of liquor to children. Do they mention any cases—specific cases I mean—where the sale of liquor to children has been the cause of drunkenness and crime?—No; not specially. They were simply suggestions made by the members. They think that the law is not enforced in certain districts—that there seemed to be a considerable liberty; and they thought also that there should be a reduction in the number of grocers' licenses as well as of public-house licenses; and that some modification of the Norwegian system, adapted of course to our own country, could be run along with that of local option as a means of diminishing the production of drunkenness. They think that a publican who has supplied drink to a customer publicly convicted of drunkenness more than once should be deprived of his license, or that his license should be 'marked,' if the man was known to be a drunkard or had committed a crime while under the influence of drink. There was also a valuable opinion that the members of the police force, engaged in this work, should be men who professed or were considered total abstainers—that then, to some extent, the administration of the law would be better enforced in certain districts if the policemen were teetotalers, and not only the policemen, but the members of the Inland Revenue, who have to do practically with the trade.

6191. I think that is hardly within the scope of our inquiry—we have not to deal with the licenses. We wish to see how far the public opinion of your Presbytery is prepared to support compulsory dealing with the classes in question?—On the question of the compulsory control of the institutions and other agencies, the members seem to be, practically unanimous. As to the support of these, they think that it would be advisable, if possible, and of considerable advantage, to couple the voluntary element with the Government grant as it is at present in connection with juvenile institutions. The opinion of many seems to be that, along with the Government grant, there might be a means of appealing to the benevolent.

6192. Well, that is a suggestion; but we cannot give effect to it by law. Is there anything else?—Further, I might say that the treatment in these institutions should be very elaborately graded, according to the actual development of dyspomania in the person. Some of the members of the Presbytery propose to make the publican pay for any expense to which the rate-payers are put.

6193. I presume the majority of them do not think that feasible?—No; many of these things are only suggestions thrown out. But there is a decided preponderance of opinion that there should be some control over the habitual drunkards.

6194. And you know that a great many people outside the clergymen—that, in fact, public opinion in Scotland would go the length of your Presbytery?—Yes, I think so. Public opinion might not—I mean outside opinion—be quite so strong as the church opinion, because it would scarcely be so pronounced, but it would be quite strong enough to support the proposal.

6195. You mentioned about a case of delirium tremens occurring in a private institution; have you any details of it?—Only this, that one minister reported to me that he knew a case personally of a man who was sent to one of these institutions to be restrained, and that he died of delirium tremens while he was there.

6196. And was that a Scottish Institution?—Yes, I was led to believe so. [The witness then withdrew.]

Rev. J. D.
Robertson.

30 Nov. 1894.

JOHN SIBBALD, M.D., F.R.C.P., Commissioner in Lunacy, called in and examined.

6197. (By the Chairman.) You are a Commissioner in Lunacy for Scotland?—Yes.

6198. The points that we wished that we might have your opinion on are two. In the first place we were told that there are a number of lunatics boarded-out with people who receive not more than four in their houses, and that these houses are under the control of, and are licensed by your Board?—That is so.

6199. We want to know, in the first place, what power the keepers of these houses have?—That is a question which one would require to answer with considerable caution; because there is no statutory provision which defines their power.

6200. How does the law work out then?—Well, the sole function of our Board, when a pauper lunatic is intimated to us—that is to say when a poor person becomes entitled to relief from the Parochial Authorities on the ground of insanity—is to consider how the case may be disposed of. I take the case of pauper lunatics because private patients constitute a very small proportion of the patients boarded in the way referred to in your question. The duty of the Parochial Board on such a case occurring is to place the pauper lunatic in the District Asylum, unless he gets the sanction of our Board for disposing of him otherwise; that sanction is never granted without careful consideration of a statement as to the position of the lunatic and as to the position of the people with whom it is proposed to place the lunatic. This statement is accompanied by medical certificates showing the condition of the lunatic and that the circumstances in which he is to be placed are suitable for his proper care and treatment. The Board does not, as the sheriff does, give an order that so-and-so is to be placed in that house and kept in that house; we merely, as a Board, grant the sanction for the person being kept there. I should not like to be supposed to give an opinion as to the exact legal position of the person. I should think his position would be very much the same as that of a child in the house—that if the question was raised, the guardian would have to show that any control which he exercised over the patient was such as would be justifiable in regard to any member of his household in the patient's condition.

6201. For instance, take the case of a patient who is boarded-out in the country in the manner you describe, but thinks that he would like to return to Edinburgh? Has his guardian in that event any powers of detention?—Such cases sometimes occur, and what happens is this. The guardian, as we call the person with whom the patient lives, reports the matter, if he loses sight of the person, to the Inspector of Poor, and the Inspector of Poor follows the patient, or writes to the Inspector of Poor of the parish to which he has gone. If a patient goes away in that fashion, he is brought back as a man who requires to be watched and taken care of, and in regard to whom the guardian or the Inspector of Poor might be held to be doing his duty in taking care of him. If a patient resists, and force has to be used, the case is not suitable for a private dwelling, and steps would be taken to place the patient in an asylum.

Sibbald.

Sibbald.

Sibbald.

6202. And the only cases you would sanction being boarded-out in that way are those of harmless or imbecile lunatics?—Well, yes; but that can only be taken as a very general answer, for every case is considered quite on its own merits.

6203. Our reason, I should say, for wishing particular information on the point is this. We may have to suggest some similar boarding-out system in respect of certain classes of habitual offenders, and we want to know the legal analogy. It is because we wish to get a definite statement of the legal analogy that we have consulted your Board. Take this case. Supposing a man is sent with your sanction to one of these houses to be boarded-out, and he gets excited, wants to go out, and ultimately becomes violent. The man with whom he is boarded, on the other hand, wishes to restrain him, there is a struggle, and the patient knocks his guardian on the head and kills him in his effort to get free. Now, what would be that man's position?—Of course, if, when tried for the crime, he were held to be a lunatic he would be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure; but if he were held to have been sane, and entitled to escape, he would be guilty of homicide.—He would be liable to be tried, but he would be in the same position as a patient in an asylum. A patient in an asylum who has committed an assault on another patient, or on an attendant, has been on more than one occasion brought up and tried.

6204. Who is the legal officer of your Board?—We have two legal commissioners, Sheriff Guthrie Smith, and Mr. John Cowan, W.S., the present Crown Agent.

6205. Probably I am springing a very difficult question on you, and we do not wish to do that. What we wish is to have some enlightenment on this which is very germane to our inquiry. If you have any doubt upon the matter we can have the thing looked into, and any legislative enactments bearing on the subject put down on a memorandum. If you could have such a memorandum drawn up, settling the existing powers on these two points, we shall be very much obliged by your sending it to us?—Yes; I shall do so. (Appendix xxiii.)

6206. Thanks. Now the second point is this. Two experts gave evidence before us, and referred to a process that takes place in Scotland in the case of persons threatened with lunacy, or in the early stages of lunacy. These cases are of a kind that can be better dealt with at a private home than in an asylum, and by some machinery or other which we do not understand, the Inspector of Poor gets the sanction of your Board to have these persons sent to a private house to be kept by some trustworthy people. By-and-bye the patient gets tired of the place; wants a change of scene. Now we want to know whether the guardian, as we may say, has any powers to detain the patient?—A private patient of that kind is in exactly the same position as the pauper patient of whom I have been speaking. The sections of the Act I can refer you to, so that you can see exactly how the thing stands. There is one thing that can be done with a person who is suffering from what is believed to be curable insanity—insanity not of long duration, and which it is hoped will not be of long duration. That person can be placed in the house of anyone—of a medical man for instance—boarded there, and kept there for a period not exceeding six months.

6207. You have used the same phrase 'kept'—what power of detention has that party?—Nothing more than the power he would have under common law of detaining a patient in delirium, or suffering, say, from typhus fever.

6208. Take this case. A man suffering from curable lunacy is sent to a house for six months to be boarded. After a month has passed, he believes that he is sane, and he wants to go out. His friends don't want him out, and his guardian attempts to restrain the man. Have there been any cases of actions being raised for false restraint in circumstances of that kind?—Nothing of the kind has occurred. There have been no cases of that sort. I cannot tell what would happen were an action raised. A person keeping a lunatic under a six months' certificate could not be punished for keeping a lunatic for profit, without the order of the sheriff or the sanction of the Board. Otherwise he would be in the same position as any person having a lunatic boarder.

6209. These technical points may not appear to be of great moment, but in the contingency of any extension of the system to the case of habitual offenders, they would become of great consequence. That is the reason that I wish to have reliable and accurate information about these technical points, and if you can include the second point of which we have been speaking in your memorandum we shall be further obliged?—Yes, I shall be glad to do so.

6210. In the case of paupers boarded-out, how are they employed? By the person who takes them in?—The treatment of the pauper is carried out under the Board's regulations and supervision. But there is a great deal that can be done that is not laid down in written regulations. The paupers are treated as much as possible as members of the families with whom they are boarded-out.

6211. And I suppose these cases will be sent to working men, or to crofters or small farmers?—Yes.

6212. And they work for these men?—Yes; and sometimes they are the best workers in the family. But we should take steps to have the pauper removed at once if he were driven to work in any cruel or unkind way.

6213. What is your system of inspection in regard to the lunatics boarded-out in the manner that you have described?—In the first place, the inspection of pauper lunatics and of private lunatics are different things.

6214. Take them in groups not exceeding four?—The groups are of smaller numbers; generally speaking, the cases are single cases. We, as a Board, do not grant a license to a house to receive more than two pauper lunatics at a time in the first instance. When an application is made for a license, it is only after the guardian has shown that he or she is well fitted for a position of that kind, that a license is granted to receive more than two patients. And the general rule is that we never extend a license beyond two without referring the case specially to the Deputy Commissioner who visits within that particular district. Then a duty rests with the medical officer employed by the parish of chargeability. Sometimes it is not the medical officer of the parish in which the patient is resident. We do not draw any hard and fast rule, but generally speaking it is the medical officer of the parish in which the patient is resident who is paid by the parish of chargeability to make four visits a year. These visits need not be made at stated times. Indeed, it is considered better that the visits should not be made at stated times. Besides that the Inspector of Poor visits the case twice in the year.

6215. What are these people paid who are willing to board pauper lunatics?—They are paid according to circumstances. If they are strangers to the patient they are paid on an average 6s. or 7s. a week, and besides that there is clothing supplied by the parish. But a large number of patients, especially in the Highland districts, are not boarded with strangers, and the allowance that is given in such cases is only contributory—it may be only 1s. per week, or 1s. 6d. per week, or

Dr. John
Sibbald.

Dr. John Sibbald.

30 Nov. 1894.

it may be nothing except clothing. The payment would depend on the circumstances of the relatives, and on their capability to bear the burden.

6216. In this latter case, the presumption is that there is only one lunatic lodged in the house?—There is only one except in a few instances. In one case there are four unfortunate imbeciles who are brothers.

6217. Take a single case. That house would not be licensed by your Board?—The expressions 'license' and 'sanction' have come to have two different meanings in our office—you won't see just at first the distinction perhaps. Where there are more than one lunatic in a house we license the house to receive them, but the reception of each patient requires to be separately sanctioned, even into a licensed house. In the case of a single patient only sanction to the residence of the patient in the house is required.

6218. How long has this system of boarding-out and of detention in private families been practiced in Scotland?—It began almost immediately after our Board came into operation in 1858; but it has grown. You could not mark any particular point at which the system may be said to have come into operation actively, but it was in full operation ten years after the passing of the Act—say in 1868.

6219. Assume that the Committee were to make any recommendation for the detention of habitual inebriates. Do you think that system of boarding-out could be adopted?—No; I do not. If I could have said otherwise I would have volunteered to come before you and tell you so.

6220. In the case of habitual offenders, do you think that there are cases of people who really relapse into crime because they cannot get anything to do? Do you think that in such cases the persons might be sent off to board with trustworthy people in districts where there were not many opportunities for drinking or falling into crime?—You refer to weak-minded people do you?

6221. No. Take the case of prostitutes who have done a number of times in prison, and whom we find working for practically nothing in laundries and so on for a couple of years in order to pull them round. Others won't enter these places, and won't face this laundry work. Assume that we were to recommend central institutions such as the Reformatories that are suggested to us. Do you think that would be a satisfactory method?—Really I don't think our experience throws much light on that at all. A person with a strong proclivity to intemperance or vice would not be regarded as suitable for boarding-out.

6222. But you do not find that there is any class of lunatics who are regarded as contributing very much to their own support, and whom persons would be willing to take to board for such a sum as is paid in the case of a lunatic asylum?—There are a few cases which are free from parochial relief, or rather which do not require parochial relief, because the patients have practically been accepted as members of the family, and their work more than remunerates the guardians for their keep.

6223. You speak about 7s. a week and clothes.

That would not be less than is paid for a pauper lunatic in a lunatic asylum?—It is less than that.

6224. What are the ordinary rates?—It is about 9s. just now, exclusive of the cost of the asylum buildings.

6225. Does the Government contribute to the maintenance of pauper lunatics boarded-out in the way you have described?—Yes.

6226. At the same rate as for those in lunatic asylums?—The Government contributes one-half of the cost of the maintenance of persons boarded-out in private houses.

6227. And in lunatic asylums, what is the contribution?—It is nearly one-half. That is to say so far as the fixed sum which is applicable will go. If it be not sufficient to pay one-half, then it is allocated in proportion.

6228. And if it is more than sufficient to pay one-half?—In that case my impression is that it is repaid to the Local Taxation Account. I brought with me a book to show you what kind of a record is kept in one of these houses where persons are kept, and I also brought copies of the forms of application, and of things of that kind. I shall be glad to hand them in.

6229. (The Chairman.) Thanks. These can go into the appendix along with the accurate technical statement, which, in order to be drawn up, will entail access to the books of your Board.

6230. (By Miss Stevenson.) I understand that in those cases, where you sanction a home for the reception of persons suffering from incipient lunacy, there is no visitation or inspection on the part of the Board?—In the case of a six months' certificate, which I presume you allude to, the patient does not become registered as a lunatic, and it is not necessary to intimate to our Board the fact of his being received into a home.

6231. And there is therefore no official supervision?—There is no supervision, so far as we are concerned, at all.

6232. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You spoke about inspection within six months in the case of persons boarded-out. Were these not Board Inspections?—These are inspections by the medical officer of the parish. The Deputy Commissioner in Lunacy, who is an officer of the Board, also visits once a year, or he may visit at any time, if he doubts whether things are going properly. We have a record of every one of the somewhat over 2,500 lunatics in private houses.

6233. (By the Chairman.) How many private dwellings have you in which persons are so boarded-out?—They will be something like 2,000 in number.

6234. Do you differentiate between the dwellings of friends and those of strangers—of the cases where the patient is boarded with friends, or in their own family, and where the residence is with strangers?—Yes; certainly we do. It would not be easy to tell how many of the whole number are single patient houses, and how many are houses receiving more than one—from two to four. But we can tell at once how many of the guardians are relatives, and how many are strangers. On 1st January of this year 991 pauper lunatics were boarded with relatives, and 1574 were with strangers. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. John Sibbald.

30 Nov. 1894.

Mr. John Martin.

MR. JOHN MARTIN, called in and examined.

Mr. John Martin.

6235. (By the Chairman.) You are a missionary in Edinburgh?—Yes.

6235A. We were told that you had been present at a meeting of drunkards, or reclaimed drunkards, at which the question of the confinement of habitual drunkards was discussed?—Yes.

6236. Tell the Committee please what you know. An expression of public opinion from such a body is very interesting?—Well, a week last Monday night, I was in our Reading and Recreation Rooms in the Canongate. I went there about half past seven o'clock when there would be close upon 100 men present drawn from model lodging-houses, &c.—either drunkards or likely to become habitual drunkards—and I asked them if they would give me half an hour to discuss with them the best method of treating habitual drunkards. At first there was a little resentment which arose out of their thinking that they were to be treated as criminals. But when I explained to them that they would be treated from a medical stand-point, they at once started to discuss the question, and after a good deal of discussion I put it to the meeting that habitual drunkards be treated irrespective of their own wills; and at once it was unanimously agreed that this would be a great blessing to habitual drunkards.

6237. Was there a discussion on the subject?—Yes.

6238. Was there any amendment moved?—No, no amendment was proposed. There was one point raised, however, which I may mention. One of the audience stated that the cause of a great deal of drinking,

Mr. John
Martin.

30 Nov. 1894.

and the making of many habitual drunkards, was the credit given by publicans and licensed grocers.

6238A. But how does that pay. The debts would not be recovered?—I have had 14 years' experience—for seven years I was employed in a public work where 2000 men were employed—and I never knew one of the men who got credit from a publican but looked upon it as a debt of honour; and with them the first thing paid was the publican's bill.

6239. That is a matter which the man must judge for himself. But you are aware that the publican cannot recover the debt?—No, but it would be a good thing to make it illegal for publicans, and especially for licensed grocers, to give credit in this way. After the meeting, one of the men followed me, and stated that he had a wife who was an habitual drunkard, and that his wages had been arrested for a licensed grocer's debt which included an item of 11s. 5d. for 'sugar,' which meant drink. I think that if this system of credit could be made illegal, then it would be the means of stopping, to a great extent, habitual drunkenness.

6240. What was the amount of the man's wages?—30s. a week. He was a slater.

6240A. If they had been a little less they could not have been arrested, so that, practically, everything the law can do in that direction has been done. A man or woman cannot be imprisoned for debt, and the wages cannot be arrested, below an alimentary amount?—Still it might be made illegal for publicans and licensed grocers to give credit with the risk of losing their licenses. That would stop the practice.

6241. I am afraid you cannot make that illegal. But to return to the meeting of which we were speaking. Did any of the speakers in the discussion admit having had any experience of detention in prison or in places of that sort?—No.

6242. Was it an intelligent audience?—Yes.

6243. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You stated that you made the proposal at the meeting first of all. You were the first to speak of compulsory detention, and then you added that this was unanimously adopted at once. Did the men adopt that before the discussion took place?—No; it was after the discussion that the motion was put to the meeting. I may explain that I have had nearly 3000 pledges within the last 12 months, and the feeling amongst the habitual drunkards of that number is that it would be a good thing if something were done to have them removed for some time from their source of temptation. I have made that question a particular point of inquiry. [The witness then withdrew.]

Martin.

30 Nov. 1894.

Mr. W.
Kinnaird
Rose.

MR. W. KINNAIRD ROSE, Advocate, called in and examined.

Mr. W.
Kinnaird
Rose.

6244. (By the Chairman.) You are a member of the Scottish Bar?—Yes.

6244A. You have been out in the Australian colonies?—Yes; I am a barrister also of the Queensland Bar.

6245. When in Queensland, you were, I think, appointed a Commissioner to inquire into the treatment of prisoners and convicts?—Yes.

6246. Will you tell us the exact nature of the remit to that Commission?—It was to inquire into the condition of the penal establishments, jails, and lock-ups in Queensland, and into the general condition of crime throughout the colony, and of the prisoners who were incarcerated in the penal establishments and jails there.

6247. Our remit extends to habitual offenders, especially vagrants, beggars, and inebriates?—Our remit covered them also. One branch of the inquiry which I specially made was in connection with what are called therethe recidivists—persons within the penal establishments, jails, and lock-ups who had been convicted more than once, not necessarily of drunkenness, but of crimes and offences.

6248. What sort of sentence for petty offences do you give these people in the colonies as compared with the sentences in this country—longer or shorter?—I should say that they are much the same as here. But in first cases and light offences, the tendency, I think, would be to make the sentences rather lighter than in this country, especially in the case of drunkards.

6249. You know the state of the Scottish law, and you will know also the state of the law in Queensland. Mention please to the Committee any striking differences, as regards petty offences especially? You have got no such elaborate Police Acts as afford ground for the discovery of so many prisoners that we have in this country?—There is a very elaborate Justices' Act which refers to the detention and punishment of petty offences—petty thefts and the like—also offences against the person and against society—by that I mean social offences. Drunkenness may be taken as an instance of that class of offences. I may say that the experience, so far as the problem of dealing with habitual drunkards there is concerned, is a very striking and a very important one.

6250. Did you report on habitual drunkenness?—No; not specially on habitual drunkards. But there are special laws dealing with them. For example, in 1885 a law was passed in Queensland, which provided that "upon proof being made to any police magistrate, or any two justices, that any person by, or in consequence of the excessive use of liquor, mispends, wastes or lessens his estate, or injures or endangers his health, or injures or endangers the health of any other person, 'such police magistrate or justices shall by order under his or their hand, published twice in one or more newspapers usually circulating in the district, forbid all licensees and dealers in liquor and all other persons within the district to give, sell, or supply liquor to any such person,' for such period to be specified in the order as the magistrate or the justices may think fit". In so far as its effects on habitual drunkards are concerned, the operation of that law has been very striking.

6251. Before we leave that point. You say that applies to persons not only 'injuring or endangering their own health,' but 'injuring and endangering the health of others.' Yes, that refers in effect to the wives and children of this class, who may be habitually ill-treated especially, or persistently neglected. And the second sub-section of the clause is—'Any person who knowingly gives, sells, or supplies any liquor, to or for the use of a person in respect of whom such an order has been made, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £20, and not less than £5, and shall be further liable to make good any damage done by the person with respect to whom the order was made while he is in a state of intoxication consequent upon being so supplied with liquor.'

6252. Any imprisonment provided for?—No; there is no imprisonment. For the second offence the maximum is £20, and the minimum £10, and on the third offence the party, if he be a license holder, loses his license altogether.

6253. The provision you have read of the Act applies not only to a licensed person but to any person?—Yes; but so far as the former person is concerned repeated offence against the laws entails the forfeiture of the license.

6253A. But do the habituels not manage to get round the law in some way?—In large towns such as Brisbane, which is the capital of Queensland, they do manage to get liquor by going to a distant suburban part of the town where they may not be known.

6253B. Could the thing not be managed by the 'habitual' giving a small boy a shilling to go and get him liquor at the publican's or the grocer's. In that case the small boy would be liable to a penalty of £5 or £10, and you cannot get at the man?—That just opens up another point. By the same Act, no licensee dare, under a penalty of £5, supply any liquor to any boy or girl under fourteen years of age.

6253C. Yes; but there is some similar enactment in our own law, is there not?—Yes.

6253D. And it has been rendered futile because it

Mr. W.
Kinnaird
Rose.

30 Nov. 1894.

has been contended that it does not apply to a boy or girl who has been sent as a messenger!—But it does not matter in Queensland in what capacity the boy or girl acts. And further, the Queensland law makes it an offence punishable by a fine of £5, to supply any kind of liquor whatever to a youth or girl for consumption on the premises, where they are under 18 years of age. When this law came into operation in 1886, it had a most remarkable effect. People who had opposed the Bill when it was passing through Parliament, testified to me all over the Colony their conviction that it had resulted in a most remarkable benefit.

6253k. What was the date of your Commission?—1887.

6253f. That was the year after the passing of that Act?—Yes.

6253g. So that you would hear a great deal about its effects?—Yes.

6253h. Have you any statistics bearing upon that, or are there any in the report of your Commission?—We had no statistics for that particular year. The statistics that I went through did not bear upon that law. But the statistics of the Colony now-a-days will show the effects of its passing.

6253i. The Police Authorities were strongly in favour of the passing of that Act?—Yes; the general evidence from the police magistrates, from the Justices of the Peace, and even from the licensed victuallers, was in favour of the legislation. I may say, however, as to the licensing system in the Colony, that in the first instance, no person can sell liquor at all, unless as a first condition he has five bedrooms, and serves three hot meals a day.

6253k. Is it something of the Gothenburg system merged into the Colonies?—Only so far as the supply of food is concerned. I may say that immediately before the passing of the Act, on account of the facilities that were given for the supply of liquor, especially to women—very much like the system of grocers' licenses that we have here—the proportion of habitual offenders committed to prison rose to one in five of the total number of prisoners; and the proportion of female recidivists to males was as one to two, which is very much higher than either in the United States or this country.

6254. Did you find that you had a number of habitual offenders who had been in jail 100, or it might be, 200 times?—Well, up to a great many times at any rate, and those were met with in the large towns especially.

6255. These were for petty offences, otherwise the sentences would have been longer, and they would not have been before the Court so often?—That is so.

6256. Take the case of these very frequent convictions—did your Commission make any proposal to deal with that class?—We did not make any special recommendations in our report for dealing with them; but at a later period I impressed upon the Government, both in the capacity of a Commissioner, and also as the editor of the leading daily paper in the Colony for some years, the absolute necessity of the establishment of an Inebriate Home or Asylum, and Sir Samuel Griffith, who was Premier—he is now Chief Justice of the Colony—entertained the proposal very warmly, and business only prevented a Bill for the purpose being passed. But I believe, in fact I can say that I know from the newspapers I have had from the Colonies, that a Bill has been introduced this session for the establishment of an Inebriate Asylum.

6257. I am not speaking about the inebriates, but of those who are committed for being drunk and incapable, for petty assaults, for disorderly conduct, for petty breaches of the peace, and so on, and who are constantly going back and forward to prison. You did not on the Commission have to deal with their cases?—No, not specially.

6258. In the Colonies, does such a class exist to such an extent as to be a nuisance.—Yes. The police magistrates in the metropolitan towns of Sydney, Melbourne, and Brisbane, are continually complaining of the nuisance that these people are, and they have long desiderated the power to commit them to an asylum where they might be treated from a medical point of view. In Queensland old friendless inebriates are frequently sent to Dunwich—a state benevolent asylum on an island in Moreton Bay where they are cared for, and of course saved from every temptation. They are, however, not detained there wholly against their will.

6259. You have in the Colony a great field for experiments. Have you ever tried, or did you recommend in connection with the prisoners generally—discharged convicts and so on—the provision of any intermediate Reclamatory Institution between the time of their being discharged from prison and their being let loose on society?—We did not take up that aspect of the question, or recommend anything, because we scarcely thought that it was within the scope of our Commission. But I can give you some information regarding that. We have a system in the Colony, when a prisoner is discharged, of giving him a gratuity. We recommended, that a system of earnings a species of wages for good conduct and for industry—a gratuity on the work overtaken in prison—should be adopted. That is now acted upon. Previously it was a simple gratuity, very much at the option of the Visiting Justice, who was a man of known philanthropic feeling. But he found, and Col. Ross, the Honourable Mr. Morton, and I myself, for I made inquiries, found that the payment of this gratuity personally to the convict on his discharge was a mistake, because, unless it was seized and taken care of, the gratuity very frequently disappeared that same day, and possibly he might be landed in the police office that night.

6260. And what then did you recommend?—We did recommend that the gratuity should be paid, not directly to the convict on his release, but through a Prisoners' Aid Society.

6261. That was a recommendation based upon the practice then existing in England?—That is so. I may say that the Salvation Army established a Prison Gate Brigade, and the amount of good they did was something marvellous. So striking was it, indeed, in the Colonies, but more especially in Queensland, that the Government have come forward voluntarily and subsidised the Salvation Army. The Brigade takes charge of the men and the women on their discharge. The Army has Homes out in the country; and in one district they have established a Farm Colony to which they send these men who may be willing to trust themselves to them.

6262. Let us be accurate. Does the Government subsidise the Salvation Army as a Salvation Army, or in respect of this Prison Gate work?—I suppose the Government subsidises it as a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society.

6263. So that it is subsidised on precisely the same footing as any other society of the sort?—Yes; but they have been specially successful in their efforts.

6264. Yes; but what I wish to know is whether it was any special grant to the Salvation Army, or a development of the system of developing Aid Societies?—Certainly, the subsidy was given to the Salvation Army qua a Salvation Army because they had shown their phenomenal success in dealing with released prisoners, and taking charge of them in a common-sense way by taking them away to this farm in the country. And moreover, they secure for the men after they are perfectly reclaimed, situations. I have known cases myself in which men have become honoured members of society after passing through their hands—men who have been prisoners in St. Helena.

6265. Of course in the Colony men have a better chance of getting on their feet again than in a country like this?—Yes; but bearing on that, I may state that while here a discharged prisoner gets out under the First Offenders Act, in the Colony we have what is known as the Offenders Probation Act; and if a man is discharged under the Offenders Probation Act he has to report himself to the Chief of Police once in three months; but, and this is the point, he need not so report himself personally, it will do if he report himself by letter. And that is a great advantage I think,

Mr. W.
Kinnaird
Rose.

because, if he does it personally, the fact gets known some way or other that he is a discharged prisoner, and he is shrunk from.

6266. That refers almost exclusively to convicts—the same as our ticket-of-leave, is it not?—No, not altogether. It also refers to first offenders released under the Offenders Probation Act and who therefore escape the prison stamp.

6267. Had you, during your inquiries, the matter of vagrancy brought under your notice?—No. We have, I may say, no vagrants; unless the class known as ‘Sundowners.’ The climate is so beautiful that half the population are in a sense vagrants.

6268. Do you happen to have a copy of the Commission’s report?—Yes, and I shall let you have it.

6269. Is there any other point that occurs to you?—I only wish to emphasise the benefit that has followed the giving of this power to magistrates or justices to make an order prohibiting any licensee or any other person giving liquor to an habitual drunkard. The provision is contained in the 70th and 71st sections of the 1885 Act.

6270. (By Col. M’Hardy.) Have you got statistics, or can you get hold of statistics, showing the practical result of the passing of that Act?—I have not them, but they can be got by application to the Queensland Government Office.

6271. What would the paper be that contained them?—The paper would be ‘the statistical returns of the Commissioner of Police from 1885 or 1886.’

6272. Have you any idea of the police force in the Colonies?—I mean as to their numbers and the average population to each constable?—I knew, but I could not say now offhand.

6273. In the large towns of Queensland is there anything like the proportion of police that we have in this country?—The police in the capital of the Colony, and in the large towns, are quite equal to what we have here. My general recollection is to that effect.

6274. There is no legislation in the Colonies giving the authorities power to take care of the habitual petty offender, and to confine him in a Retreat for some time?—No; but there is a demand for such powers by the Police Magistrates.

6274A. I understand, so far as your statement goes, that in regard to petty offenders Queensland is in much the same position as this country is?—Yes, in regard to petty offences. But as to habitual inebriates a Bill has been introduced this year setting up public establishments with two departments—one to which people of respectability can be sent on payment, and the other where the police magistrate can send these inebriates rather than to jail. The Act to which I refer is the Inebriate Asylums Act (Queensland).

6275. (By Miss Stevenson.) You spoke of the subsidy given by the Government to the Salvation Army in respect of its work among the discharged prisoners. Is that subsidy given in any particular proportion. I mean is it paid in respect of the separate amount spent on each individual prisoner, or is it simply an annual contribution?—It is an annual contribution to the funds of the Salvation Army to enable them to conduct their prison gate work.

6276. It is not in proportion to what they spend on each prisoner as the Government allowance in this country is paid to the Discharged Prisoners’ Aid Societies?—No, it is an addition to the government allowances or gratuities to the prisoners.

6277. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you, in the Colony of Queensland, put any restriction on pawnbrokers in their dealings with an habitual drunkard, as well as on the publicans?—The pawnbroker is prohibited from receiving anything from a certified drunkard—one about whom an order has been issued. You see the magistrate’s order as to an habitual drunkard is published in the newspapers, and the pawnbroker must take note of these orders, and give no advance on anything that such a person or anyone representing him brings.

6278. I suppose we can get from the Agent General the police reports for the last eight years?—I suppose so.

6279. Do you know anything about the Tyson or such ‘cures’?—No.

6280. Do you believe in any of these nostrums?—No; a stay in the bush is the best.

6281. (By the Chairman.) Do you employ whipping for juvenile offenders?—The birch? yes, they employ it very frequently; and the lash for other offenders very frequently too. We recommended its abolition on the ground that it simply brutalised the prisoners without doing any good whatever; or its administration by order only of the Supreme Court and under very special circumstances and due supervision.

6282. Did you make any recommendation about the birch?—No.

6283. How do they deal there with juvenile female offenders?—There are Reformatories to which they are sent, but I am no great believer in Reformatories myself. I believe in sending children away from the influences of their vicious parents, to the country, where they can be put on farms. A boy, unless vicious from heredity, gets into mischief only through high spirits; if you take him away he becomes in the end a respectable member of society.

6284. But the problem is to deal with the boy who has done something that can’t be passed over in such a way that permanent injury will not be done to him. They have no particular mode of treating such offenders in Queensland?—No, except sending the boys to the boys’ Reformatories, and the girls to theirs.

6285. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you, from your colonial experience, a believer in inebriate Retreats?—Yes.

6286. Have you, in Queensland, Retreats for the poor as well as for the rich?—None existed while I was there. We had then no compulsory Retreats. I remember the case of a woman of good standing in society who fell into the inebriate habit. Her friends sent her to several Homes, but it was no use. They had no power to detain her, and she left the Homes to get drunk.

6287. What kind of Homes or Retreats were these? They were voluntary Retreats.

6288. Were they licensed?—No; there are no licensed Retreats in Queensland.

6289. What is the mode of employment for people in such Retreats?—There is no employment for the well-to-do, except to attempt to keep them in lively society and make life interesting for them. They ride about too in the bush.

6290. Do you believe in work for them?—Yes; I do. [The witness then withdrew.]

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Perth, Monday, 10th December, 1894.

PRESENT:—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MR. JOHN ALEXANDER DEWAR, Lord Provost of Perth, called in and examined.

Mr. John
Alexander
Dewar.

Mr. John
Alexander
Dewar.

10 Dec. 1894.

10 Dec. 1894.

6291. (By the Chairman.) You are Lord Provost of Perth?—Yes.

6292. Have you had any experience in trying these offences into which we are inquiring?—No; I have not been a bailie.

6293. But you know the system?—Yes.

6294. You work under the general Police Act?—Yes.

6295. Can you give us any information about vagrancy?—We have a great many vagrants in the county, as it is on their way from Glasgow to Dundee. We have a Shelter in the town, where we provide for female tramps.

6296. Is it a municipal institution?—No; it is maintained by private subscription.

6297. Is it largely utilised?—I do not know, it may have perhaps six or eight every night.

6298. As to the male tramps?—I think the chief constable has power to send them to the model lodging-house, if they are absolutely destitute.

6299. Is it a municipal institution?—No, it is managed by a committee.

6300. Are these people permanent residents in the county?—Some of them are, but the Chief Constable will be able to tell you better about that.

6301. Are you much troubled with the vagrants in Perth?—It seems to me there are a good many, but I am not acquainted with the facts. From personal observation, however, in driving on the road between Perth and Dundee, I have passed a great many tramps—quite an abnormal number.

6302. Do they give rise to much complaint on the part of the inhabitants?—No, I think not.

6303. There is one feature about Perth which seems remarkable, and that is that there has been a very large increase of apprehensions for breach of the peace, disorderly conduct, petty assault, and drunk and incapable, between 1880 and 1893. In Perth that increase has been no less than 80 per cent. How do you account for that?—The attention of the magistrates has never been drawn to it. It may be due to the fact that we have got a new Chief Constable—a younger man than the last.

6304. In 1891 the number of apprehensions was 650, and in 1893 it was 943?—That just covers the time of the change in the Chief Constable.

6305. Coincident with this increased number of apprehensions, have you noticed any marked improvement in public order?—It is not very marked, but I think it is better under the present Chief Constable.

6306. Have you cells here?—Yes, but only for prisoners until they are tried, and then they are sent to the General Prison.

6307. Have you many juvenile offenders?—An average number.

6308. Another peculiarity about Perth is that the percentage of apprehensions for the crimes enumerated is rather high—being 31 per thousand of the population, while in Edinburgh it is only 24. Can you explain that?—No, I cannot explain it.

6309. You have a good many public works in Perth?—No; very few. The principal one is Puller's, but they are a very good class of workers. We have a considerable agricultural population. To-day, for instance, at the Police Court, there was a case of six men who had been at a wedding on Friday night, and had got drunk. They were taken up, but it was their first offence, and they said it would be their last.

6310. What was done with the case?—They left a pledge of 15s. on Saturday night, and they were fined 7s. 6d. this morning. If they had not turned up, the pledge would have been forfeited.

6311. Do you think that system of forfeiting pledges a sufficient punishment?—Yes, for cases of that kind.

6312. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Can you suggest any remedy for the evils associated with drunkenness in Perth?—No. I may say that I am a distiller, and may not perhaps be thought an impartial witness on this subject, but I think the supplying of liquor to habitual drunkards should be severely visited upon the publican.

6313. You think that if a man were certified as an habitual drunkard, the vendors of liquor should be prohibited from supplying him?—Yes.

6314. Would you deal with the pawnbroker in the same way?—I have been talking with the Chief Constable on the subject, and he thinks pawnbrokers should be prohibited from taking small articles, such as clothing, in pledge.

6315. (By the Chairman.) Would it be feasible in a town like Perth to get at the publican who, knowingly, supplied a habitual drunkard?—I think it might be feasible in the smaller towns.

6316. Would it not be difficult to prevent a prescribed man from being supplied?—It would, for of course he could send for it.

6317. (By Dr. Sutherland.) As a distiller, do you think there is anything in the age of whisky?—I was always of opinion that new whisky was more poisonous than old. It is certainly less palatable; but at the recent Commission which sat on the subject, it was said that they were both much alike in their effects.

6318. (By the Chairman.) What would you do with habitual drunkards?—I am quite of opinion that habitual drunkards who came before the Police Court ought to be locked up, and that is the opinion of the whole of the magistrates.

6319. How would you work that out?—Through institutions for their confinement.

6319A. How would such institutions be maintained?—By the same bodies who maintain the police—the municipalities and the Government.

6320. Would you not find it difficult to divide the expense between the municipality and the Government?—We find it very difficult to get the Government to do anything.

6321. Another party interested is the Parochial Board?—The funds of the Parochial Boards are provided much in the same way as the police funds.

6322. To simplify the matter, you would require to have a retreat in each place for these people. If you had a central retreat how would you allocate the expense?—So much per head charged against the locality. I think the public are bound to provide for derelicts and these people who go wrong, and it would be a saving in police expenditure. One bailie said to me that, if he had the chance of locking up 30 or 40 people in Perth, there would be no Police Court needed at all. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. John
Macpherson.

10 Dec. 1894.

MR. JOHN MACPHERSON, Chief Constable of Perthshire, called in and examined.

Mr. John
Macpherson.

10 Dec. 1894.

6323. (By the Chairman). How long have you been Chief Constable of Perthshire?—For 8 years, and I have been 32 years in the police force of the county.

6324. You have always been in the county?—Yes, and I have been through all the grades in the service.

6325. According to your report, the number of habitual offenders in Perthshire is small.

6326. Do you think that drunkenness is always the cause of repeated offences?—Yes.

6327. You think that the short sentence system is useless for dealing with that class?—Yes; that is my opinion.

6328. And you recommend cumulative sentences for these offences?—I do.

6329. I observe from the statistics before us that there has been a great rise in the number of apprehensions for breach of the peace, disorderly conduct, petty assault, and drunk and incapable in the burgh of Perth. Can you explain that?—I cannot speak for the burgh, but only for the county.

6330. You have a lot of vagrants in the county?—A very large number.

6331. And of that class a large number are tinkers?—Yes.

6332. Are they gipsies?—Well, quasi-gipsies.

6333. And they are distinct from the ordinary tramping vagrant?—Quite distinct.

6334. Are they migratory, and do they vary in numbers from time to time?—They do.

6335. How many gipsy families are there living in the county?—Forty-four families. There are 49 adult males and 47 adult females—a total of 96 adults; and of children under 14 years of age there are 63 boys and 51 girls—a total of 114 children.

6336. Making a grand total of 210?—Yes.

6337. Do you know anything about the state of the education of these children?—They have no education whatever.

6338. Do they not profess to attend the schools?—No, they make no real home in any parish.

6339. What districts of the county do they chiefly frequent?—The Highland districts.

6340. And they are always in Perthshire except when they make short expeditions into the neighbouring counties?—Yes.

6341. Describe their mode of living?—They live principally by begging, and dwell in small primitive tents.

6342. Do they move about?—They probably stay a day or so in one place.

6343. Do they annoy the inhabitants?—Very seldom.

6344. Do they steal?—No, they have seldom been known to steal, and as long as they keep away from strong drink they are, leaving begging aside, well-behaved, quiet and orderly. They are affectionate and fond of their children, and do not ill-treat them, but when they get drunk they quarrel, and the police have to interfere, and arrest the ringleaders for breach of the peace.

6345. In connection with these rows, have you ever any serious crime?—No, very seldom.

6346. How do they fight?—Just with their fists.

6347. In your experience, have there been any serious results from the quarrels?—Two years ago we had one case of culpable homicide; but, generally speaking, they do not hurt each other much. They are generally too drunk.

6348. You do not think anything can be done in the way of reforming the adults?—I think it is hopeless.

6349. What do you suggest?—I think their condition would be vastly improved were the present system of camping-out prohibited, and something in the way of parochial shelters provided instead. I would also prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor to them, unless prescribed by a medical practitioner.

6350. But you have power at present to deal with the system of camping-out?—Yes, if they have not permission. But, if the occupier of the land gives permission, we are powerless; and permission is always given.

6351. Would you propose to make it illegal for a proprietor or tenant to give the use of his land for such purposes?—Yes, for these small tents.

6352. If a man had a gipsy cart, would you allow the tenant to draw up his cart and live in it?—I would; but, as a rule, tinkers have no carts.

6353. What about the children?—I think the only way of dealing with them is, after having them compulsorily educated, to send them away out of reach of their tribe. I am certain that, if allowed to join their friends, even after spending some years in an Industrial School, they will just relapse into their old habits.

6354. Do many of them find their way into Industrial Schools at present?—Comparatively few.

6355. I suppose they are only sent there when their parents get into trouble?—That is so.

6356. You have used the word 'tribe.' Are they different families?—I mean the family groups.

6357. What are the principal names here?—Reid, Townsley, Macgregor, McCallum, White, Macdonald, and Johnstone.

6358. Do you think the gipsy is quite a different race from the ordinary vagrant?—Yes; it is ingrained in him, and it will take about a couple of generations to tame down his roving spirit.

6359. Have you many complaints from the inhabitants about the gipsies?—They complain generally, but not against any special person.

6360. What sort of begging is it they pursue—soliciting alms or masterful begging?—Soliciting, and not masterful begging.

6361. Have you any complaints of their invading farms, and smoking, and that sort of thing?—No, not of the tinkers.

6362. As to the ordinary tramp, is the county infested with them?—Yes, particularly in the summer months.

6363. To what do you ascribe that?—One thing is, that I think the Perthshire people are a little soft-hearted towards tramps and tinkers, and that encourages them to a certain extent.

6364. The Lord Provost told us that Perth was visited on the way between Dundee and Glasgow?—That is so.

6365. Do they work?—Some of them may be workmen out of employment and in search of work, but the great majority are simply sturdy, able-bodied persons who live by begging, under the plea of looking for work; the real fact being that they don't want work, and won't work when they can get it. They prefer to live a lazy, idle, vagabond life.

6366. How do you think vagrancy should be dealt with?—I think it should be dealt with as in itself criminal, and its punishment made certain and severe.

6367. But have you not powers under the Trespass Act for dealing with them?—That Act does not cover the case. It only applies when they are found camping without permission.

6368. Have you a little book which the Chief Constables of some other counties have?—Yes.

6369. There is a clause which applies to 'any person who lodges in any premises without permission?—We always enforce that clause.

6370. We were told by one Chief Constable that that conferred ample powers for dealing with vagrants?—No, because if the farmer gives authority to lodge him, the tramp is all right. My experience of them is that they do not lodge without permission.

6371. Do they go about stackyards?—Very little, but when they do the police always arrest them.

6372. How many vagrants have you arrested during any period for which you have statistics?—The number of tinkers arrested in 1893 was 60, and of vagrants 123.

6373. How are they dealt with?—By very small fines. The usual fine for begging is 5s. or three days.

6374. I suppose they generally take the three days?—Almost always.

6375. What is your punishment for drunkenness?—For the first offence, 10s. or seven days; for the second offence, 15s. or ten days; and for the third offence, 20s. or fourteen days.

Mr. John
Macpherson.

10 Dec. 1894.

6376. What was the total number of your apprehensions in 1893?—736 males and 279 females—a total of 954.

6377. Do you think that vagrancy gives you an undue amount of trouble?—There is no doubt of that.

6378. You made a pretty considerable number of arrests of vagrants. I suppose a number would be under the Trespass Act?—No, none of them.

6379. You suggest that it would be necessary to make some provision for the honest workman on tramp in search of work?—Yes.

6380. In what way would you do that?—By having special certificates made available whereby the honest workman could be identified and employed.

6381. Has anything of that kind been attempted here?—Nothing.

6382. I believe that some arrangement of the sort prevails in Ayrshire?—I believe there is a Mendicity Society there, but I don't think they give certificates for respectable workmen.

6383. How would you work that certificate?—The man would call on the Inspector of Poor of the parish where he was last working, and would get a certificate, by means of which he would be passed on by the other inspectors of parishes to where he had reasonable hope of getting employment.

6384. And meantime he would be relieved?—Yes.

6385. But, if he was able-bodied, he could not be relieved under the Scotch Law?—Not unless provision was made for it.

6386. Then you contemplate legislation for that purpose?—I hope so.

6387. You also suggest that provision should be made for the care of the aged and infirm vagrants, and for the care and education of children whose parents are unable to maintain them without resort to begging. Do you mean more provision than exists at present?—Yes.

6388. Have you not provision for the aged and infirm vagrants in the poorhouse? The inspector of each parish is bound to supply his wants?—Well, he does not do it.

6389. What becomes of them?—I cannot tell.

6390. Do you know instances of such vagrants applying for assistance to Parochial Inspectors and being refused?—No.

6391. Then, if these vagrants do not wish to give up their children, do you propose to have them compulsorily taken from them?—If they could not support the children except by begging, I would certainly do so.

6392. Your census of the number of vagrants and beggars from 1889 to 1893 shows that the tramps are on the increase?—No, I think they are about stationary.

6393. In June 1889, you say that the total number of tramps was 496, while, in the same month of 1893, the number had risen to 538. In December 1889 the number was 465, and in December 1893 it had fallen to 439?—Yes. The summer census is always about 100 over the winter census.

6394. You mention that in June 1893 there were 106 children embraced in the number of tramps?—Yes.

6395. That is a larger number than in December of that year?—Yes, in 1893 there were 106 children in June against 83 in December.

6396. I suppose these children received no education while their parents were on the tramp?—None whatever.

6397. And you suspect that in a number of cases the parents are permanent vagrants?—Yes.

6398. And that their children receive no instruction?—None whatever.

6399. In your table of arrests the number in 1865 is given as 256; in 1875, 628; in 1885, 825; and in 1893, 1086. Is the rise from 825 to 1086 in the course of eight years not very considerable?—Yes.

6400. To what do you attribute that rise?—In this county we have a number of burghs in which Police Courts have been established, and the minor cases are all prosecuted now, and they swell the returns.

6401. Has the number been much increased since the recent Police Act came into force?—Nothing to speak of.

6402. Are you familiar with the Burghs Police Act?—Generally.

6403. A recommendation was made to us that the powers of the Burghs Police Act respecting drunkenness and vagrancy should be applied to the counties. Do you agree with that?—I would strongly recommend it.

6404. There is a special clause about drunkenness in that Act and another about vagrancy. Do you remember what they are?—Yes. Our bye-laws contain practically the clauses of the Burghs Police Act.

6405. And you have had no difficulty about these bye-laws?—None whatever.

6406. We were told by another Chief Constable that their bye-laws were thrown out by the Court of Session as ultra vires?—Yes, I know that decision of Lord Young's.

6406A. Was it before or since you made your bye-laws?—Our bye-laws were passed before the decision.

6407. And they have never been challenged as ultra vires?—Never.

6408. Would you please read these bye-laws?—They are 'bye-laws for the prevention of vagrancy made by the County Council of the County of Perth at statutory meeting on 13th October 1890, in terms of powers under section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1889,' and they enact:—

(1) 'All persons found begging, or exposing wounds or deformities, or exposing children of tender age to the inclemency of the weather, or placing themselves, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing, the giving of alms, and all persons conducting themselves as vagrants, having no fixed place of residence, and no lawful means of gaining their livelihood within the county, shall be guilty of an offence punishable, as hereinafter provided. (2) Parents of young persons, or other relations to whose control they are subject, by whom they have been sent or suffered to go out to beg, and also any other persons by whom such young persons have been so sent out to beg, shall be guilty of an offence punishable, as hereinafter provided. (3) Every person who commits any of the said offences may be apprehended by any constable, and shall on conviction be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and, failing payment thereof, with expenses, shall be liable to be imprisoned in terms of sub-section B of section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881. (4) It shall be lawful for any constable to apprehend and bring before the sheriff or any two justices of the peace all such beggars, vagrants, and idle poor persons, men, women, or children strolling or wandering or seeking relief, or found lying in any out-house, stair, close, or area, or other place within the county, and it shall be lawful for the sheriff or justices to direct and cause all such persons as may not at the time be convicted of begging and vagrancy, as hereinbefore provided, to be handed over to the Inspector of the Poor, or other official of the parish within which such person shall have been found, in order that their claim as paupers may be investigated and disposed of according to law.' These bye-laws were approved of and signed by Lord Lothian as Secretary for Scotland.

6409. Have you ever compared the first of these bye-laws with the one which the Court of Session held to be ultra vires?—Yes.

6410. Wherein does it differ?—I do not think it differs at all. But in the case in question the decision turned upon bill-sticking rather than begging.

6411. But the judge said the County Authorities must frame their bye-laws in order to be reasonable?—I am not aware of that. We have made no change in this county to bring the bye-laws up to what the judge indicated.

6412. Do you find your bye-laws to work well in practice?—Yes.

6413. They should give you control of the children of vagrants?—No, they only refer to children when not

Mr. John
Macpherson.

Mr. John Macpherson.
 30 Dec. 1894. a companioned by their parents. As a general rule, the children are not sent out to beg. The tramps are very careful not to allow the police to get hold of the children under these regulations.

6414. Then, do you think these powers are sufficient?—They are very well, so far as they go, but, unfortunately, the people of Perthshire are too kind-hearted, and, although they complain about beggars, they won't complain about any particular case, and the beggars escape.

6415. How many of the tinkers and vagrants would be arrested for begging?—There were 18 in 1883.

6416. What do you do with your prisoners in the county, if a constable picks up a drunk man?—He is taken to the nearest police office.

6417. If it is on a Saturday night, what do you do with him?—He is locked up till Monday morning, and is then conveyed to Perth, where he is tried before the sheriff.

6418. Do you deal in pledges?—Yes, if they can raise them.

6419. If a drunk farm servant were brought up, and the officer on duty should find 5s. in his pocket, would he be released?—Yes, when sober, and he would be cited there and then to appear on a certain date.

6420. You do not consider the offence purged by the pledge?—No, we always cite them.

6421. Has it a good effect?—It has.

6422. Are you aware that it is the practice in Burghs to allow men to forfeit their pledges and say no more about it?—Yes; but that is not the practice in this county.

6423. And you think the citation has a good and deterrent effect?—I do.

6424. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Have you more gipsies in Perthshire than in other counties?—I cannot say.

6425. Do you think they are increasing in numbers?—No, I think not.

6426. Or diminishing?—I think they are diminishing.

6427. Why?—I cannot answer that question.

6428. Have the gipsies any other means of livelihood except begging?—The men do a little tinkering, and the wives go about selling the pots and pans.

6429. One witness in Edinburgh told us that the gipsies were very valuable at harvest time in doing a little work?—They do some harvest work in this county and some potato lifting.

6430. And in that way they make themselves useful members of the community?—To a certain extent.

6431. You say they have a moral code of their own?—Yes. They stick to each other as man and wife, and among them illegitimacy is almost unknown. They are very kind to their children and to each other when sober.

6432. Then you think that, within their own code, they are moral people?—Yes.

6433. Does that code of morality extend to stealing?—They very rarely steal.

6434. Or poach?—I never heard of them poaching.

6435. Then, the sole charge against the gipsy is that he gets drunk?—He always gets drunk when he can raise a few coppers.

6436. Is he more violent when drunk than the ordinary labouring man?—No, I do not think so.

6437. I suppose if people did not give him money, and were to boycott the gipsy, the begging would cease? Is it not the fault of the people themselves that the begging goes on?—Yes.

6438. Then, on the whole, the gipsy is not such a very formidable pest of society after all?—Certainly not, except that he is a persistent beggar and lives on the charity of the public.

6439. Is he a more persistent beggar than others?—I think the tramping vagabond is a more dangerous member of society than the gipsy.

6440. You are not very hopeful of being able to deal with the gipsy?—Not with the adult.

6441. Don't you think it would be a very strong order to prevent a man making what use he likes of his own ground by allowing gipsies to encamp on it?—

No doubt; but we will have to use strong measures if we are to do good to these people.

6442. Would you not require to make out a strong legal grievance?—Yes.

6443. Have you got that at present?—It appears to me a great evil that there should be this miserable camping out of men, women, and children all huddled together.

6444. Would you say the gipsy's life is unhealthy?—No, it is healthy.

6445. And they are healthy in their morals and do not do much harm?—It is a question of the survival of the fittest. The weakest die early, and those who survive are as strong as horses.

6446. Would you make it a penal offence for a landed proprietor to accommodate gipsies on his ground?—No doubt it would be very difficult to do so. Perhaps if some strong recommendation went out against any such practice it might have a very good effect.

6447. As regards the ordinary tramp, do you think you have more in Perthshire than in other counties?—I do. Perthshire is so central that they almost of necessity pass through it.

6448. Is that on account of the soft-hearted nature of the people?—I blame them for that.

6449. Do you get many complaints from farmers about the tramps?—Yes, they complain generally; but at the same time they have no wish to be witnesses against any poor person.

6450. Do they sustain any real damage from the tramp by the theft of farm produce?—No; but still they are a nuisance by going about the place and lying out in the fields. The farmers, however, won't send for the police.

6451. We have had some evidence from other witnesses of the burning down of stackyards and out-houses by tramps? Have you any experience of that?—No doubt we must lay some blame upon the tramping nuisance for that.

6452. But you have not been able to bring any case home?—No; but there was the case of a man recently, who was drunk at a farm in this neighbourhood, and he set fire to the straw, and the farmer had actually to pour water over the tramp to extinguish his burning clothes. It ended in very little, for he only got 55 days.

6453. Have you any suspicion that that particular case was due to accident or design?—I do not think it could be called purely wilful, but rather gross carelessness, in a drunk man lying down in a straw shed and lighting his pipe.

6454. Is it ever wilful in your district?—I am not aware that it has ever been wilful.

6455. (By Dr. Sutherland.) At what age do gipsies marry?—They marry very young—the girls at 17 or 18 and the men at about 20.

6456. What is the average size of the family?—Some of them are large—perhaps six, or seven, or eight—and others three or four.

6457. How, then, do you account for the population not increasing?—I think a number of the weakest children die from cold.

6458. Then the infant mortality is the reason for the gipsy population not increasing?—I cannot say exactly, but that is the inference.

6459. Do any gipsies die in the county?—Yes.

6460. Do they spread disease?—Not that I know of, but they must do it tramping about.

6461. Do you know that gipsies carry ferrets about with them?—I never heard of such a thing in this county.

6462. Have you known of any boys being sent from this county to the Mars Training Ship?—Yes.

6463. What was the result?—I am not aware that many of them have done well afterwards.

6464. Do you know of any coming back after four years in the Mars?—I could not tell at this moment.

6465. You say there are 114 gipsies in the county, and 60 apprehensions were made among these in the course of the year for drunkenness? Is that not a higher percentage than the arrests for drunkenness among the civil population?—Yes.

Mr. John Macpherson.
 10 Dec. 1894.

- Mr. John Macpherson.*
10 Dec. 1894.
6466. It is about one in two, while in the civil population the proportion is one in 30—so that they must be a considerable nuisance?—Undoubtedly.
6467. As regards tramps, 123 were apprehended out of a total of 780 apprehensions—that is also a high proportion?—Yes.
6468. What do you think of the gipsies failing to educate their children—should that not be made an offence?—No doubt; but they have no residence, and the School Board has no hold on them.
6469. Do you propose to take the children from them?—Yes, unless something were done in the way of getting them to settle down. I think the children ought to be educated compulsorily, if necessary.
6470. Have you any suggestions to make as to bringing the gipsies themselves into civilisation?—I think it is rather hopeless, unless something was done in the way of village shelters.
6471. Are you aware that, under the Police Act of 1892, the maximum punishment for aggravated drunkenness was 14 days' imprisonment?—That Act does not affect counties. I think the sentences should be made cumulative.
6472. What good result would you expect to get from giving a man, say, 30 days for drunkenness?—I can give you an instance of a man who has been 15 times convicted of drunkenness since 1885. He was always fined, until at last he got 30 days and was placed under £10 caution. Then he came on his good behaviour, but before that the fines did no good.
6473. (By the Chairman.) Are cases of finding caution for good behaviour common in Perthshire?—Yes.
6474. For how long?—Perhaps for six months.
6475. The ordinary class of habitual offenders could not find £10 caution?—Oh no. This was an otherwise respectable person. It would be utterly useless as regards tinkers, because they could not find the caution.
6476. And in the case of farm servants?—It is quite common with them, and works very well.
6477. Will you furnish the Secretary with a statement of the number of cases in which caution for good behaviour was ordered in 1893?—Yes.
6478. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would you not think £10 caution for six months an oppressive piece of legislation for the offence of drunkenness among the humbler members of society?—Yes, unless it was frequently committed.
6479. But for people who occasionally go astray?—I think if a man gets drunk repeatedly the sentence should be made higher and higher.
6480. The sole effect of the sentence is to deter the men?—Yes.
6481. Don't you find from experience, that for the ordinary decent citizen or rustic, who occasionally goes wrong, a few hours in a police cell, a few days' imprisonment, or a small fine is sufficient to deter him?—Imprisonment is, but not fines.
6482. Do you not find that, for the ordinary citizen who occasionally gets drunk and noisy, one sentence is enough for him?—Yes.
6483. And therefore it comes to this—that you wish exceptional legislation for the few people who are not deterred by a brief sentence or a small fine?—That is so.
6484. (By Miss Stevenson.) You say there is great difficulty in having the children of these gipsies educated. Are you aware of any instance in which any School Board in the county has ever tried to enforce the provisions of the Education Act with reference to these children?—I am not aware of any single instance.
6485. You know there is a provision in the Education Act by which parents are liable for the education of their children if they are within two miles distance from a school?—Yes.
6486. Would it not be possible, by an arrangement with smaller Boards, that these children should be traced from one part of the county to another?—I believe it is quite possible, but I am afraid that the parents of village children would object to send their children to schools where these vagrant children were.
- Mr. John Macpherson.*
10 Dec. 1894.
6487. Do you know if any of the provisions of the various Acts which deal with the casual employment of children in selling things have ever been put in force?—No.
6488. Do you know that, under the Industrial Schools Act any parent who allows his children to beg can be fined and the children sent to an Industrial School?—Yes, but the tinkers do not let their children beg.
6489. Have you any suggestions to make as to how these children should be dealt with?—I think something should be done in the way of sending them to an Industrial School, and I do not think the parents would object if they were allowed permission to come and see their children.
6490. Do you know that any person can bring up a child for begging?—Yes.
6491. Have the police authorities of Perth ever attempted to do it?—I issued a general order a few years ago on this very question, and explained thoroughly to the police the clauses of the Industrial Schools Act, but practically nothing came of it. I may read you one reply from the constable at Alyth in 1890. He writes:—'I beg to inform you that, acting in accordance with the general intimation issued, I, on 15th September last, found a girl between 12 and 13 years of age offering articles for sale and soliciting alms. She told me she had been sent out by her parents for that purpose, and she carried in her hands a few bread-toasters and a basket with bread and meat. I apprehended her, and charged her to the Procurator-Fiscal here, as coming clearly under the two first heads of the intimation issued by you. The Procurator-Fiscal had a conversation with the magistrates, and they declined to proceed with the case, because of the expense that would be incurred in sending the girl to an Industrial School. She was therefore charged with a contravention of the Pedlars' Act, to which she pleaded guilty, and was admonished.'
6492. Then there is a kind of provision which, if enforced, would do a great deal?—Yes, if the children are found begging.
6493. Is there any district of the county more frequented than another by these people?—They frequent the Highland parts most.
6494. You have no suggestions to make in regard to what should be done to these children, except separating them from their parents?—I am afraid not, unless the parents settle down in one place.
6495. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Has the increase in the number of apprehensions been coincident with the increase in the police force?—That is so.
6496. Has it been in the same proportion?—I have not examined it, but undoubtedly it has increased with the increase and efficiency of the force.
6497. You propose longer sentences for people charged with disorder—why do you say that?—Because I think that a small fine has no effect upon a man who is able to pay it.
6498. You know a good many convicts in the county?—Yes.
6499. Do you find among convicts that long sentences have the deterrent effect you expect among minor offenders?—There can be no doubt of it, among the habitual offenders.
6500. Are there not many re-convictions?—Yes.
6501. I suppose the proportion will be nearly as great as among the smaller offenders?—Yes.
6502. Have you justification, from the diminution of re-convictions after long sentences for ordinary crimes, in proposing an increase of the present sentences?—My opinion is, that a few shillings of a fine will never stop a man from repeating the offence of drunkenness, and I think a short time in prison does. If that does not do, give him a longer term next time.
6503. How far would you go?—Well, it is a very difficult question to answer, but if, after a few months' imprisonment, a man was not better, I would treat him in some other way, as if he were almost non compos mentis.

Mr. John
Macpherson.

10 Dec. 1894.

6504. What term would you give?—I think, after three or four convictions, he should get something like 60 days' imprisonment.

6505. And after that you would try something else?—Yes.

6506. Do you mean three or four convictions altogether, or within a year?—I think we must lay down some time; and after three or four convictions occurred in a year it would clearly show that the man was not improving, and that short sentences did not avail anything.

6507. The average population of this class of moving poor in Perthshire is something like 500?—Yes.

6508. How would you classify them?—I would say there were 200 tinkers.

6509. What do you mean by a tinker?—The gipsies we have been talking about.

6510. But the number of gipsies given in your return is only 96 adults and 114 children?—Yes.

6511. What is your next class?—The tramping vagrant.

6512. How many are there of them?—About 300, I should say, all told.

6513. What do you mean by a tramping vagrant?—A man who tramps about the country with no fixed abode, and no honest means of livelihood, and who obtains his living by begging.

6514. But are there not two or three kinds of that species of men—a sort of professional tramp, and then a large class of men travelling in search of work?—Yes.

6515. Well, I want you to split these tramping vagrants into two classes?—My opinion is that the honest workmen are comparatively small in number.

6516. Leave out the word 'honest'; how many will be travelling in search of work?—I could not answer that.

6517. But are they not a very distinct class from the professional vagrants who never work any, and who have been vagrants all their lives?—The line is not so distinctly drawn between them as between the gipsy and the vagrant.

6518. But the man who is travelling in search of work may, when he gets an opportunity to work, remain at it for a long time?—Yes.

6519. Your professional vagrant will not?—No, he never does.

6520. Cannot you separate them in your mind?—Not very well.

6521. Will they be half and half?—I really could not answer that, because the professional vagrant is always pretending that he is in search of work.

6522. At any rate, there is an increase between winter and summer of your vagrant population by a hundred?—Yes.

6523. To what class does that hundred belong?—They must be the vagrant class, because the tinkers are always with us.

6524. Are these hundred that come to you in the summer time professional vagrants, or men in search of work?—I would say the great majority of them are professional vagrants.

6525. When the numbers decrease in the winter, where do they go?—I presume they must go to the towns.

6526. According to your return, about 30 of them get into the hospitals and poorhouses in the winter time?—Yes.

6527. And 50 get into common lodging-houses and other houses?—Yes.

6528. Where are these common lodging-houses to which the 50 go?—All over the county.

6529. Are there common lodging-houses in the villages?—Yes.

6530. Are they private places?—A great number of them have no regulations and are under no control.

6531. How many are housed in each of these places?—One, two, and three of these tramps can be found there.

6532. Do these 80 people who remain in the county in the winter time, and go into quarters, not become amenable to the School Board?—Yes, if they stay.

6533. They may move from one common lodging-house to another?—That is so.

6534. The gipsies are more or less resident, I understand?—They are. They are fixed in the Highlands of the county and make small excursions into the adjoining counties.

6535. These excursions do not occupy the whole of the season?—Oh, no; they come back to their original spot.

6536. How does the professional vagrant move?—He moves forward in all directions. He is not resident at all, but simply passes through the county.

6537. Do they keep up certain fixed routes?—Yes.

6538. Are these the main roads, by Killin and Lochearnhead, going due north?—Yes.

6539. And the main Perth road?—Yes; that is an important one. And the one through central Perth, by Crieff and Dunkeld, Pitlochry and Blair Atholl.

6540. These are the main roads, which they must take if going north through Perthshire?—Yes.

6541. Is the man in search of work more of a resident?—He stays very little in Perthshire.

6542. You say that begging is not masterful, and that the people are good-natured and give them money; but does not that arise from this, that, if they do not give alms when they are asked, they run a certain risk, or have a feeling that they do, if they live in solitary houses in the country?—I agree with you.

6543. Is not that a universal feeling?—Yes, it is the feeling. I may explain that in a great many places in Perthshire—such as a cottar house—only one female may be found, and she does not like to run any risk in thwarting the desires of beggars.

6544. A lady in Glenlyon told me that she had as many as fourteen visits from tramps in one night. Is that common?—That is a very large number, but I quite believe it.

6545. She explained it by saying that a family would first send one, and after a brief interval a second, and then another, so that the takes of the family would be considerable?—That is so. [Witness then withdrew.]

Colonel
Williamson.

COL. WILLIAMSON of Lawers, Crieff, and a Deputation from the Perthshire Committee on Vagrancy, called in and examined.

Colonel
Williamson.

6546. (By the Chairman.) To Col. Williamson.—You are the Chairman of the Perthshire Committee on Vagrancy?—I represent the Chairman, Mr Grahame of Cultoquhey.

6547. When was the committee instituted?—At a public meeting in August last.

6548. Since then have you collected many details on the subject?—Yes, a considerable number. Our attention was particularly directed to the tinker families and their children.

6549. What is your estimate of their number?—We estimate that there are 210 tinkers altogether, including children.

6550. The Chief Constable has told us that the adults were not addicted to thieving or to masterful begging, or anything evil, except drunkenness, when they got a few coppers together, and that they are not more difficult to manage when drunk than the ordinary labourer—is that your experience?—I have lived in this county for 60 years, and I quite agree with that statement. I would go further and say they are more easily managed than worthless strollers who call themselves working people.

6551. The Chief Constable also says they do not poach—is that your experience?—My gamekeepers would rather manage the tinkers than any of the loafing communities of the village.

6552. Do you think they poach?—I do not think it.

Colonel
Williamson.
10 Dec. 1894.

6553. What about their children?—I think their life is an extremely hard one, and they deserve more pity and commiseration than any children we have in the country.

6554. What about their education?—They are devoid of education.

6555. What steps do the School Board take?—They find themselves absolutely paralysed in that direction.

6556. In consequence of the gipsies moving about?—Partly because of that; but the law gives the School Board no power to deal with these children.

6557. The Chief Constable mentioned the case of a child of one of the tinkers who was brought up, and the Fiscal and magistrates of Alyth refused to deal with the case, because of the expense that would be entailed on the town if the girl were sent to an Industrial School. So that, in the view of the Chief Constable, the law does give power?—It gives power, but the power cannot be applied. I believe that you could take these children, and educate them, but you cannot apply the law to catch them.

6558. Have you any remedies to suggest?—Yes, I have. Our committee and myself think, first of all, that we ought to insist upon these families locating themselves in some particular parish, and, if they won't do that, the sheriff should be called upon to give them a location. Secondly, we think that a certain number of Homes should be provided for these tinker families in different districts of the county. Thirdly, we ought to insist upon all their children being educated, either at the public schools, or in some special school provided for them. And fourthly, that the expense incurred in providing these Homes and educating the children should either fall upon the county generally, or be borne by the Imperial funds. Speaking for myself, as an individual, I think the law ought to step in and declare that camping out or living in camps is an illegal form of life.

6559. You say they should be given a locality in some parish—that the sheriff should name a district where they must reside?—(The Rev. Dr. Henderson Crieff.) We think the first thing to be done is, if possible, to bring the existing statutes to bear on that class, and that, in order to do that, each family should be required to select a parish, in which they would be registered, without being bound to live in it. The Local Authority of that parish would then look after them, and be responsible for any relief that might be needed for them.

6560. I presume every gipsy must have a legal settlement?—(Dr. Henderson.) It is impossible to find out these birth settlements. The family as a whole cannot be dealt with, because one child is born in one parish and another in another.

6561. If you have a gipsy family, say, in the parish of Crieff, and some burden is incurred in respect of a member of that family, the inspector finds out that the child was born somewhere else—it may be in Glasgow?—(Dr. Henderson.) The present Poor Law would settle that. We want to get hold of them in a way that the present law does not touch.

6562. (Col. Williamson.) I would insist upon their living in some sort of habitation in a special parish.

6563. (Mr. Miller, one of the Deputation.) We saw that a difficulty would arise between parishes as to paying the expense, and we therefore recommend that it should be borne either by the counties or by the Imperial Exchequer. We think such a class as tinkers should be dealt with, not as domiciled in any parish with regard to payment, but that the county or the Government should provide the funds.

6564. If the Government provide the funds, it would not matter whether the gipsy belonged to Perthshire or anywhere else?—(Mr. Miller.) No.

6565. But you think you have a sufficiently well-defined population of gipsies to ask the county to make provision for them?—(Mr. Miller.) Yes.

6566. How could you fix the gipsies in these localities? I am told you have had some notable examples of the hereditary tendency of the gipsy to remain a gipsy and a wanderer?—(Col. Williamson.)

Yes; I had a very striking example of that last night. Yesterday was an extremely cold day, and the frost was succeeded by pelting rain. It happened that two gipsy families had returned to the district of which I am speaking, and I had provided a shed for their shelter. I also gave them something to eat, and material for a fire, and hoped they would take advantage of the shed. They pretended to do so, but they did not, and they remained out in the pouring rain all night, simply because they love their life of independence and outside living. I had another story of a child not being allowed to be born in a house but in a shed. I had a little christening money raised for her, and put in the Savings Bank, but, after she had grown up and been to a situation, she returned to her former life.

6567. (The Chairman.) I was told of a murder in this county, where two of the sons of the murdered man went into the army, and afterwards returned to their tribe?—(Col. Williamson.) Yes, I knew all the members of that family.

6568. How do you think you will get people with such ingrained roving propensities to settle down?—(Col. Williamson.) In my young [days] those people never worked, but now they work at the hay-making and harvest time.

6569. Do they do good work?—(Col. Williamson.) They do very good work when at it. They work at our oak-peeling, at turnip-shawing, and at harvest. When I was a boy the gipsies would not eat 'baker's bread,' but now they all eat it and buy it; so that there is a great advance in their method of living.

6570. But they would not go into the house you had provided for them?—(Col. Williamson.) No, because they knew I had started a movement for sending a missionary among them to collect their names and the number of their families, and they thought I was acquiring too much power over them.

6571. Do you think they would go to homes?—(Col. Williamson.) I think so, in time. I think that should be the first great step.

6572. I suppose they make a living by mending pots and pans?—(Col. Williamson.) Yes.

6573. If they were located in fixed houses they would find a considerable amount of their present trade cut off?—(Col. Williamson.) I do not think so.

6574. But they would have to rove about the county, and come back?—(Col. Williamson.) If we had six homes in the county, which I think would be sufficient, work would be taken to them.

6575. But the community who forced them to settle down in these homes would have the responsibility of maintaining them. Do you propose that?—(Col. Williamson.) I do. I think we can do nothing less.

6576. (Dr. Henderson.) The majority of us are of opinion that the chief work is to get hold of the children and bring them under educational influences, and we think it will not be possible to do that without, in the first place, making some one responsible for seeing that it is done. If, for instance, a School Board was to try and get hold of them just now, they would just slip away to some other place, and we would not have the locus standi for a prosecution.

6577. But, if the family went away ten miles from that parish, the children could not attend the school there?—(Dr. Henderson.) The first thing we would do would be to bring to bear the existing law, by applying for an attendance order, and we could get the children sent to an Industrial School.

6578. As to the matter of expense?—(Dr. Henderson.) We think it necessary to face some expense at present as a temporary outlay, with the view of getting permanently rid of this difficulty.

6579. That would involve the relief of the 96 families of the care of their 129 children, and at the expense of the ratepayers?—(Dr. Henderson.) That would be very little over all Perthshire.

6580. But I wish to get at the strength of your case. You relieve these people at the expense of the ratepayers, who are compelled to support their own children?—(Dr. Henderson.) At present all children can be educated at the expense of the ratepayers, and it would just be a slight extension of the present law.

6581. The magistrates won't enforce the Industrial Schools Act at present against these children, because they are with their parents. Through sympathy or sentiment they make the Act which is in force at present quite powerless. But you think that, if the parents were in a fixed home and within range of the Board Schools, and you got that attendance order, the children would attend the school?—(Dr. Henderson.) It is very much what we desire, because they are very fond of their children, and that might serve to make them a resident population.

6582. It would be applying to them a disability you do not apply to anyone else, that they could not move from one place to another. Would you not, after certain formalities, allow them to move about?—(Dr. Henderson.) Certainly, if they informed the School Board Officer that their children were attending school.

6583. (Col. Williamson.) In regard to our submitting to the cost of educating and partially feeding these children, from my experience of the county, I feel perfectly satisfied that all would cheerfully pay any tax for the benefit of these children.

6584. Do you think, if these children were educated in Board Schools up to 14, that they would become ordinary settled-down members of the community?—(Col. Williamson.) If they did not, I think their descendants would. It has taken a very long time to make us all good Christians, and it will take some little time to make the gipsies or tinkers good members of the community.

6585. Are they ethnologically the people called the Romany?—(Col. Williamson.) I think not. I know the Hungarian gipsies, and they are a different race.

6586. Have they a different language from the Romany?—(Col. Williamson.) Yes. Some of them boast of being able to speak five languages.

6587. On what grounds would you have camping-out made illegal?—(Col. Williamson.) On account of cruelty to the children.

6588. Do you know anything about the mortality?—(Col. Williamson.) I think one very great peculiarity is that the male children outnumber the female children.

6589. That is more or less the case in all populations?—(Col. Williamson.) I do not know, but it is to a very marked degree among the tinkers.

6590. You do not know anything about the mortality?—(Col. Williamson.)—I do not think any of the Deputation does.

6591. (The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie, Little Dunkeld.) I have spoken to several of the tinkers, and, so far as I know, it is about one-half.

6592. At what age?—(Mr. Mackenzie.) Before they reach the age of one year.

6593. Have you seen a Bill proposing to deal with van-dwellers and nomads of that description?—(Mr. Mackenzie.) I have not given it any attention.

6594. (Dr. Henderson.) As to why they should be put under a disability as compared with other people, at present they are in the peculiar position of being exempt from the operation of a great many of the laws which apply to other people. They are living practically in defiance of the law by which they can be got hold of.

6595. The Chief Constable of Roxburghshire told us he was quite able to deal with vagrants under the present powers of the Trespass Act?—(Dr. Henderson.) The gipsy population with which he has to deal is quite different from the tinker population we have floating about in Perthshire.

6596. In what way?—(Dr. Henderson.) They have their settlements in Yetholm and Morebattle, and are a distinct class, moving among themselves.

6597. Have you heard many complaints about begging in a masterful manner?—(Dr. Henderson.) Not in the district in which I live, but I have heard of a great many complaints in the district of Pitlochry.

6598. (Mr. McLagan, Lochtay-side.) I can certify that a tinker woman will not go out of the house when told, and I have had to come from my study to put them out. We may have two, or three, or four camps at one time, and, if you give a little food or clothing to one child, the same day, from morning to night, the kitchen door is continually being knocked at, with a request for this thing and another.

6599. Have you known of many complaints made to the police under the bye-law against begging?—(Mr. Stewart, Schoolmaster.) I have four or five times reported tramps for begging, and they have been convicted.

6600. (Mr. Phillips, St Fillans.) We have a good deal of experience of begging in a masterful way among the tramps, but not among the tinkers. The tramps will not go away till they get something, and if there are only women in the house they persist more strenuously.

6601. Have you ever had any damage done to your crops by tinkers or tramps?—(Mr. Phillips.) No.

6602. Have you ever known any one suffer in that way because of their refusing alms?—(Mr. Phillips.) We refuse them many a time, but they won't go away. We are a few miles away from the police.

6603. Has any one present made any complaint that has not been attended to?—(Mr. Mitchell, Pitlochry.) No; but in my district in summer, or from July till the end of October, it is not possible to walk on the roads without seeing groups of women and children begging from day to day. They are present in dozens and scores.

6604. (The Chairman, to Dr. McCallum.)—I believe you have published a statement with regard to the great cruelty with which gipsy children are treated, in consequence of the drunkenness of their parents, and you have related some facts that came under your observations, of women about to be delivered of children, or recently delivered, being exposed, with their infants, to great dangers and hardships?—(Dr. McCallum.) My experience is that directly they get money they go to drink, and when drunk they give way to disorder and brawling. I know two cases of women with young children who got drunk and left their children untended on the roadside during the night. One of them would have died if it had not been found by the police and taken care of.

6605. Dr. McCallum then asked and was allowed to make the following statement:—

'The class on which I wish to give evidence is that of the tinkers, consisting of small bands of human beings, travelling over a definite area, and living all the year round in tents, with no ostensible means of livelihood. These bands consist, as a rule, of one family of three generations. Their tent is rudely made of stakes, bent so as to meet in the centre, and over this is stretched a covering. Under this shelter the whole family sleep, without, as far as I know, any division. In case of sickness, straw or dried ferns form the mattress, covered with an old blanket. The privilege of fixing this tent is accorded by the tenant farmer, who, in return, gets help during harvest, potato, and turnip-lifting, and tree-peeling. Of course, the tinkers get paid, and this is the only useful work they do. The money thus earned is seldom spent in bettering in any way their condition, but nearly always in drink. Amidst surroundings such as these the children are trained from year to year, from generation to generation. They never attend school, and are ill-used and ill-cared for from their birth. I am scarcely in a position to speak of the morality or immorality of these people, but one thing has struck me, and that is, that the same couple live together, year after year, as man and wife. I don't think many of them are married according to any rites but their own, but I would here like to point out that their children are entered by the Registrar as illegitimate, and I consider it is this that swells the percentage of illegitimate children in our rural districts, and not, as is so often stated, the immorality of the Scotch. No efforts are made to educate the children of these people, and herein lies the backbone of the whole case. Philanthropic efforts, however

- Colonel Williamson. 10 Dec. 1894. 'well-meant, can never be of service as long as the mode of livelihood, training, and surroundings remain as they are. Eradication, in my opinion, is the only cure, but how this is to be brought about is a difficult problem. A great deal of nonsense (if you will excuse my saying it) has been talked about breaking family ties. Family ties should be measured by the amount of affection in the family circle, and, judging from this standpoint, it will not be any great hardship, considering the ultimate amount of good, for these people to be forced either to educate their children or that it should be done by the State from a central position. These people neglect every duty of parents, and then get claimed for them parents' rights. My idea is that all children above five or six should be placed in an institution devoted to them, and my reason for this is, that in rural districts the parents of ordinary children would not consent to allow their children to sit side by side with those coming from tents, who, in nine cases out of ten, would be covered with vermin. I know it is said this plan would never answer, and that on dismissal from a State Institution the people would drift back into their original state, but I have better hopes of the results of education than this. For the elder branches of the tribe I fear there is no hope, and the only thing I can see is to make it an offence for any person to allow another to fix a tent on their land without the proprietor of the tent having first obtained a certificate from the sanitary officer of the district, or, failing one, from the police, that it is a habitable dwelling for the season of the year in which it is proposed to use it. Where a certificate could not be obtained, they should be passed on as casual paupers and treated as such. I am afraid I may appear rather hard-hearted and callous in the few remarks I have had the honour of addressing to you, but I am firmly convinced that the only effectual treatment is eradication. For the children I have only pity. For the grown-up members, knowing them as I do, I feel sure that all philanthropic efforts based on sentimentality are useless.'
6606. (The Chairman.) You say the children are registered as illegitimate?—(Dr. M'Callum.) Yes.
6607. But the parents undergo some form of marriage, although it is an irregular marriage?—(Dr. M'Callum.) But they are all entered in the registrar's books as illegitimate, and go to swell the illegitimacy returns of the county.
6608. Then it does not depend on the Scotch Law, which says that, if they take each other as man and wife, they are married?—(Dr. M'Callum.) I know that the children are registered as illegitimate.
6609. The Chief Constable says the tinkers are rather fond of their children?—(Dr. M'Callum.) I am afraid he bases his opinion on what they say. I speak from what I have seen.
6610. But Col. Williamson told us the same as the Chief Constable?—(Col. Williamson.) And I spoke from what I have seen.
6611. (To Dr. M'Callum.) You spoke of these tinkers spending all their money which they get from the farmers on drink?—(Dr. M'Callum.) The whole living of these tinkers is almost entirely obtained by begging.
6612. And you do not believe in their mending pots and kettles and so on?—(Dr. M'Callum.) I have never seen them do it.
6613. (The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie.) I spoke to the Registrar about these children being registered as illegitimate when the parents had taken each other as man and wife, and he said these were his instructions, unless they had used the words at the marriage ceremony, 'till death do us part.' I think it is a great hardship, and the people themselves feel it to be so. I think the marriages should be declared Scotch marriages, and all the children registered as legitimate, for the tinkers are very fond of their children and of each other.
6614. (Col. Williamson.) I have asked one or two of these gipsies if they would like to have their children baptised, and they have cheerfully assented.
6615. Were you aware of the fact of their children being registered as illegitimate, or have you spoken to them on that subject?—(Col. Williamson.) No, I would be very shy of speaking on that subject, even to a gipsy girl.
6616. But you could tell them that they could have their marriages declared valid before the sheriff?—(Col. Williamson.) I think that would give them another link to civilisation, and I will certainly impress that upon them.
6617. (The Rev. Mr. Hardie, Fowls Wester.) Having known the tinkers intimately for upwards of 40 years, I cannot help thinking that the sketch of their lives, given by Dr. M'Callum, is rather too dark. There are frequent occasions when they get drunk in a town or village, and quarrel among themselves; but these opportunities are comparatively few. The greater part of their life is spent in country districts, and they are a thoroughly honest set of people, with great affection for their children, and extremely kind to them, except when they get drunk. I have frequently baptised their infants, and have known them in many ways, and I think a little brighter view should be taken of their lives.
6618. Do you know anything about their marriages?—(Mr. Hardie.) I hold that they are bona fide marriages.
6619. But they do not go to ministers to get married?—(Mr. Hardie.) No, they have a form of their own, but it is a solemn and binding one.
6620. (Mr. Mitchell.) Judging from our experience of what we see in Pitlochry, whatever their affections may be for their children, a more wretched and emaciated set of children are not to be seen anywhere. I cannot conceive the possibility of parents who had any real, true affection for their children allowing them to grow up as they are doing.
6621. (By Col. M'Hardy.) To Col. Williamson—Could you divide these wandering poor into separate classes? There are an average of 500 of these migratory gipsies and tramps going about the county. The gipsies have a sort of residential tie. Then there are professional vagrants, and then men travelling in search of work. Could you get at the numbers of these different classes, and which class is really the objectionable one?—(Col. Williamson.) My answer to that is that I happened to have been connected with the railway recently made through the upper part of Strathearn. Two distinct classes of people were working on the railway, but, as a rule, almost the whole of them were tramps. There are two classes of beggars or tramps in the country—one ready to do a certain amount of work, and another class of absolutely idle and loitering people who live on those who are a little better than themselves. Among the better sort of tramps are a great many men who have been in the army for a short number of years. They are men who cannot settle in any kind of work, and they wander about the country seeking work at new waterworks, railways, and similar employment as common labourers.
6622. (Dr. Henderson.) We started suppers in Crieff a few years ago, during a severe winter, and we found in the lodging-house one class who would not look at the ticket which only enabled them to come to a hall where they would get bread and meat. Another class were exceedingly thankful for it.
6623. Would you be prepared to suggest that those men who are moving through the county in search of work should have some provision made for them at night?—(Dr. Henderson.) For myself I have a very distinct feeling that there ought to be a proper lodging-house in every village—in fact, a greater number of lodging-houses than there are villages in the county—for the accommodation of these men. I am sure that my opinion will be strongly supported by every constable in the county. Instead of such a house detracting from the comfort and happiness of a village, it would be to their benefit.
6624. The moving population would then come much more under the notice of the constable?—(Dr. Henderson.) Yes.
- Colonel Williamson. 10 Dec. 1894.

Colonel
Williamson.
10 Dec. 1894.

6625. It might be objected that this system of shelters would cost a good deal, but I suppose this moving population of 500 costs a good deal of money?—(Dr. Henderson.) Yes. In the town of Crieff we are terribly taxed by these people flocking to us while our summer visitors are with us. If a small tax were put on to provide these men with one night's lodging and supper and breakfast, on the understanding that they would not tarry, but would move on next day, there would be no room for their plea that they could not get food or lodging, and the payment of that tax would be the peoples' answer to appeals for charity.

6626. A tax of 8d. a head would be £4000 a year for the county of Perth?—(Dr. Henderson.) I do not think that, as a rule, it costs them less than 2s. at present.

6627. (Col. Williamson.) I believe these Homes would be largely self-supporting.

6628. (The Rev. W. Tait, St. Madoe's.) In my parish there is a brick-work, and I believe the kilns are filled at night by tramps who go there for the warmth.

6629. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do they allow them there because of the feeling that there would be a disturbance if they were interfered with?—(Mr. Tait.) No, I don't think so.

6630. (By Miss Stevenson.) The Chief Constable told us that the children were never sent to beg, but that the parents did so. Do you find that that is the case?—(Col. Williamson.) I think that is the case of late, but it was not so a few years ago. A few years ago the children were the principal beggars, but now they are kept in the background.

6631. (Dr. Henderson.) I have threatened a good many with prosecutions who have begged off me.

6632. Has any one of the School Boards of Perthshire tried to enforce the compulsory clause of the Act in the case of those children?—(Dr. Henderson.) No School Board has any locus standi as a prosecutor regarding these people.

6633. If the School Board officer warned them, would it not be effective?—(Dr. Henderson.) They would just move to another district.

6634. Could there not be a method of correspondence so as to follow the movements of these people? In Edinburgh, Leith, and Portobello we have a regular exchange of communications with regard to defaulting parents?—(Dr. Henderson.) That could be done if we had some system of registration, and could fix the responsibility for taking the initiative upon some authority. It is not like the case of Edinburgh or Leith, as these people are moving over the whole county. Before the correspondence could be carried through they would have moved off, and you could not get at them.

6635. (Col. Williamson.) To come to practical results, the children of the parish schools would not sit beside these vagrant children because of their condition.

6636. (Miss Stevenson.) Then, I suppose the suggestion of the committee is, that there should be some Industrial School in Perth to which these children should be sent till, possibly, they are 14 years of age?—(Dr. Henderson.) Yes.

6637. (Mr. Mitchell, Pitlochry.) I have repeatedly been told that in Pitlochry the other children would not be allowed to sit along with these tinker children.

6638. (The Chairman.) But have you not had that in Glasgow?—(Mr. Mitchell.) Nothing like it.

6639. (The Chairman.) But you would not take it as an excuse on the part of defaulting parents for not sending their children to school, that they would have to mix with other children?—(Mr. Mitchell.) It is indispensable that they should have food and clothes. The prime necessity is to get the tinkers ejected from their present dwellings and absorbed in the labour population.

6640. (Mr. Stewart, Schoolmaster.) If a tinker child, or any other child was to come to my school in a state of filth, I would turn it to the door, and the Education Act allows me to do so.

6641. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But, if brought into civilisation and inspected by the Sanitary Inspector?—(Mr. Stewart.) I could not refuse them then, and would be glad to receive them. Colonel Williamson. 10 Dec. 1894.

6642. Do you think there is any necessity for a central Industrial School in Perth for the education of gipsy children?—(Col. Williamson.) I do not think the idea is practicable.

6643. Are you aware that the Commissioners of Supply or County Council have sent children to the Mars Training Ship to be educated?—(Col. Williamson.) Yes.

6644. What was the result?—(Col. Williamson.) In some cases very good.

6645. Is it the case that one lad, who had been there four years and served in the Royal Navy, went back to his gipsy life as soon as he was free again?—(Col. Williamson.) I believe it is.

6646. Are the parents of gipsies very fond of their children?—(Col. Williamson.) I have no doubt of that.

6647. The Chief Constable of Perthshire told us that the gipsy population is stagnant, but the number of children born among them is very large. Does not that circumstance suggest a very high infant mortality?—(Col. Williamson.) I believe there is a very high infant mortality.

6648. Do you ascribe that to bad treatment, or the inclemency of the weather?—(Col. Williamson.) I cannot believe in the bad treatment, but I believe in the neglect and folly of the parents, and the hardships, to all of which I think the mortality is due.

6649. Take it from me as a fact that one out of every two gipsy parents in Perthshire has been apprehended for drunkenness during the year. Does that indicate kindness and care of the children?—(Col. Williamson.) I think the most degraded animal may love its offspring.

6650. We have learned from the Chief Constable that the apprehensions for drunkenness among the gipsies are 15 times more frequent than among the civil population?—(Col. Williamson.) I believe that is a very unfair estimate of the drunkenness between the two classes. Probably every case among the gipsies is reported, and thousands of cases of the ordinary population are not reported. I think some drunkards have very kind hearts indeed, and it is no sign of their want of love for their children because they get drunk.

6651. Do you say that this drunkenness is hereditary?—(Col. Williamson.) It is a disease among the gipsies and among ourselves.

6652. In the case of the gipsies, do you put it down more to heredity than the acquisition of that habit?—(Col. Williamson.) I cannot say whether the gipsies are specially cursed with a tendency to drink.

6653. You suggested a sort of 'reserve' to be set apart for gipsies in Perth?—(Col. Williamson.) I suggested that Homes should be provided in different parts of the country.

6654. Something like an Indian 'reserve' for themselves?—(Col. Williamson.) No, I do not think that would be suitable.

6655. You propose to bring these people, living under the canopy of heaven all their lives, into dwelling-houses. Is there any probability of their being first brought to live in caravans such as the gipsies in the south have?—(Col. Williamson.) I have no objection. Anything like a step towards civilisation is desirable.

6656. But, if you provide them with caravans, you would still have a greater difficulty in dealing with the children, because they would more easily escape from you?—(Col. Williamson.) I think the houses are a better plan.

6657. Do you look upon the Highland gipsy as a picturesque object in your rural life?—(Col. Williamson.) No, not picturesque. I think it is a very sad picture, and a disgrace that it should have existed so long.

6658. (To Dr. M'Callum.) Can you give us any idea of the amount of infant mortality?—No, I cannot; but I have often heard of families of eight and ten, with only half of them living.

Colonel
Williamson.
10 Dec. 1894.

6659. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What makes you think that the Homes you suggest for the tramps and gipsies would be self-supporting?—(Col. Williamson.) Because the better class of tramps have always sufficient funds to pay for their bed and food.

6660. You would not exact work from them for their bed?—(Col. Williamson.) No, I would rather make them pay.

6661. But, if they could not pay?—(Col. Williamson.) But the better class can always pay. I think, if it were tried to be self-supporting, it would be found that they would be so.

6662. But, if not self-supporting, do you think the localities would readily pay for them?—(Col. Williamson.) I am sure that our locality, embracing four or five parishes, would.

6663. Would it fall on the Parochial Authorities?—(Col. Williamson.) I think rather it should come out of the Imperial Funds.

6664. Would you have any compulsion to make the tramps remain in these Homes?—(Col. Williamson.) Certainly not. You will never compel a Scotsman.

6665. Do you think a tramp would voluntarily go to a house like that?—(Col. Williamson.) Not continuously.

6666. Do you think a home should be provided, only to be occasionally occupied by the nomadic class of tramps?—(Col. Williamson.) We will always have tramps and wanderers throughout the country, and these men think they ought to have a bed to sleep in, and they go to houses occupied by poor people, who take them in for the sake of payment, and they are a great disadvantage to the family of that household.

6667. But begging would go on still?—(Col. Williamson.) I do not think we are now much troubled by beggars. If they only knew the answer to give the beggar, he would disappear very quickly. There are exceptional cases, but we have very stringent laws on our side with regard to begging.

6668. But, how are you to act on the people to make them more hard-hearted? What is the proper answer which they should give to a beggar?—(Col. Williamson.) One simple answer has never failed with me—it is 'go directly to the public road; go sharp, and if you 'don't go, I will send for the police.'

6669. You think if that were more forcibly carried out the begging would disappear?—(Col. Williamson.) No, I think the beggars would continue to return, and you would have to continue to give that answer.

6670. But, does not the beggar know, when you threaten him with the police, that the police are five or six miles off?—(Col. Williamson.) Yes.

6671. (By the Chairman.) One gentleman mentioned that these tinkers not only took whisky themselves, but gave it to their children. Has there been any case of children being seen drunk?—(The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie.) I have known them give their children whisky.

6672. But it may have been done out of a mistaken notion of what was good for them?—(Mr. Hutchinson, Manager of Perth Industrial School.) I have seen many cases of tinker parents giving their children whisky. It seems to be as natural for a tinker child to drift back to its wandering life as for a duck to take to the water. In order to do real permanent good to that class, you must restrict them to civilised walks of life.

6673. How are the children passing through your hands maintained?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) From the Imperial purse.

6674. But you have a claim against the parents?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) Only if they are in a position to pay.

6675. I suppose you never get anything?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) Never a halfpenny from the tinkers.

6676. (By Miss Stevenson.) Under what section of the Act are these children sent to you?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) The 14th section.

6677. And do they come to you from the Police Courts?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) Yes from the Police Courts, the Sheriff Courts, and the Justice of Peace Courts.

6678. Then they are all police cases?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) Yes.

6679. (By the Chairman.) What is the usual charge against them?—(Mr. Hutchinson.) Begging or found wandering.

6680. (Mr. Miller, Manager of Girls' Industrial School, Perth.) We find that the children sent to such institutions as ours are deteriorating very much in intelligence. My school is a girls' school, into which they are received younger than in the boys' school. As these tinker girls grow older they deteriorate in intelligence very much. In the case of the murder, to which reference has been made, we had the girl of the family, and she did extremely well.

6681. (The Chairman.) Can either of you gentlemen give us some encouragement that it is possible to deal with gipsy children, with the view of making them change their habits?—(Mr. Miller.) I know a great many cases of the children of gipsy parents going to the colonies and doing well.

6682. (Mr. Hutchinson.) In the case of the boys, only those do well who emigrate. If they remain in this country they drift back to the tribe.

6683. (Mr. Miller.) We had a case of fire-raising in this county—of a girl setting fire to a barn just to get discharged from her situation. She was sent abroad with her sister, and is doing well.

6684. (The Chairman.) Who sent her abroad?—(Mr. Miller.) The school. We have a small fund for such purposes.

6685. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you ascribe the deterioration in the intelligence of the children to inter-marriages?—(Mr. Miller.) Yes: the result of the inter-marrying is distinctly perceptible in the children now.

6686. (Mr. Hutchinson.) That is so.

6687. How could you prevent these marriages of consanguinity?—Mr. Hutchinson.—If you got them to give up that sort of life, they would be glad to marry into other classes.

Mr. James
Small.

Mr. JAMES SMALL, Police-Sergeant, Pitlochry, called in and examined.

Mr. James
Small.

6688. (By the Chairman.) Do you agree with what Mr. Mitchell has said about the great amount of begging that goes on?—Yes. It is very often after the offence that we get the complaints made against them.

6689. Do you apprehend on your own initiative or after getting complaints?—We must have a complaint, and we seldom get it.

6690. Did Mr. Mitchell ever complain to you?—No.

6691. Your instructions are not to apprehend without a complaint?—Yes.

6692. Have you seen any drunkenness?—I have apprehended young men of 16 and 17 for drunkenness.

6693. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do the gipsy mothers over-lie their children?—(The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie.) Yes, they do; I have known cases.

6694. (By the Chairman.) Is that more prevalent among them than other people?—(Rev. Mr. Mackenzie.) It is pretty bad with them. The mothers get drunk and fall over their children. We hear a great deal about the drunkenness of these people, and I would suggest whether it is not possible to make an enactment whereby the publican would be punished for supplying drink to any tinker or tramp. (Witnesses then withdrew.)

Mr. John
Grahame.

10 Dec. 1894.

MR. JOHN GRAHAME, Advocate, Sheriff-Substitute of the County of Perth, called in and examined.

Mr. John
Grahame.

10 Dec. 1894.

6695. (By the Chairman.) You are Sheriff-Substitute of the entire county of Perth?—I am.

6696. And before that you were sheriff of the western district?—Yes.

6697. I suppose you have heard a great deal about the complaints of vagrancy?—Yes, more especially when I was in the western district. It was then that my attention was called to the number of masterful beggars in the county.

6698. Had you many cases brought up?—I had a few cases of men going into cottages and getting money through threats of violence.

6699. Is not masterful begging a serious offence in Scotch law?—It is.

6700. It could be dealt with by a jury?—The penalty is 60 days, and it would probably be dealt with summarily, unless there was serious violence or injury to the person, when the punishment could be imprisonment for two years.

6701. You say that the county is over-run with members of the professional tramp class, not only in the leading thoroughfares from town to town, but on the moorland, drove, or bridle roads in remote districts, and not only during the day but at night, and that many of these people are returned convicts?—I found that was so when I was making an inquiry about the men who frequented the lodging-house at Dunblane, and that a great many were in the habit of travelling at night, especially across the Sheriffmuir road, rendering it very dangerous to be out.

6702. Did they help themselves?—I know one instance in which they killed a man for the purpose of robbery.

6703. But the crime of serious violence by tramps is rare?—I have several times had them brought before me for threatening women who have been left alone.

6704. Was there a shelter in your district?—There was a lodging-house in Dunblane, which became a disorderly place.

6705. Was it kept up by the public authorities?—At one time it was, but not lately. Very many of the offences in the neighbourhood of Dunblane originated in that house.

6706. You think legislation, in the shape of a strict Vagrancy Act, is urgently called for?—As I understand, the bye-laws of Perthshire are not in general application over Scotland.

6707. Are you aware that, in the case of one county which was brought before us, the County Council framed bye-laws, one of which dealt with bill-posting, and the judges of the Court of Session held that it was ultra vires, and that the bye-law about vagrancy, which was couched in much the same terms as yours, was ultra vires?—I am not aware of it.

6708. Your bye-laws were confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland?—Yes.

6709. And that would make it good law?—I think so.

6710. Has your bye-law been effective?—It has been most effective.

6711. Does it give you sufficient power, or would you have anything more?—Not in the matter of begging, or making that an offence. But, as regards vagrancy, I think no help should be given to habitual tramps—distinguishing, of course, between them and the honest out-door poor.

6712. Has the abolition of transportation increased the number of vagrants?—It has.

6713. You would make vagrancy itself a crime?—Yes, vagrancy of a particular kind, but not the unemployed poor who are going from place to place through the country in search of work; but I think the idle men who do not wish work, and live on the public, are committing a crime.

6714. How would you discriminate so as to get at them?—I would allow no such person to get assistance from any Inspector of Poor, unless he could satisfy the inspector that he was honestly in search of work, and

I think a tramp should not be allowed to go from place to place unless he has a certificate from the Inspector of Poor that he was satisfied that he has reasonable ground for travelling.

6715. But that would mean that he was stamped as a tramp?—That would be a matter of judgment.

6716. But you would not allow such a serious interference with liberty to be vested in the hands of an inspector?—He would know the residential poor, and would only have to deal with those passing through his parish. A man who had been in honest employment would be able to give some evidence that he had been so employed.

6717. You hold that the condition of vagrancy must be dealt with as in itself criminal?—Yes, the vagrant with no means of livelihood; a clear line of distinction being drawn between masterful beggars and sorners, and the 'pure and impotent.'

6718. What is the crime under the present law in connection with vagrancy?—It is not regarded practically as a crime. But in principle, in some of our old Acts still unrepealed, it is a crime.

6719. Is there any law in existence dealing with vagrancy which treats it as being of itself a crime?—There is not.

6720. The clause in the Burghs Police Act makes vagrancy an offence if you could get at it?—Yes; and that shows the difficulty of identifying the vagrant.

6721. All those tinkers we have been talking about conduct themselves as vagrants, having no fixed place of residence, but they have a means of getting their livelihood?—But they don't travel about the country and get assistance from Inspectors of Poor.

6722. But those who get that assistance cannot be able-bodied?—My experience is that a large number who are able-bodied do get assistance to pay for their lodgings.

6723. The inspectors do that at their own risk though?—Yes, that is so.

6724. The system you propose of relief to the honest workman is an idea adopted from what prevails in Ayrshire?—It is something similar.

6725. You think that money might be well spent in emigration?—There is a great difficulty there, because I think the colonists would be very unwilling to receive that class.

6726. In America they have passed laws preventing the deportation of vagrants?—Yes.

6727. Do you think that, if they were set to work, their labour would be worth much?—No, I think it would be worth very little.

6728. What are your suggestions as, being on the whole, the most likely method of accomplishing the object of dealing with vagrancy?—To obtain from the Legislature an Act which shall provide:—Firstly, for the prohibition and punishment of all persons begging beyond the limits of their own parish; secondly, for providing the honest unemployed poor with certificates from the inspector of the parish in which they last had employment, under which they shall, in travelling in search of work, be entitled to obtain casual relief from the inspectors of the parishes through which they pass; such certificates, however, being limited in point of time, so as not to extend beyond the period required to enable the persons holding them to arrive at a place where there was a prospect of their obtaining employment; thirdly, that, except in cases of sickness or other infirmity, all poor inspectors shall be prohibited from affording any casual relief to persons not possessing such certificates; and fourthly, that all persons not possessing such certificates, and having no fixed place of residence or honest means of livelihood and found begging or sorning shall be punished. That is an effort to show what might be a remedy, but I submit these views with great diffidence.

6729. On what ground would you prohibit and punish persons begging beyond their own parishes? Would you allow a person to beg in his own parish?—Yes, because he would be known there. He would not come under the category of tramps, and I was only dealing with vagrants.

Mr. John
Grahame.

10 Dec. 1894.

6730. This system of certificates is something like that in operation in Ayrshire?—To some extent it is.

6731. Inspectors of poor are at present prohibited from giving assistance are they not, except in cases of sickness or other infirmity?—They have no public funds at their disposal from which to give assistance, but they do not like the responsibility of turning away a man on a wet night; and I know the inspectors' houses in the evening are surrounded by able-bodied tramps, showing that they are in the habit of getting relief.

6732. That shows that the Act is administered in a merciful, rather than a legal manner?—It is.

6733. I think the bye-laws of Perthshire go even further than your suggestion, because they punish a man for begging in his own parish, or causing his children to beg. Is that bye-law acted up to?—Yes, in the neighbourhood of Perth.

6734. Have you many vagrants before you?—I had, before the bye-law was put in force, but I have very few now.

6735. You deal with all the petty offences in the county?—Yes, except those occurring in the Police Burghs.

6736. What is the most distant portion of the county from Perth where you sit?—I think Dalnaspidal, which is about forty-five miles distant.

6737. Take the case of a man arrested as drunk and incapable at that distance from Perth, what procedure would be adopted with him?—I have never heard of any one being brought from such a distance.

6738. Where do they bring them from?—If a man was taken up for being drunk at Killin, he would be taken to Dunblane and fined 5s. or twenty-four hours' imprisonment.

6739. But first he is taken to the nearest police station?—Yes, and kept there till tried at Dunblane before the Hon. Sheriff-Substitute, who holds a court daily.

6740. Are they brought from considerable distances to you at Perth?—Not drunks.

6741. What becomes of them?—I cannot say.

6742. Are there any other courts besides Dunblane and Perth?—No Sheriff Courts.

6743. Are persons who commit offences outside the Police Burghs sent to Perth?—Yes.

6744. How long would they be detained for drunkenness?—Not more than twenty-four hours.

6745. But how long might they be detained before they were tried?—They should be brought down immediately.

6746. A man apprehended on the Saturday night would be in the hands of the police till Monday morning?—Yes.

6747. Under what statute are they dealt with?—The Public Houses Act, 25 and 26 Vic., chap. 35.

6748. What is the section?—The 23rd section, for dealing with 'any person found in a state of intoxication and not under the care of a suitable person.' The Burghs Police Act gives greater powers and inflicts a heavier punishment than I could do under this Act.

6749. From the police returns, I see you must have had 25 convictions in Perthshire for drunkenness, not under the Public Houses Act, as against 20 under that Act. What is the meaning of the drunkenness, or drunk and incapable, for which convictions were obtained, not under the Public Houses Act?—I am sorry I cannot say. I think these cases must have been from the burghs.

6750. Would you mind looking into the matter and giving the secretary a note of the results?—Yes.

6751. Have you anything to suggest as to the treatment of habitual offenders?—I would increase the watchfulness of the police over them; but I gave my attention in regard to this inquiry chiefly to the subject of vagrancy.

6752. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You want something stricter for vagrants?—Yes; they are dealt with in a somewhat loose way at present.

6753. Do you think there is much chance of getting any further legislation out of Parliament on the subject?—I cannot say.

6754. Is there not rather a disinclination on the part of the Legislature to constitute what are regarded as new offences?—There is, but vagrancy is an old offence.

6755. It would not be a new law?—No; it would be an old law revived.

6756. What punishment would you wish to inflict on a vagrant?—I would have them brought up under the Summary Procedure Act, which limits the punishment to 60 days' imprisonment.

6757. You would not punish them more severely than now?—We cannot punish them at all just now, unless they commit a criminal offence or a contravention of the bye-laws of the county.

6758. If it were a criminal offence, would it not be punishable by a heavier penalty than under your bye-laws?—Not necessarily, for there is a limit to the punishment for criminal offences.

6759. Your plan would be, after a vagrant had been punished so many times, to shut him up for a prolonged period?—I would increase the punishment.

6760. In that way would you reform him or just keep him out of the way?—It would keep him from going about the country as he does at present, but I doubt if you will reform the regular professional tramp, as long as there is the opportunity of going about the country and living on the public.

6761. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Can you convict for drunkenness under the Lindsay Act?—It is a Burgh Act, and is not applicable to the county at all. Blairgowrie has adopted portions of it.

6762. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What is the punishment for masterful begging? Is it distinct from ordinary begging?—Not in law. The whole statute against masterful begging has become obsolete.

6763. It has been said that considerable difficulty would be experienced in filling the places of the poor in doing farm work during the summer?—I think there would be no difficulty in finding a sufficient supply of such labour.

6764. But, in some cases, agricultural labour is not easily got?—Since the introduction of machinery into farm work the number of hands now required is comparatively few.

6765. But do not farmers take advantage of the tramp class?—Yes, they do.

6766. And would it not be a serious thing to stop that labour?—If there was a demand, the supply of labour would come.

6766A. The tramp is, to a certain extent, a useful member of society?—In this neighbourhood the farmers go to the market and engage special men for this work, and they are not the tramps who go about the country.

6767. Who are they?—Unemployed labourers for the time being.

6768. Have they residences in the county?—I cannot tell. Some of them come from the Irish population in Stirlingshire, and from the town of Perth.

6769. The amount of support that the tramps receive from the population must be enormous, and it seems to be given, if not willingly, at any rate readily. Do you think it is done from a sort of, not immediate terror, but from a sentiment which is brought about through terror?—To a certain extent it is.

6770. It has now become the use and habit, and they don't give so much through fear as they formerly did?—It may be so; but still I know that in many instances it is given through fear, and a number of these people are supplied by the farmers with lodgings at night through the fear that, if they were refused, there would be the risk of some injury being done to the farmer's property. Some of the farms, I know, are recognised as lodging-houses, and part of a barn is set apart for the accommodation of tramps.

6771. You are not in favour of these movable poor being given facilities to travel through the country?—

Mr. John
Grahame.

10 Dec. 1894.

Mr. John
Grahame.
10 Dec. 1894.

I would give such facilities if they could show evidence of their being honestly on tramp, as a number of excellent men are.

6772. (By the Chairman.) In connection with these gipsies, are they ever brought up for fortune-telling?—Never.

6773. The Chief Constable told us that, in treating frequent offenders for drunkenness and petty offences, it was the custom to require them to give caution for good behaviour for a certain time?—We do that, not in the case of drunkards, but of persons who had taken drink to excess, and over whom their families might be expected to exercise control.

6774. It is not then a common course?—No, but I have done it with breaches of the peace, caused by drunkenness.

6775. Would you do it for drunkenness?—No, the punishment is so slight, and it is fixed by statute.

6776. We were told of a case at Dunkeld, where the person was put under £10 caution?—I know the case. He was a man of means, and it was done at the suggestion of his relatives.

6777. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Did his friends subscribe to the security?—Yes.

6778. Do you think that to get a man's friends to become a sort of guardian over him could be worked as a means of reformation?—In this case it turned out well for the party concerned; but we have sent him to prison once or twice.

6779. Do you think the practice of getting a guarantee to look after a habitual offender would work?—I think so. That is applicable to all cases. We did it here in the case of a young person convicted of reckless fire-raising.

6780. And for thefts?—Yes, we have done it with some young persons for theft.

6781. Do you think that is a good thing for juvenile offenders?—It is the way pointed at by the Legislature, under the Juvenile Offenders' Act. [Witness then withdrew.]

Grahame.

[ADJOURNED.]

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Perth, Tuesday, 11th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P.
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor DOVE WILSON.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

LIEUT.-COL. JOHN CAMPBELL, Governor of Perth Prison, called in and examined.

Lieut.-Col.
Campbell.
11 Dec. 1894.

6782. (By the Chairman.) You are Governor of the Perth Prison?—I am.

6783. How long have you been in that position?—Nearly 12 years.

6784. Previous to that were you in the prison service?—No, I was in the army.

6785. How many inmates have you in the prison?—About 300 at the present time.

6786. Male and female?—Yes, and including lunatics.

6787. Would you please tell us the numbers of each class of prisoners?—This morning we have 38 male lunatics and 16 females; 132 male prisoners and 37 females, 50 male convicts and 28 females, and the untried prisoners, making in all 221 males, 81 females, or a total of 302.

6788. Have you any information as to the number of recommitments among these?—Yes. I can give you that. During last year we had 42 males and 52 females who had been once in before; 70 males and 35 females who had been twice; 47 males and 16 females who had been for 3 times; 29 males and 12 females who had been 4 times; 21 males and 16 females who had been 5 times; 66 males and 36 females who had been 6 times and under 10 times; 31 males and 29 females who had been 10 times and under 20; and 8 females who had been 20 times and under 80.

6789. Is that your biggest record?—Yes.

6790. Nothing over 50 times?—I have no record of anything over 50.

6791. I see your experience here, as in other prisons, is, that the females together make a higher record than the males?—I think they do.

6792. Is there a greater difficulty in turning them from their evil courses?—I think the difficulty is this: that the majority of these females have got into a very bad class, and, once there, it is very difficult getting them out of it.

6793. Is it that females get shorter sentences than male prisoners?—No. Even with long sentences they go back into crime. I have a list here of our convicts, and I find there is one woman, by name Mary Ann Murray or Buchanan, on that list who has had three imprisonment sentences and four penal sentences, and who has spent 40 years in prison. Long sentences do not seem to have done her any good.

6794. Were the three imprisonment sentences before or after the penal sentences?—I have no record of that.

6795. Would it not be the case that some of them might have been after the convict sentences, seeing that she was sent back to prison?—She may have got out on license, committed an offence, got a term of imprisonment, and then her licence would be revoked.

6796. What age is she?—She is an old woman now. I cannot exactly say what age she is, but she is certainly over 60.

6797. What other cases have you of that sort?—I have several others. Here is another—Aun Morrison. She has four imprisonment sentences amounting to 17 months, and four convict sentences which amount to 31 years.

6798. You said, as I understand, that convict sentences do not deter them from coming back to you?—I don't think they do.

6799. In order to demonstrate that by such facts as you have stated, it would be necessary that we should know whether the imprisonment sentences or any of them succeeded the convict sentences in point of time?—Well, I don't think they did.

6800. Then you cannot say that a convict sentence has had any deterring effect. They seem to come back to prison as soon as the convict sentence expires?—Well, the facts I have given you show that. The four convict sentences do not seem to have had a deterrent effect on those women. I have many other instances, but they are not so striking as these. I have one who has had five imprisonment sentences—Mary Brown or M'Lachlan—who had spent 50 months in prison under imprisonment sentences, and three convict sentences run up to 17 years.

6801. Does the same thing hold in regard to them?—To some extent. I have not had so much experience with male convicts. They only came to us since 1885. But, so far as it goes, I think it is exactly the same. It is just beginning. I may say that we have very few female convicts now as compared with what we had formerly, because convict sentences now are not so much given to women as they used to be.

6802. Do you find that this tendency not to give women convict sentences sends the same women oftener to you under imprisonment sentences?—Well, I can't say as to that. Our convicts formerly came from all parts of the country. Imprisonment sentences would take effect in the district prisons.

6803. How many women convicts have you now?—This morning there were 28.

6804. And how many males?—50.

6805. From what districts do you receive your prisoners?—I receive convicts from the whole of Scotland. They do a probation of nine months in Perth, and then go on to Peterhead.

6806. But the other prisoners—from what districts do you receive them?—I get them from Perth, Forfarshire and Dundee.

6807. You used to get them from Glasgow, did you not?—Yes. When they are overcrowded at Barlinnie they send them to me. They send them to me also from Dundee when they are overcrowded.

6808. What is the most distant point you get them from?—At present, I think, Inverness. Some time since I got a large lot from Barlinnie, because they were overcrowded there.

6809. Your accommodation is not filled up?—No.

6810. What accommodation have you vacant?—Well, in the criminal department, the prison can accommodate 344 males and 377 females.

6811. So that, in round figures, you have accommodation vacant for about 300 women and about 120 men?—That is about it.

6812. In case this Committee, for instance, made any recommendation for the treatment of habitual petty offenders in Scotland, which would involve commitment, could you in the Perth Prison make use of this superfluous accommodation in such a way as to keep it distinct from the general prison arrangements?—Yes. We have four blocks, all communicating with one another. They have this disadvantage, that they form the segment of a circle and we have only one exercise yard: but, if such an arrangement as you suggest were made, I could arrange to have those habitual offenders exercised at a different hour.

6813. You could set aside a separate block for them?—Yes, I could do that.

6814. As to short sentences—we have been told that two or three short sentences on petty offenders are not deterrent, and lead to no good results?—That is most decidedly my opinion.

6815. But you have told us that long sentences do not appear to do very much good in many cases?—I say that those long convict sentences don't, and my reason is, that the association of the prisoners has a most contaminating and bad effect upon them.

6816. Do you think that long sentences of solitary confinement would have a better effect on those petty habituals?—I think they would.

6817. Take, for instance, the class of cases we have to deal with—breaches of the peace, petty assaults, disorderly conduct, vagrancy and begging, prostitution,—in these cases what do you suggest as the best deterrent?—I think that is a most difficult question. But there is one system which perhaps you will allow me to mention, which is in use in Switzerland, under which such people are sentenced to considerable periods of imprisonment, and gradually allowed their liberty. When prisoners after being kept in strict confinement are suddenly thrown into temptation of the world, you cannot wonder that they go back. I should like to see the Swiss system or something like it tried here, if the evil of contamination caused by the association of prisoners could in any way be avoided.

6818. Of course there is not merely the temptation of the world, but the influence of relatives and friends?—I quite agree with that, influence has much to do with the future of a discharged prisoner. If it is bad, he very soon gets back into the old groove.

6819. Have you many people who gravitate between the prison and the poorhouse?—No, I have not.

6820. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I have a statement here which shows that, when the poorhouse officials visited the prison of Perth, they recognised nine men and eleven women who had been more than twice in the poorhouse; and when the prison officials visited the Perth poorhouse they discovered two men and one woman who had been in prison.

6821. (By the Chairman.) May not the smallness of these numbers be due to the great number of parishes into which Perthshire is divided?—That may be so. But I do not think that the class of persons that come to prison are those who, as a rule, go to poorhouses. My own idea is that the criminal class do not care about poorhouses.

6822. Have you heard them express that opinion?—I cannot say I have. But my belief is that the people who come to me don't go very often to the poorhouse.

6823. We have interviewed some prisoners who have declared that they preferred prison to the poorhouse. Do you think that is a general preference?—I cannot say as to that.

6824. To what sort of prison labour do you put these short sentence petty offenders—say, one month sentences?—Men who have never been in before I am obliged to give teasing to, but men who have been before sew sacks. The great industry in Perth prison is sack-sewing. Prisoners generally learn to sew sacks very readily because it is remunerative.

6825. What do the women do?—They sew a lighter sack.

6826. You were telling us about a system which prevailed in Switzerland: can you give us particulars about it?—Well, I have not seen the system myself. I only heard of it from Dr. Guillaume, whom I met recently at a prison congress. He told me that persons who had been convicted for petty offences for a certain number of times, were sentenced for an undefined period to prison. They are sent to one of the large prisons where they remain for a certain time. A committee, of which the governor is a member, constantly visits the prison, and they select men whom they think are willing to lead a better life, and send them to farms where they work during the day, and then they are locked up at night just as if they were in prison.

6827. That would involve lock-ups all over the country?—I understand they have large farms attached to the prison. It all depends on whether or not a man behaves himself when he is sent to prison. If he behaves he is sent to work on one of these farms and kept there for a certain time. If the improvement continues they gradually get their liberty until they get complete liberty, with the distinct understanding that if there is the slightest breach of conduct in the way of drunkenness, they will be at once sent back to prison.

6828. Can you give us Dr. Guillaume's address?—I think I have some of his papers, and there are references to the system in the proceedings of the prison congress I mentioned. I can let you have those papers.

6829. You said, in reply to a question, that an experiment might be tried with habitual petty offenders in the prison of Perth; but are you aware of any place where an extension of the system involving farming could be tried without involving an unknown expense?—Not in this country.

6830. Do you think it possible to turn any of the labour which such an experiment would place at your disposal to such public works as are being carried on at Peterhead?—Well, Dr. Guillaume found no difficulty.

My great difficulty is in the aggregation of all these criminal people it involves.

6831. In his system they are allowed out to work upon a farm; that is much the same thing, isn't it?—Well, Dr. Guillaume believed it to work well. I mentioned to him my own fear that the system would be very bad.

6832. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Perhaps they are licensed to private farms?—They are afterwards, I believe, but not in the first instance. At first they are placed in these large establishments when they have liberty to work during the day at farm work, and they are locked up at night. If they behave, their liberty is gradually restored to them.

6833. (By the Chairman.) You have got short sentence prisoners?—Yes.

6834. Prisoners, I suppose, come to you for twenty-four hours, three days, five days, and so on?—Yes.

6835. Have you any trouble in keeping these people absolutely separate from the other prisoners?—Most certainly not. They are all in separate cells. They are absolutely separated.

6836. Have you many juvenile offenders?—No. There are a few, but I have had very little experience of juvenile offenders.

6837. Possibly that is because you have Industrial Schools in your district?—I think that must be it. In Dundee they have the Training Ship, and in Forfarshire there is a large Reformatory.

6838. Do you get many men and women who have passed through these Reformatories?—Very few.

6839. Have you any record?—We always enter in the return whether prisoners have been at a Reformatory. There are certainly very few of them.

6840. Could you give us the numbers for a year or two years?—I shall be glad to do so.

6841. I see that there were in the town of Perth, in 1893, 828 people committed to you for breaches of the peace and petty assaults; 387 for drunkenness; 64 for begging; 31 for prostitution; and 86 for petty offences, punishable by 14 days. Perth is a great place for beggars. There were 64 cases of people committed for vagrancy and begging in one year. Have you any idea what the general sentence for that would be?—Well, the sentences vary so much: they are generally short; not over 60 days.

6842. Sixty days is not very short, is it? You would not like to give them more?—Well, it does not prevent them from begging.

6843. What does? What do you think would prevent them; that is what we should like to know—hard labour?—No. I should just like to say that 'hard labour' is a thing which does not specially exist in Perth prison. They are all at hard labour sewing sacks. It is heavy hard work, and I put them all on it whether they get hard labour sentences or not. Virtually all are at 'hard labour.'

6844. What sort of people are those vagrants generally—are they weak-minded or feeble-bodied?—I do not find them so. Some of them are one-legged, one-arm men, and that sort of thing.

6845. Do you think that kind of people can be treated with advantage in the way you mention?—I find they work very well with me. I have one man with me from Glasgow—a one-legged man, who was a most incorrigible man at Barlinnie, but who is working away very well in Perth at sacks.

6846. You have a large number of breaches of the peace from Perth: is any large proportion of those cases due to the gipsy population?—Yes, a number of them do come in for breaches of the peace, from the County.

6847. How do they behave: are they amenable?—They are always most amenable; I very seldom have to punish these tinkers.

6848. If we adopted any scheme involving any work for habitual offenders, it would be necessary to find some work suitable for them: now there is a great out-cry generally against any form of prison labour competing in the market with ordinary labour—are your prisoners employed in making nothing else but sacks?—Yes; they make brush and open mats, nets, &c. *Lieut.-Col.
